

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. S. C. ALDRED, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CLAUD RAY.

Pleading — verification by agent — reasons.

1. The verification of a pleading, when made by an attorney or agent of the party, must, under the provisions of § 5654 of Snyder's Compiled Laws, set forth why it is not made by the party himself; that is, some showing must be made that the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney, or that, if the party is a plaintiff, he is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned, or that the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and that such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney, or that the party is not a resident of or is absent from the state.

Evidence — adverse statements.

2. Any statement made by a party to an action which is against his own interest, and which, in its nature, tends to establish or disprove any material fact, or alleged material fact, in the case, is competent to be put in evidence against him in the trial of that action.

Appeal — misstatement of fact by witness.

3. An assignment of error that the judgment of a court is not sustained by the evidence cannot properly be predicated on a manifestly inadvertent misstatement of fact by a witness, if, from the whole of the witness's testimony, the error is patent, and the true meaning of the witness's statement can be correctly determined, and the testimony, correctly interpreted, will sustain the judgment.

ERROR to the Woodward County Court (Wyand, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and overruling a motion for new trial, in an action of forcible entry and detainer. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Charles Swindall for plaintiff in error.

Mr. C. W. Herod for defendant in error.

Wilson, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was commenced in a justice of the peace court in Woodward county by the defendant in error, as plaintiff, against the plaintiff in error, as defendant, by filing with the justice of the peace a complaint which was verified as follows, omitting the jurat:

State of Oklahoma, }
Woodward County } ss.:

E. M. McCune, being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is the agent of said plaintiff, that he has read the foregoing petition and knows the contents thereof, and that the facts therein stated are true.

E. M. McCune.

Upon the complaint being filed summons was issued and served, whereupon the defendant, in due course of time, appeared specially, and moved the court to quash and hold for naught the pretended summons, for the reasons, among others: First, "that at the time said alleged and pretended summons was issued in said cause the same was void, for the reason that no complaint or bill of particulars had been filed under oath as required by law;" and, second, "that no sufficient showing was made by the plaintiff for having said complaint verified by agent instead of personally by plaintiff, as required by law."

This motion was overruled, and an exception saved, and a demurrer to the complaint filed for the same reasons, among others, which demurrer was overruled and an exception to the ruling of the court saved by the defendant, whereupon an answer was filed and a trial had in due course of time, which resulted in a judgment for the defendant, and the case was appealed to the county court, where the motion and demurrer were refiled by leave of court, in their proper order, and overruled and exceptions saved. Upon defendant's motion to quash and demurrer being overruled by the court he refiled his answer, and in due course of time a trial was had, over his objection to the introduction of evidence, and, a judgment being rendered against him and his motion for a new trial being overruled, he appealed to this court by filing herein a petition in error, with a case made attached.

Plaintiff in error, in his brief, submits his case on two propositions: First, that the court erred in not sustaining his motion to quash the summons in the case because the complaint was not properly verified, alleging that there was no reason shown in the affidavit why the complaint was not verified by the plaintiff instead of his agent; and, second, he challenges the competency and sufficiency of the evidence submitted on behalf of the plaintiff.

The first contention of the plaintiff in error raises the question whether the verification of the complaint conformed to the statute governing the verification of pleadings by attorneys and agents, a question which seems to have been fully settled in this jurisdiction adversely to plaintiff in error's contention. Section 6433 of the Forcible Entry and Detainer Statute (Snyder's), under which this action was commenced in the justice court, provides that "the summons shall not issue herein until the plaintiff shall have filed his complaint in writing under oath, with the justice. . . ."

Section 5654, Snyder's Compiled Laws, provides that "where the affidavit [verifying a pleading] is made by the agent or attorney, it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only: (1) When the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. (2) When the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned. (3) When the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney. (4) When the party is not a resident of, or is absent from the county."

The section last quoted was one of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure at the time of the commencement of this section, but § 6455 of Snyder's Compiled Laws, in force at the time, provides: "The provisions of an act entitled 'An Act to Establish a Code of Civil Procedure,' which are, in their nature, applicable to the jurisdiction and proceedings before justices, and in respect to which no special provision is made by statute, are applicable to proceedings before justices of the peace."

Keeping in mind the above-quoted provisions of the statute, the question for determination is: Was the pleading in question properly verified? We think it was. Section 5654 of Snyder's Compiled Laws was adopted by our state from the Kansas statute, and the court of appeals of that state, passing on a question similar to the one involved here, in the case of Johnson v. Woodbury Trust Co. 8 Kan. App. 860, 57 Pac. 134, held that an affidavit very similar to the one in this case sufficiently complied with the statute. In that case the affidavit read as follows: "John W. Roberts, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys and agent for the defendant herein; that he is familiar with all the facts set out in the above and foregoing answer, and knows the contents thereof; . . . and all the facts and allegations and matters in said answer contained and alleged are true and correct, as I verily believe."

See also Gibson v. Shorb, 7 Kan. App. 732, 52 Pac. 579.

In the case of Garfield County v. Isenberg, 10 Okla. 378, 61 Pac. 1067, the supreme court of the then territory of Oklahoma, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Irwin, after quoting § 3992 of the Statutes of 1893, that being the same as § 5654 of Snyder's Compiled Laws, said: "Now it seems to us that a fair construction of this section would mean that some reason must be given by said affidavit why it was not signed by the party or the proper officer; that is, some showing should be made that this affidavit falls within one or the other of the four classes set forth in the section, because, unless it does, the agent or attorney has no authority to verify such an affidavit."

Again, in the case of the Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 19 Okla. 579, 101 Pac. 850, the supreme court of the territory expressed the same opinion by quoting its formerly expressed language in the Isenberg Case.

The language used by both the Kansas and Oklahoma courts in construing the section of the statute here under consideration clearly contemplates that, where an affidavit of an attorney or agent, verifying a pleading of his principal, sets forth facts which show that his authority to do so is warranted by either of the four classes set forth in said section, a sufficient reason is thereby set forth why the party himself did not verify the pleading.

The verifying affidavit in this case recited that E. M. McCune was the agent of the plaintiff, that he had read the petition and knew the contents thereof, and that the facts herein stated were true. This, we believe, brought the allegations of the affidavit sufficiently within the first class of cases in which an agent is authorized to verify a pleading for his principal by § 5654 of Snyder's Compiled Laws to justify the verification being made by such agent, and such verification was, on authority of the cases above cited, a sufficient verification of the complaint in question.

On the trial of the case the only proof of the service of the three days' notice required by the Forcible Entry and Detainer Statute was the testimony of one Werline, to the effect that he was present at the trial of the case before the justice of the peace and heard the defendant testify that on the 3d day of January, 1911, he was served with a notice to vacate the premises. The plaintiff in error contends that this evidence was not competent, but in that contention he is mistaken, because any statement made by a party to an action which is against his own interest in the case is always competent to be put in evidence against him in that action.

ments.

Plaintiff in error also contends that such evidence was insufficient to establish the fact of notice, for the reason that it fixed the date of service more than a year before the commencement of the action, but the testimony of the witness about that matter, taken as a whole, was such that it is apparent that "1911" was inadvertently spoken, and that what he intended to say was "1912," and it can be determined from his entire testimony that he meant 1912.

Appeal—misstatement of fact by witness.

Finding no substantial error in the case, we recommend that the judgment of the trial court be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, December 21, 1915.

Thus, in Klepper v. Powell (Tenn.) supra, it was held that a plea in abatement may be verified by the party or by his agent or attorney, and that when the plea is verified by an agent, the fact of agency need not be stated in the affidavit, the court saying: "While pleas may be sworn to by the party himself, his agent or attorney, we do not know of any rule requiring the fact of agency to be stated in the affidavit. We see the fact that the party has done that for another that an agent might well do, and as he has assumed to act as agent in the stead of that other, we can see no good reason why the complainant shall object, while the party for whom the act was done does not repudiate, but, on the contrary, adopts it. The essential requirement of the law is that the truth of the plea shall be verified by someone who is willing to swear that it is true."

In Heintzelman v. L'Amoroux (1867) 3 Nev. 377, it was stated that, by direct provision of statute (Practice Act, § 55), a pleading may be verified by an attorney where the party is absent from the county in which the attorney resides, or is, from some cause, unable to verify it, or where the facts are within the knowledge of the attorney.

So in Imlay v. New York & H. R. Co. (1848) 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 94, 1 Sandf. 732, the objection was that the complaint was verified by the attorney, without any reason or excuse being shown why it was not done by the party. The Code allowed it to be verified by the party, or his agent or attorney, and made no distinction between the three. It was held that the verification was not irregular.

In Betts v. Kridell (1887) 20 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 1, the verification of the answer objected to was that the deponent, an agent of the defendant, "says that he is the agent of the defendant in this action; that the foregoing answer is true to the knowledge of the deponent, and that the reason that this verification is not made by the party is that all the material allegations of said answer are within the personal knowledge of this deponent." The provisions of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525) were that "the verification must be made by the affidavit of the party," except, among other cases, "where all the material allegations of the pleading are within the personal knowledge of the agent or the attorney; in either case, the verification may be made by the agent or the attorney for the party." The following section (526) provided that, where the affidavit "is made by a person other than the party, he must set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge, and the reason why it is not made by the party." It was held that the verification was correct, since the agent swore that all the material allegations of the answer were within his personal knowledge, and this is sufficient, without assigning any reason why the verification was not made by the party.

In Wright v. Parks (1860) 10 Iowa, 342, it was held that under the statute (Code, § 2177) a petition in scire facias may be verified by the affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiff, the court saying: "It is objected that the petition is not sworn to by the plaintiff, or someone who shows himself authorized to state on oath that the judgment was not satisfied. The judgment is for the possession of the land. It is averred in the petition that the defendant was in possession of the same, and this is not denied, but is admitted by the demurrer. The party making the affidavit could have had ample means of knowing the judgment was not satisfied. But it is admitted that the party making the affidavit was an attorney for plaintiff. Section 2177 of the Code also provides that this affidavit may be made by an agent or an attorney as well as by the plaintiff."

In an action on a contract wherein the defendant has filed his plea, his agent or attorney may make the necessary affidavit to a proposed amendment of the plea at the trial term, if the defendant then resides out of the county. Poullain v. Pigg (1878) 60 Ga. 263, wherein it was said: "It appears from the bill of exceptions in this case that the defendant filed a plea to the plaintiff's action, which was demurred to as being insufficient in law as a defense thereto, and, before the judgment of the court was rendered thereon, the defendant offered to amend said plea by inserting therein what the court seemed to think was lacking, and proposed to show that the defendant then resided out of the county, and was sick, when the court held that no person but the defendant himself could make the necessary affidavit to the amended plea, and struck the original plea, and entered judgment for the plaintiff. Whereupon the defendant excepted. The question made in this case is whether, when a defendant who has filed his plea in a civil case founded on contract under the provisions of § 3449 of the Code, and afterwards resides out of the county, his agent or attorney at law can make the necessary affidavit to an amended plea. In our judgment he may do so—the amended plea is as much within the reason and spirit of the statute as the original plea, especially when the original plea is so defective as to authorize the court to strike it."

ante, 1) the complaint was verified by an agent of the plaintiff by a signed affidavit reading in part: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is the agent of said plaintiff, that he has read the foregoing petition, and knows the contents thereof, and that the facts therein stated are true." Section 5654, Snyder's Compiled Laws, provides as follows: "Where the affidavit [verifying a pleading] is made by the agent or attorney, it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only: (1) When the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. (2) When the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned. (3) When the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney. (4) When the party is not a resident of, or is absent from the county." The section last quoted was one of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure at the time of the commencement of the action, but another act (Snyder's Comp. Laws, § 6455) in force at that time, provided as follows: "The provisions of an act entitled 'An Act to Establish a Code of Civil Procedure,' which are, in their nature, applicable to the jurisdiction and proceedings before justices, and in respect to which no special provision is made by statute, are applicable to proceedings before justices of the peace." It was held that the pleading was properly verified, since where the affidavit of an agent or attorney, verifying a pleading of his principal, sets forth facts which show that his authority to do so is warranted by either of the four classes specified in the statute, a sufficient reason is thereby set forth why the party himself did not verify the pleading.

In Dyer v. Winston (1903) 33 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 77 S. W. 227, an action for commissions alleged to be due for the sale of land, it was held that under a statute (Rev. Stat. art. 5) the affidavit of the defendant's answer might be made by an attorney.

In Bergh v. Poupard (1842) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 5, a motion for the appointment of a receiver on a creditor's bill, the motion was opposed on the ground that the jurat did not state the person verifying the bill to be the agent or attorney of the complainants. The 110th rule of the court required bills of this description to be verified by the oath of the complainant, or, in case of his absence from the state, or other sufficient cause shown, by the oath of his agent or attorney. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the bill was verified by the oath of the complainant's solicitor (as opposed to agent), the court saying: "Where the bill is verified by the complainant's agent, who is not also the solicitor of the complainant, the jurat should state the person verifying to be the agent of the complainant; but where, as in the present case, it is verified by the oath of the complainant's solicitor, the court will take notice of that fact from the record and proceedings in the cause."

In Knapp, S. & Co. v. Standley (1891) 45 Mo. App. 264, an attachment suit, it was held that verification of an interplea by the attorneys for the interpleaders was sufficient.

In Treadwell v. Fassett (1854) 10 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 184, it was held that, while the rule adopted by the Code with respect to the verification of pleadings is that it shall be made by the party, it may be made by an agent or attorney where all the material allegations of the pleading are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney, or where the party is incapable of making the affidavit.

And in Kinografen v. Henius (1914) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 980, it appeared that under a rule of court the verification of a statement of claim could be made by an agent of the party in a proper case, and especially where the affiant was the agent of a foreign client.

In Reid v. Christy (1856) 2 Phila. (Pa.) 144, on certiorari to remove a proceeding before two aldermen to obtain possession of demised premises, oath to be taken by an attorney for reasons appearing in the order and on the face of the oath itself. Re Glass (1902) 119 Fed. 509.

But where the statute requires the affidavit of verification to be made by the party, it cannot be made by an agent or attorney. Walker v. Byers (1853) 14 Ark. 247; Wilson v. Menagh (1916) 201 Ill. App. 437; Warman v. First Nat. Bank (1900) 185 Ill. 60, 49 L.R.A. 412, 57 N. E. 60; DeAtley v. Senior (1880) 55 Md. 483.

Thus in Wilson v. Menagh (1916) 201 Ill. App. 437, an action on a promissory note signed by the defendant, it was held that the affidavit of merits which puts in issue the indorsement of a note must be signed by a party to the action, as provided by statute (Practice Act, § 52) and that the signature of the defendant's agent was not sufficient.

And in Walker v. Byers (Ark.) supra, although the pleading in question was not verified either by the party or attorney, the court stated that every claim or demand against a decedent's estate, in whatever manner asserted, must be authenticated by the affidavit of the claimant as provided by the statute, because in no other way can a claim be exhibited in accordance with the statute to prevent its being forever barred, from which it would appear that an agent or attorney of the party could not verify such claim.

In Warman v. First Nat. Bank (1900) 185 Ill. 60, 49 L.R.A. 412, 57 N. E. 6, suit brought by the indorsee bank against the makers of two promissory notes, indorsed by the payee and discounted with the indorsee, a plea of the general issue was verified by an agent of the defendants by a signed affidavit stating that the affiant, "being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is agent of the above-named defendants in this behalf; that said defendants have a just and meritorious defense to the whole of plaintiff's demand; that he has read the foregoing plea and knows the contents thereof, and verily believes the same to be true." The statute (Practice Act, § 34) required that the affidavit necessary to put a party upon proof of the execution of an instrument sued on, if to a plea, be the affidavit of the defendant. Under the proviso of the statute the party making such affidavit must still be a party to the suit. It was held that the agent's verification was insufficient, because the defendants alone could, within the meaning of the statute, make an affidavit that they did not so execute them, and that the proviso did not support the contention that under it the affidavit was sufficient.

In DeAtley v. Senior (1880) 55 Md. 483, an affidavit filed with the declaration, and made by a person stated to be the plaintiff's bookkeeper, was held to be insufficient and not in compliance with the act (Act 1864) which provides a special proceeding by which a plaintiff, by taking certain prescribed steps, is allowed to get a judgment against his debtor sooner than by the usual mode. The 7th section of that act provides: "In any action brought for any of the causes mentioned in the last preceding section, the plaintiff, if he make affidavit or affirmation as hereinafter stated, shall be entitled to judgment on the first day of the term of the court in which said action is pending, or at the return day next succeeding the appearance of the defendant, whichever shall first happen or occur, although the defendant may have pleaded; unless such plea contains a good defense, and unless the defendant or someone in his behalf shall make oath or affirmation that said plea is true, and that he verily believes that he will be able at the trial of the cause to produce evidence in support of said plea." By the 8th section of the act, this affidavit of the plaintiff must be made at the time of bringing the suit; and the contention of the appellant's counsel is that, by the express language of these 7th and 8th sections, this affidavit is to be made by the plaintiff, and can be made by no one else. It was so held.

See also Squires v. Chillicothe (1886) 89 Mo. 226, 1 S. W. 23, wherein it was held that an application for change of venue must be verified by the plaintiff, and that a verification by the plaintiff's father was insufficient.

It is generally provided by the statutes governing the verification of pleadings that an agent or attorney may verify a pleading founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only when the instrument is in the possession of the attorney or agent. Cropsey v. Wiggernhorn (1873) 3 Neb. 108; Wheeler v. Chesley (1862) 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 441; Lefevre v. Latson (1852) 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 650; Treadwell v. Fassett (1854) 10 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 184; Rose v. Creutz (1859) 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 109; Purdon v. Carrington (1877) 31 Ohio St. 168; Bates v. Pike (1859) 9 Wis. 224; Halfhill v. Malick (1911) 145 Wis. 200, 129 N. W. 1086. See post, III. d, as to the sufficiency of the statement in the verification of the existence of the facts authorizing verification by attorney.

In Rose v. Creutz (1859) 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 109, it was held that a petition in an action to recover money rent under a written lease which is in the possession of the plaintiff's attorney may be verified by the attorney, since such an instrument, when sued on for money rent only, is a written instrument for the payment of money only, within the terms of the statute (Code, § 113).

An attorney or agent may, under the Ohio statute (2 Bates's Anno. Stat. § 5109), verify a complaint founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money, which is in the possession of the agent or attorney. Halfhill v. Malick (Wis.) supra.

In Bates v. Pike (1859) 9 Wis. 224, the verification was made by one of the attorneys of the appellants, who stated that he had read the complaint, and knew the contents thereof, and that the same was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief, and that, as to those matters, he believed it to be true; and that the knowledge of the deponent, and the grounds of his belief of the truth of the complaint, were founded upon the fact that the bill of exchange was in the possession of Johnson & Cameron, the attorneys of the appellants, of which firm he was one; and that the reason that the affidavit of verification was not made by the appellants, or one of them, was that the appellants were nonresidents of the state, and without the county of La Crosse, and that their affidavits could not be procured." The verification was held sufficient, and in compliance with the requirements of the existing statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 125, § 19).

In Cropsey v. Wiggernhorn (Neb.) supra, a suit on a promissory note and mortgage, the petition was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys, his signed affidavit reading as follows: [Affiant], "being sworn, says he is one of the attorneys of the above-named . . . plaintiff herein, duly authorized in the premises; that the above pleading of [plaintiff] is founded upon a written instrument, for the payment of money only, and is now in the possession of this affiant, and that the facts and allegations in the foregoing pleading of [plaintiff] are true as affiant believes." The Code (§ 120) provided "that when the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney, only: First. Where the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. Second. Where the plaintiff is an infant or of unsound mind. Third. Where the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in possession of the agent or attorney. Fourth. Where the party is not a resident of, or is absent from the county." Gen. Stat. § 543). And by another provision it was declared: "The distinction between actions at law, and suits in equity, and the form of all such actions and suits heretofore existing, are abolished, and in their place shall be but one form of action to be called a civil action." Gen. Stat. § 524. It was contended that an attorney holding an instrument for the payment of money cannot verify the pleading where relief is sought in equity. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since in all cases, either in law or equity, an agent or attorney, having in his possession, as such agent or attorney, an instrument for the payment of money only, may verify a pleading where such instrument causes the substantive cause of action, the court saying: "The object of requiring pleadings to be verified by oath of the party, his agent or attorney, is to secure, as far as possible, a correct statement of the cause of action or defense, and no greater proof is required of either party in consequence thereof. All fictitious issues are abolished. A party is required to set forth, in ordinary and concise language, his cause of action or defense, and his prayer for such relief as he thinks himself entitled to. In this case we are asked to hold that an attorney holding an instrument for the payment of money, where relief is sought in equity, cannot verify the pleading. We cannot give so narrow a construction to the Code, and must hold that in all cases an agent or attorney, having in his possession as such agent or attorney such instrument for the payment of money, may verify a pleading, where such instrument constitutes the substantive cause of action, and this is true whether the relief is sought at law or in equity."

But in Purdon v. Carrington (1877) 31 Ohio St. 168, it was held that a mortgage given to secure the payment of a promissory note was not a "written instrument for the payment of money only," within the meaning of the statute (Code, § 13), and that in an action based on a mortgage a pleading could not be verified by an agent or attorney of the party, though the instrument was in his possession.

3. Action for injunction.

A bill for injunction may be verified by an agent or attorney or third person acquainted with the facts, or who gives a reason therefor. Woodworth v. Edwards (1847) 3 Woodb. & M. 120, Fed. Cas. No. 18,014; Orme v. McPherson (1867) 36 Ga. 571; Boston Mercantile Co. v. Ould-Carter Co. (1905) 123 Ga. 458, 51 S. E. 466; Salmon v. Claggett (1828) 3 Bland, Ch.

(Md.) 125; Binney's Case (1829) 2 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 100; Nusbaum v. Stein (1858) 12 Md. 315; My Maryland Lodge v. Adt (1905) 100 Md. 238, 68 L.R.A. 752, 59 Atl. 721; Youngblood v. Schamp (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 42; Hatch v. Eustaphie (1839) Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 63; Edrington v. Allsbrooks (1858) 21 Tex. 186. See also Coale v. Chase (1827) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 137; Bank of Orleans v. Skinner (1841) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 305.

In Woodworth v. Edwards (Fed.) supra, a bill in chancery praying for an injunction, it was held that if the principal was not in a situation to swear to it the oath, if required, might be made by an attorney.

It would seem that a bill for injunction may be verified by an agent of the plaintiff who was privy to the transaction, the plaintiff being a foreigner and resident abroad. Salmon v. Claggett (1828) 3 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 125.

The bill in an action for an injunction is usually sworn to by the complainants, or one of them; but if complainant is absent, or his affidavit for any reason cannot be procured, it may be sworn to by his attorney, or by any person acquainted with the facts. Youngblood v. Schamp (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 42.

In Edrington v. Allsbrooks (1858) 21 Tex. 186, a petition for injunction was verified by the attorney for the petitioners. A statute (Hart. Dig. 1846, art. 1597) declared that the petition shall be verified by the oath of the party. Another statute (Act of January 11, 1856) gives to the affidavit made by the attorney the same force and effect as if made by the principal. It was held that while under the first provision it might have been doubted whether the attorney, though fully cognizant of the facts, could by his oath have satisfied the law, the latter act was substantially an addition to the provision cited from the earlier act.

An affidavit verifying a petition for injunction made by the general manager of the plaintiff's business, and which explicitly stated "that the matters and things set forth in the foregoing petition are within his knowledge, and are true as therein stated," was a sufficient verification, as against the objection that it was made by a person other than the plaintiff himself. My Maryland Lodge v. Adt (1905) 100 Md. 238, 68 L.R.A. 752, 59 Atl. 721.

A bill for an injunction may be verified by the affidavit of plaintiff's agent, if the plaintiff is not a resident of the state. Binney's Case (1829) 2 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 100.

In Hatch v. Eustaphie (1839) Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 68, the court stated that an oath to the complainant's bill is held to be well made by his solicitor, or other agent, if he gives a sufficient reason in his jurat why the complainant is not himself sworn, as is the every-day practice in allowing injunctions upon creditors' bills.

Although the court, in its discretion, may require the verification of an application for a ne exeat, an agent may verify if he can of his own knowledge state the facts as positively and distinctly as is required of the complainant. Orme v. McPherson (1867) 36 Ga. 571.

In Nusbaum v. Stein (1858) 12 Md. 315, a suit for injunction, it was suggested that the affidavit of a clerk might be sufficient.

In Boston Mercantile Co. v. Ould-Carter Co. (1905) 123 Ga. 458, 51 S. E. 466, it was held that a petition for injunction and for the appointment of a receiver was sufficiently verified by the attorney for the plaintiff by an affidavit to the effect that he knew the recitals of fact to be true, the statute (Civ. Code, § 4966) requiring that "petitions for a restraining order, injunction, receiver, or other extraordinary equitable relief should be verified positively by the petitioner, or supported by other satisfactory proofs."

However, in Bank of Orleans v. Skinner (1841) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 305, a bill filed before the vice chancellor to call certain trustees to account, and for an injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver, was verified by the attorney for the plaintiff corporation, who stated therein "that he has read the bill and knows the contents thereof; that he has information as to all the matters stated therein; that a number of the material and important facts stated in the bill, and the principal part thereof, he knows of his own knowledge to be true; and that he believes all the statements in the bill are true." It was held that counsel for the bank, if better acquainted with the facts, was a proper person to verify the bill if he could swear to the material allegations therein as matters of his own knowledge, but that his affidavit annexed to the bill was defective in not stating what matters in the bill were within his own knowledge, and what were founded on his belief only, derived from the information of others. And in Coale v. Chase (1827) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 137, it was held that when the affidavit is made by a third party, if any material allegation or charge in the bill for injunction which is necessary to be sworn to positively is not within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney who verifies the bill, he should, in addition to his own verification, annex to the bill an affidavit of the person from whom he derived his information.

4. Action to enforce mechanic's lien.

By direct provisions of a Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 6236) a statement of claim for a mechanic's lien may be verified by the oath of the person claiming the lien, or by his agent, or by one having knowledge of the facts. Nordine v. Knutson (1895) 62 Minn. 264, 64 N. W. 565.

5. Plea of non est factum.

It has been held that a plea of non est factum may be verified by an agent or attorney. Brown v. Ferrell (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 687; Eborn v. Zimpelman (1877) 47 Tex. 503, 26 Am. Rep. 315.

Thus, in Brown v. Ferrell (Tex.) supra, a plea of non est factum as to certain receipts for money was verified by the affidavit of an agent, who transacted all the business in question, and in the plea of non est factum the affiant swore to all the matters therein set out. It was held that the verification was sufficient and that the agent might have verified the plea even if she had not attended to all the business, if it did not appear that the principal objected.

The affidavit which must accompany a plea of non est factum by an administrator may be made by the agent or attorney of the administrator in a proper case. Eborn v. Zimpelman (Tex.) supra.

In Adamson v. Reagin (1915) 143 Ga. 306, 84 S. E. 965, in response to certified questions, it was said in the official headnote that an attorney at law of a defendant who does not reside in the county in which the suit is pending may make the required oath to a plea of non est factum to the best of his knowledge and belief, under the statute (Act of March 4, 1869, Civ. Code, § 5642) which provided: "In all civil cases founded on contract where there is an issuable defense, and where the defendant does not reside in the county in which suit is pending, it shall and may be lawful for the agent or attorney at law of such defendant to make oath to the plea, and the same shall be as good and sufficient as if made by the defendant himself." The second section provided that "when the plea is filed on the oath of the agent or attorney at law of the defendant, he may swear that what is contained in such plea is true, according to the best of his knowledge and belief." In Adamson v. Reagin (1915) 17 Ga. App. 126, 86 S. E. 455, it was accordingly said in the official headnote that, under the ruling of the supreme court as stated in the preceding paragraph, the trial court properly allowed the attorney of the defendant who did not live in the county in which the suit was pending to verify a plea of non est factum on her knowledge and belief.

However, in Fowler v. Gate City Nat. Bank (1891) 88 Ga. 29, 13 S. E. 831, it is stated in the official headnote that the verification of a plea of non est factum must be by the affidavit of the defendant, and not an agent, and that the exception to this rule, if any, was to be found in § 3449 of the Code.

6. Affidavit for attachment.

It is held that an affidavit for attachment may be made by an agent or attorney of the plaintiff. National Park Bank v. Whitmore (1886) 104 N. Y. 297, 10 N. E. 524, wherein an affidavit of attachment by the assistant cashier of the plaintiff corporation, positive in its statement that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum mentioned, was held to be sufficient.

See also Bates v. Robinson (1859) 8 Iowa, 318, wherein one of the attorneys of the plaintiff verified the petition although he did not sign it, the clerk certifying that the attorney had made oath that the matter and things stated in the petition were true. It was held that while there was no clear ground on which it could be held to be essential that the affiant in an affidavit for attachment should state his means of knowledge, it was the better practice and desirable in all cases where the oath was made by one not a party, or one not presumed to have the information, to state his means of knowledge.

7. Plea in abatement.

By the weight of authority an agent or attorney may verify a plea in abatement. Prim v. Davis (1841) 2 Ala. 24; Atwood v. Higgins (1884) 76 Me. 423; Geck v. Shepherd (1859) 1 N. M. 346; Bank of Tennessee v. Anderson (1856) 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 669; Bank of Tennessee v. Jones (1852) 1 Swan (Tenn.) 391; Carter v. Vaulx (1853) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 639; Carlisle v. Cowan (1886) 85 Tenn. 165, 2 S. W. 26; Cheatham v. Pearce (1890) 89 Tenn. 668, 15 S. W. 1080.

In Prim v. Davis (Ala.) supra, an action of debt on a bail bond executed by the defendant to a sheriff, there was a plea in abatement which commenced and concluded as a plea to the jurisdiction. The plea was signed by counsel and verified by another person. The statute which required pleas in abatement to be verified by oath did not specify by whom the verification should be made. It was held that the verification by one who was not the defendant was not irregular, and that the court could not say that by such a practice an undue facility was given to pleas of this description.

In Atwood v. Higgins (1884) 76 Me. 423, an action of tort wherein the defendant filed a plea of coverture in abatement, the plea was verified by the attorney and agent, who signed it on his own responsibility with the purpose of binding his own conscience, and there were no facts stated in the plea which might not be within his own knowledge. It was held that the verification was good.

In Geck v. Shepherd (1859) 1 N. M. 346, an action of trespass and false imprisonment, it was objected that it was not competent for the attorney of the defendant to make the oath required to a plea in abatement. A statute (Rev. Code, p. 178) declared that all pleas in abatement, except pleas to the jurisdiction as to the subject-matter, should be under oath. It was held that the plea might be regarded as a plea to the local jurisdiction, and not as to the subject-matter, and as such was required to be sworn to, but as the act did not say that the oath could be made only by the party, and as all acts of this kind are to be construed liberally, it followed that the oath could be made by a third person.

In Bank of Tennessee v. Anderson (1856) 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 669, an action of debt against the maker and indorsees of a promissory note, it was held that a plea in abatement may be verified by an agent.

In Bank of Tennessee v. Jones (1852) 1 Swan (Tenn.) 391, an action of assumpsit against the defendants as drawers and indorsers of a bill of exchange, the defendant's plea in abatement was verified by a third person, his affidavit stating "that he is informed and believes that the above plea is true in substance and matter of fact." The statute (Act of 1794, chap. 1, § 26) declared that no plea in abatement shall be received, unless the party offering the same shall prove the truth of such plea. It was held, under this provision of the statute, the affidavit could be made by the attorney or agent of the defendant, if the facts constituting the foundation of the plea were within his personal knowledge, but that the affidavit verifying such plea must be positive as to the truth of every fact contained in

A plea in abatement may be verified by an agent or attorney, if the facts stated within the plea are within his personal knowledge. Carter v. Vaulx (1858) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 639.

In Carlisle v. Cowan (1886) 85 Tenn. 165, 2 S. W. 26, an action on an attachment bond, it was held that a plea in abatement could be verified by the agent or attorney of the defendant and before any other persons within the state authorized to administer oaths, it not being necessary that the pleas should be verified before the court where the suit was pending.

In Cheatham v. Pearce (1890) 89 Tenn. 668, 15 S. W. 1080, it was held that the verification of a plea in abatement by the solicitor of the defendants was sufficient where the affidavit was that the facts in the plea are true "in substance and in fact," and that the affiant is acquainted with the facts, the court saying: "It was held in Bank of Tennessee v. Jones (Tenn.) supra, that a plea in abatement may be sworn to by an attorney or agent of the defendant, if the facts constituting the foundation of the plea be within his personal knowledge. See also Carter v. Vaulx (1858) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 641; Bank of Tennessee v. Anderson (1856) 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 672; Carlisle v. Cowan (1886) 85 Tenn. 170, 2 S. W. 26; Klepper v. Powell (1871) 6 Heisk (Tenn.) 508. In the case last cited it was said that it was not necessary that the fact of agency should be stated in the affidavit, and that the essential requirement is that the truth of the plea shall be verified by someone who is willing to swear that it is true. Mr. Dickinson [the solicitor] swears that the facts in the plea are true 'in substance and in fact,' which complies with the rule that the affidavit must be positive in form. Wrompelmair v. Moses (1874) 3 Baxt. (Tenn.) 470; Trabue v. Higden (1867) 4 Coldw. (Tenn.) 623; Bank of Tennessee v. Jones (1851) 1 Swan (Tenn.) 392; Seifreid v. People's Bank (1873) 2 Tenn. Ch. 18. He furthermore swears that he is acquainted with the facts. We think that his verification of the plea was sufficient."

In Huthsing v. Maus (1865) 36 Mo. 101, it was held that the affidavit of truth in support of a plea in abatement made by an agent of the party was defective, and should have been made by the party under the statute concerning change of venue in civil cases, which evidently contemplates that the application should be made by the party himself and expressly requires that he "shall annex thereto an affidavit to the truth of the petition," and makes no provision for this oath being taken by an agent, especially in view of the fact that it is expressly provided in criminal cases that the affidavit may be made by an agent.

However, in Norvell v. Porter (1876) 62 Mo. 309, an attachment suit, it was held that the affidavit of the attorney was a sufficient verification plea in abatement under the statute providing that "all pleadings and other proceedings in attachment causes shall conform to, and be governed as near as may be by, the law regulating the practice in courts of justice in civil cases." The court said: "Under this provision it was clearly competent for the attorney to make the necessary affidavit, as it would certainly be in matters arising during the progress of any other civil case."

In at least two jurisdictions it appears that a plea in abatement must be verified by the party. Colquitt v. Mercer (1871) 44 Ga. 432; Bancroft v. Eastman (1845) 7 Ill. 259.

In Colquitt v. Mercer (Ga.) supra, an action on an open account, a plea to the jurisdiction verified by the defendant's counsel was struck out because it was not verified by the defendant. The statute (Code, § 3410) provided that a plea to the jurisdiction must be pleaded in person and (§ 3412) must be sworn to. By a later statute (of 1869) it was provided that in suits upon contracts, if the defendant is not a resident of the county, "issuable" pleas may be sworn to by the attorney. But it was held that a plea to the jurisdiction was not an issuable plea under this Act of 1869, nor under the provision of the Constitution of 1868; that in suits upon contracts the court shall give judgment without the intervention of a jury, where an issuable defense is not filed under oath (Const. art. 5, II. 3).

In Bancroft v. Eastman (Ill.) supra, an action of assumpsit commenced by capias, under a statute (Rev. Laws 59, § 1) providing that the party offering a dilatory plea "shall file an affidavit of the truth thereof," it was held that the plea in abatement must be offered by the defendant himself and cannot be made by a third person, and that this was the intention of the legislature is shown by an essential change in the language made in a subsequent statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 5, § 1), providing "that no plea in abatement shall be received in any court in this state, unless the party offering the same, or some other person for him, file an affidavit of the truth thereof."

b. Public officer.

It would seem that a public officer may at times verify a pleading on information and belief only, and that the public officer best acquainted with the facts will be allowed to verify the pleadings. Estill County v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (1891) 91 Ky. 349, 15 S. W. 862; Corpenny v. Sedalia (1874) 57 Mo. 88; Atty. Gen. v. Bank of Columbia (1829) 1 Paige (N. Y.) 511; State v. Port Royal & A. R. Co. (1895) 45 S. C. 470, 23 S. E. 383.

In the case last cited, an action by stockholders asking that their corporation should be required to resume the exercise of its duty, etc., the complaint was verified by the attorney general who stated that the complaint and information were "true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information, and as to those matters he believes [them] to be true." The verification was held to be sufficient.

In Corpenny v. Sedalia (1874) 57 Mo. 88, an action for damages by a property owner against a municipal corporation, it was held that an application for change of venue was sufficient if sworn to by the city attorney rather than by the mayor or other chief officers, since, while the service of a writ of summons must be had on the chief officer of the corporation, this resulted from express statutory provisions, and it did not follow that he was the proper person to make an affidavit for change of venue.

Atty. Gen. v. Bank of Columbia (1829) 1 Paige (N. Y.) 511, was an action by the attorney general against an insolvent bank. By a statute (Act of April, 1825 [Sess. Laws 1825, chap. 325, § 17]) it was made the duty of the attorney general, whenever any incorporated bank is insolvent and unable to pay its debts, to apply to this court for an injunction, restraining the officers of the institution from exercising any of the privileges and franchises granted by their charter, and from collecting or receiving any debts, and from paying out or in any way transferring any of the moneys or effects of such company; and to appoint a receiver of its property, moneys, and effects, and to distribute the same among its fair and honest creditors. The information was verified by the attorney general and the comptroller, who stated their belief that the bank was insolvent and unable to pay its debts, and thereupon an injunction was granted, which was in force at time of hearing in appellate court. The court held that the attorney general had done all that could be done by him in any case to satisfy the court that the bank was insolvent, since no one could swear positively to the insolvency of the institution except its officers, against whom the proceeding was instituted, and the statement of the foregoing facts was all that could reasonably be called for under this part of the statute.

In Estill County v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (1891) 91 Ky. 349, 15 S. W. 862, an action brought by a county to enjoin the delivery of certain bonds, it appeared that the county judge refused to verify the petition. It was held that, although the statute (Civ. Code, § 117, subsec. 2) provided that the petition of a county must be verified by its chief officer residing in the county, or, if there is no such officer residing in the county, it may be verified by its attorney, if the county judge refused to verify, the county attorney had the right to verify, and if he should refuse, some person authorized to order the action instituted should be permitted to verify the petition, to prevent a failure of justice.

In Combs v. Breathitt County (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 809, 38 S. W. 138, 39 S. W. 33, an action by a county against the sheriff and his sureties on the sheriff's bond, for revenue alleged to have been collected by that officer and not paid over, it was held that the county judge was the proper person to verify the petition, under the rule requiring the verification of a pleading.

1. Domestic corporation.

(a) In general.

Since a corporation itself cannot make an oath, its pleadings must of necessity be verified by a natural person who is a representative of the corporation, and the right of a person to verify a pleading for a domestic corporation depends on whether he is within one of the particular classes of persons named in the statute as proper parties to verify for a corporation.

Where a bill for an injunction is filed by a corporation, the officer or other person who has the principal personal knowledge of the facts should swear to them. Youngblood v. Schamp (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 42.

An answer may be verified by the president, or the secretary, or by the attorney of a corporation. John T.

Noye Mfg. Co. v. Wheaton Roller-Mill Co. (1895) 60 Minn. 117, 61 N. W. 910.

By direct provision of a Kansas statute (Civ. Code, § 112) when a municipal or other corporation is a party the verification may be made by an officer thereof, its agent or attorney. Hornick v. Union P. R. Co. (1911) 85 Kan. 568, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 826, 118 Pac. 60, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 208.

In Forbes Lithograph Co. v. Winter (1895) 107 Mich. 116, 64 N. W. 1053, it was held that the affidavit of account which stated that the affiant was the treasurer of the company sufficiently showed his authority to verify.

When a bill for injunction is filed by a corporation, an officer thereof or other person who has personal knowledge of the facts should swear to them. Fowble v. Kemp (1901) 92 Md. 630, 48 Atl. 379.

When a corporation is a party the verification of a pleading under the statute (Practice Act, § 55) may be made by an officer thereof. Heintzelman v. L'Amoureux (1867) 3 Nev. 377.

Under the Maryland statute (Act of 1864) the pleas of a corporation must be verified by the oath of some natural person capable of making an affidavit, as a corporation is incapable of making an oath. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Hoeske (1870) 32 Md. 317.

In First Nat. Bank v. Sanders Bros. (1915) 162 Ky. 374, 172 S. W. 689, it was held that an affidavit for a warning order, as well as the affidavit for an attachment, must be made by the chief officer or agent of the corporation if such officer is in the county at the time, and that, if made by any other person, it is invalid, unless it shows the connection which the party making it has with the corporation, and that the officer whose duty it is to make it is then absent from the county. The court, in construing the various Code provisions on which its decision was based, said: "The affidavit for the warning order in these cases, as well as the affidavit upon which the order of attachment seems to have been obtained, were embraced in the petition filed, and which were sworn to by the cashier of the appellant bank, and this seems to be the only affidavit in the case. Section 117 of the Civil Code, subsec. 2, provides 'that the pleadings of a private corporation must be verified by its chief officer, or agent, upon whom a summons in an action is or might be lawfully served if the corporation were a defendant, or, if it has no such officer or agent residing in the county in which the action is brought or is pending, it may be verified by its attorney.' Section 550 of the Civil Code provides 'that any affidavit which this Code requires and authorizes a party to make may, unless otherwise expressed, be made by its attorney or agent, if he be absent from the county,' and subsection 5 of § 550 provides that the affidavit of an agent or attorney must state the absence from the county of the party or parties for whom it is made, and the fact that the affiant is agent or attorney. In Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr (1898) 102 Ky. 586, 44 S. W. 216, this court held 'that, when an agent or attorney makes an affidavit for a corporation, it must be stated that the officer of the corporation, who, if in the county, should verify the pleadings, is absent.' Section 732 of the Civil Code, subsec. 33, defines the chief officer of a corporation which has any of the officers or agents therein mentioned: First, its president; second, its vice president; third, its secretary and librarian; fourth, its cashier and treasurer; fifth, its clerk; sixth, its managing agent. . . . The affidavit in this case shows the connection which the affiant had with the appellant-plaintiff, but it fails to show that the president of the corporation, who is its chief officer, was absent from the county."

A statute requiring a written instrument sued on to be questioned by a plea verified by affidavit applies to those cases where the instrument has been executed by one professing to be the agent of a corporation, and who would be competent to take the oath which the statute requires. Gainesville Female Academy v. Brown (1842) 3 Ala. 326.

By express provision of the Arkansas statute which, in general, requires one who has a claim against the estate of a deceased person to authenticate his claim by his own affidavit, when authentication is made in behalf of a corporation, or by an executor, administrator, or assignee, a special affidavit is declared to be sufficient, and when a debt is due a corporation the cashier or treasurer is to make the affidavit. Beirne v. Imboden (1853) 14 Ark. 237.

Agent.

In H. G. Bittleston Law & Collection Agency v. Howard (1916) 172 Cal. 357, 156 Pac. 515, the complaint was verified by the plaintiff corporation's assignor, who was not an officer of the corporation. It was held that the clause in the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) providing for verification of a pleading by an officer when the corporation is a party is not exclusive, but is permissive only, and does not exclude an attorney or other person from making the verification in a proper case, since the clause is qualified by the preceding part of the section, and is not to be construed as meaning that only the officers of a corporation can verify the pleadings thereof.

In Moline, M. & S. Co. v. Curtis (1893) 38 Neb. 520, 57 N. W. 161, an action aided by an attachment, the original affidavit on which the attachment was issued was verified by the plaintiff's agent. The signed affidavit read as follows: "The said plaintiff, the Moline, Milburn, & Stoddard Company, makes oath that the claim in this action is for a recovery of a judgment for money in the sum of $975 and 36/100, and the said S. W. Croy, agent of the Moline, Milburn, & Stoddard Company, also makes oath that said claim is just, and that the Moline, Milburn, & Stoddard Company ought, as affiant believes, to recover thereon $975 and 36/100. He also makes oath that the said Harrison J. Curtis, Henry B. Curtis, and Mary E. Curtis, parties composing the firm of H. J. Curtis & Company, defendants, are about to convert their property, or a part thereof, into money, for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of their creditors; that said Harrison J. Curtis, Henry B. Curtis, and Mary E. Curtis have property and rights in action which they conceal; that the said Harrison J. Curtis, Henry B. Curtis, and Mary E. Curtis have assigned, removed, and disposed of, and they are about to dispose of, their property, or a part thereof, with intent to defraud their creditors. S. W. Croy, agent for Moline, Milburn, & Stoddard Company." It was held that although the affidavit in the opening clause relating to the nature of the plaintiff's claim, standing alone, purported to be that of the corporation, yet when read in connection with what follows, and necessarily construing the paper as a whole, it sufficiently appeared that an agent of the corporation makes oath to each averment contained in the affidavit, and that he is the plaintiff's agent, and that the amendment to the original affidavit, by inserting "affiant, secretary and treasurer of," after the word "plaintiffs," was permissible and cured the alleged defect.

Under the direct provisions of the North Carolina statute (Code, § 258, as amended by Acts 1901, chap. 610), where a corporation is a party, verification of any pleading may be made by a "managing or local agent thereof," as well as by an officer, who alone was authorized formerly to make verification in such cases. Godwin v. Carolina Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1904) 136 N. C. 258, 67 L.R.A. 251, 103 Am. St. Rep. 941, 48 S. E. 636, 1 Ann. Cas. 203.

Attorney.

In Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Southern Invest. Co. (1907) 53 Fla. 832, 44 So. 351, 13 Ann. Cas. 18, it appeared that an affidavit verifying a bill of injunction was positive and direct to all the allegations of the bill, which were sworn to be true by the solicitor of the complainant. It was contended that "the bill is not sworn to by any authorized officer or proper representative of complainant." It was held that such an affidavit by counsel for defendant was sufficient.

In Tulloch v. Belleville Pump & S. Works (1892) 17 Colo. 579, 31 Pac.

229, an action on a promissory note, the verification of the complaint was by an attorney for the plaintiff, his signed affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant] on his oath doth depose and say that he is the attorney for the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that each and every person authorized by the statute to make this verification is absent from the state and county, and therefore deponent makes the same; that he has read the foregoing and annexed complaint and knows the contents of the same, and that it is true to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was contended that the verification was imperfect under the statute (Code, § 61), which provides, in substance, that where a pleading is verified it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the party is absent from the county where the attorney resides, or from some cause is unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same, and that when a pleading is verified by the attorney, or any other person except one of the parties, the affidavit must state the reasons why it is not made by one of the parties. It was held that while the verification was not in accordance with this section of the Code, it was sufficient under another statute (Code, § 62), which determines the manner in which a pleading by a corporation may be verified, providing that, when a corporation is a party, the pleading may be verified by any officer, stockholder, agent, superintendent or attorney thereof, and shall state that the facts stated in the pleadings are true to the best knowledge and belief of such affiant, the court saying: "This action having been brought by a corporation, the verification is to be determined by the last section mentioned. An examination of the verification will show that, while it is not a model, it contains everything required in such cases by the Code as amended, and must therefore be held sufficient. In fact the provision with reference to verification by a corporation is not to be found in the original Code, it having been inserted by amendment after its adoption to cover cases like the one at bar."

In Trenton Bkg. Co. v. Haverstick (1829) 11 N. J. L. 171, a writ of foreign attachment was verified by the plaintiff's attorney by an affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant] . . . saith that he is the attorney of the Trenton Banking Company, and that William Haverstick, the person against whom an attachment is about to issue at the suit of the Trenton Banking Company, is not, to the knowledge or belief of this deponent, resident at this time in the state of New Jersey; and that the said William Haverstick owes to the said Trenton Banking Company, the sum of $475.82½." The 1st section of the statute for the relief of creditors against absconding and absent debtors (Rev. Laws, p. 355) prescribed the form of the oath or affirmation in respect to an absconding debtor; and directed the same to be made by the creditor himself, before any judge of any court of record of this state, or justice of the peace of any county in the same. The 2d section provided that if the creditor be absent or reside out of this state, then his agent or attorney may make oath or affirmation to the same effect, and deliver it to the clerk to be filed, who shall thereupon issue such writ of attachment. The 26th section of the statute, which authorized the writ of foreign attachment, required a uniformity of procedure in all respects, except where the statute otherwise provided, or the nature of the thing compelled a diversity; enacting that "the rights and credits, moneys and effects, goods and chattels, lands and tenements of every debtor who may reside out of this state shall be liable to be attached, taken, proceeded against, sold, assigned, transferred, and conveyed for the payment of his debts, in the like manner as nearly as may be, as the rights and credits, moneys and effects, goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of other debtors are made liable by this act." In the 26th section of the statute it was also provided as follows: "If the creditor is present or resides in the state, he is regarded as the applicant for the writ. If he is absent or resides out of the state his agent or attorney may be the applicant." It was held that the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney was sufficient, since the law which gives existence to the corporation, which allows it to sue and be sued, necessarily confers on it the authority to perform by its agents, by whom alone it can act.

In Beatrice Rapid Transit & Power Co. v. German Nat. Bank (1895) 45 Neb. 147, 63 N. W. 374, the affidavit verifying the petition read as follows: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is the attorney for the plaintiff, which is a corporation; that he has read the foregoing petition and knows the contents thereof, and that the facts therein contained are true, as he verily believes." The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 120) provided that the affidavit of verification "can be made by agent or attorney only" (subd. 5), except "when a party is a corporation, in which case it may be made by the attorney, or any officer or agent upon whom a summons could be legally served." It was held that the obvious meaning of the 5th section of the Code was that verification of a pleading on behalf of corporations may be made by attorneys at law, or by any officer or agent on whom summons could be legally served, which latter class includes such agents for the above purpose as are so constituted by power of attorney, and are therefore called attorneys.

In Climax Specialty Co. v. Smith (1900) 31 Misc. 275, 64 N. Y. Supp. 42, the complaint was verified by a domestic corporation's attorney. The defendant's contention was that the pleading of a domestic corporation must be verified by an officer, and that the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525, subd. 3) had no application to pleadings interposed on behalf of domestic corporations. It also appeared from the attorney's verification that all the officers were absent from the county where the attorney resided. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since an entire reading of the entire statute (section of Code) seemed to warrant the conclusion that subd. 3 applies to all parties, whether domestic corporations or not, and, where it appeared from the attorney's verification that all the officers were absent from the county where the attorney resided, the verification should be held to be a proper one.

In Robertson v. Robertson (1919) — Ky. —, 214 S. W. 972, an action by a bank as administrator, it was held that a pleading denying the genuineness of a receipt could be verified by the bank's attorneys and by persons beneficially interested in the litigation, notwithstanding, as the court said, that the president of the bank, being in the county, was by the Code provision the only person authorized to verify a pleading for the bank, he being in fact unable to verify the pleading in question because he believed the receipt genuine.

Manager.

In Stockton Lumber Co. v. Blodgett (1906) 3 Cal. App. 94, 84 Pac. 441, a suit on a promissory note made by the defendant to the plaintiff, the complaint was verified by one stated in the affidavit to be the "manager" of the corporation plaintiff. The defendant filed an unverified answer. It was urged as a ground for reversal that the complaint was not verified "by an officer" of the corporation plaintiff. It was held that the "manager" of a corporation is an "officer" thereof.

In Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Lightsey (1915) 100 S. C. 41, 84 S. E. 301, an action brought by a corporation on a promissory note, the complaint was verified by the plaintiff's assistant district manager. The objection was that the proposed affidavit of verification was insufficient, in that it was made by another person than the party plaintiff, and failed to set forth therein his knowledge or grounds of belief on the subject. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 207) provided that "when a corporation is a party, the verification may be made by any officer thereof." The assistant district manager swore that he was an officer of the plaintiff corporation. It was held that the verification was sufficient.

In an action on a promissory note, an affidavit of defense on its face set forth a prima facie defense, and was made by the business manager of the firm. It was held that the affidavit was sufficient, since the affiant, as business manager, was an officer who must be presumed to be acquainted with the facts, and as he undertook the responsibility of swearing positively of his own knowledge, it was unnecessary for him to set forth his information and belief. Andrews v. Blue Ridge Packing Co. (1903) 206 Pa. 370, 55 Atl. 1059.

Director.

In Bigelow v. Whitehall Mfg. Co. (1879) 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 138, it was held that a verification was properly made by one of the trustees and directors of the defendant domestic corporation, since he was an "officer" of the corporation within the meaning of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525), which must be read with another statute (Code, § 431, subd. 3) in which a director is designated as a suitable officer on whom process may be served to bring his corporation into court.

In Eastham v. New York State Teleph. Co. (1903) 86 App. Div. 562, 83 N. Y. Supp. 1019, the answer of the defendant domestic corporation was verified by one of its directors. By virtue of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525) the verification of a pleading of a domestic corporation must be made by one of its officers. It was held that the verification was sufficient.

Secretary.

In Shaft v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 544, 23 Am. Rep. 138, reversing (1876) 8 Hun, 632, the petition was verified by the agent of the defendants, being its secretary. It was held that the affidavit was, in form and substance, sufficient, since it was made by the general and managing agent of the defendant, and that fact was averred in it.

In Marshall Field Co. v. Oren Ruffcorn Co. (1902) 117 Iowa, 159, 90 N. W. 116, an action seeking recovery on three promissory notes, it appeared that the statute (Code, § 3581) expressly authorized a corporation, when a party, to verify its pleadings by agent or officer, and it was held that a verification of the answer by the secretary of the company was proper.

In Masonic Ben. Assn. v. Simmons (1905) 86 Miss. 470, 38 So. 791, a suit by an administrator against heirs and a beneficial association, the answer was verified by one of the defendant's officers as secretary. The statute (Code 1892, § 534) provided that "the answer of a corporation need not be under its seal, but shall be sworn to by its president, general manager, or superintendent, or other general officer, unless an answer under oath shall . . . be waived in the bill." It was held that the affiant was a "general officer" within the contemplation of the statute, being the custodian of the records and vouchers so far as money is concerned.

In American Insulator Co. v. Bankers & M. Teleg. Co. (1885) 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 443, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 120, 13 Daly, 200, the verification was made by the secretary of the defendant, a domestic corporation, and was in the usual form as required by the Code where the pleading is verified by a party. It was contended that the verification did not state why the same was not made by a party defendant, and that it did not state the ground of the belief of the person making such verification as to the matters not stated upon his knowledge. The statute (§ 525, Code of Civil Procedure) reads as follows: "The verification must be made by the affidavit of the party, or, if there are two or more parties united in interest, and pleading together, by at least one of them who is acquainted with the facts, except as follows: (1) Where the party is a domestic corporation the verification must be made by an officer thereof. (2) Where the people of the state are, or a public officer in their behalf is a party, the verification may be made by any person acquainted with the facts. (3) Where the party is a foreign corporation; or where the party is not within the county where the attorney resides, or, if the latter is not a resident of the state, the county where he has an office, and capable of making the affidavit, or, if there are two or more parties united in interest and pleading together, where neither of them acquainted with the facts is within the county and capable of making the affidavit; or where the action or defense is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, which is in the possession of the agent or attorney; or where all the material allegations of the pleading are within the personal knowledge of the agent or the attorney; in either case the verification may be made by the agent or the attorney for the party." And § 526 provides as follows: "The affidavit of verification must be to the effect that the pleading is true to the knowledge of the deponent, except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Where it is made by a person, other than the party, he must set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief, as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge, and the reason why it is not made by the party." The section of the Code in force when the case above referred to was decided is, in part, as follows: "When the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reason why it is not made by the party. When a corporation is a party, the verification may be made by any officer thereof." While subd. 1 of § 525 applies to domestic corporations, and provides that the verification must be made by an officer thereof, it was held that the 2d paragraph of § 526 unquestionably refers to subd. 3 of § 525, and that the verification was sufficient, since, as a corporation cannot take an oath, the statute points out the way in which it must verify a pleading, and such verification is a verification by the corporation and by a party, and it is only agents or attorneys that are required, when verifying pleadings, to set forth the grounds of their belief as to all matters not stated on their knowledge, and the reason why the verification was not made by the party.

Treasurer.

In Georges Creek Coal & I. Co. v. Detmold (1848) 1 Md. Ch. 371, it was held that the truth of facts set forth in a bill of injunction was sufficiently verified by the affidavit of the treasurer of the company.

Vice president.

In Re Close (1895) 106 Cal. 574, 39 Pac. 1067, an insolvency case, it was held that under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) which provided that, when a corporation is a party, verification of a pleading may be made by any officer thereof, a vice president of a corporation is such an officer.

In Mandel v. Fidelity Trust Co. (1908) 128 Ky. 239, 107 S. W. 775, a suit brought by a corporation to settle an estate, it appeared that the affidavit for a warning order was made by a vice president of the corporation, who, by the by-laws, made one of the chief officers of the company. The statute (Code, § 58) which regulated the practice provided that the clerk shall not make the warning order until the plaintiff, or, if he be absent from the county, his agent or attorney, has made the necessary affidavit, and, if the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney, it must show the affiant's connection with the plaintiff and his absence from the county. It appeared that the vice president who verified the order was the only officer of the company who was familiar with the affairs of the trust estate of which he was seeking a settlement, and was the only one qualified to make the affidavit in question, and was in fact the chief officer of the company so far as the settlement of the estate was concerned. It was held that the affidavit made by him conformed fully to the requirements of the statute (Code, § 58).

In Kentucky Jeans Clothing Co. v. Bohn (1898) 104 Ky. 387, 47 S. W. 250, a suit by a corporation upon an account in which attachment was obtained, it appeared that the petition which contained the necessary allegations to authorize an attachment was verified by the secretary and treasurer of the corporation, and that the affidavit for attachment was sworn to by the vice president of the corporation.

It was held that the affidavit of the vice president was prima facie sufficient, there being no averment by the defendant that he was not at the time the chief officer in the county.

President.

In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchison (1882) 87 N. C. 22, the verification was by the president of the plaintiff corporation and read that the affiant "maketh oath that the plaintiff is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the United States; that he is an officer thereof, to wit, the president; and that the facts herein set forth of his own knowledge are true; those otherwise stated he believes to be true." It was objected that the verification was by an officer of the corporation, and that it should go further and set forth the source of his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject, as required by § 117 of the Code. It was held that the verification was the verification of the corporation itself, since, as a corporation cannot take an oath, as an officer, he has knowledge of the facts set forth in the complaint, and has done all that can be done, as the statute imposes no such condition upon those who verify as the officers of a corporation, only agents and attorneys being required, when swearing to the pleadings for their principals or clients to disclose their knowledge and its sources, and to explain why the verification is not made by the party.

Agent.

In Phifer v. Travellers Ins. Co. (1898) 123 N. C. 405, 31 S. E. 715, the action was on a policy of insurance. The answer was verified by a general agent of the defendant. The statute (Code, § 258) required all pleadings of a corporation to be verified by an officer thereof whenever their verification was necessary. It was admitted that the verification was invalid, the question being whether the defendant could avoid the effect of this defect in the verification.

N. W. 889, an action on a promissory note alleged to have been executed by a corporation, the answer denying the execution and delivery of the note was verified by the attorneys of the corporation on information and belief. It was held that as the statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5751) applied to instruments purporting to be executed by a corporation, as well as to those executed by natural persons, the verification did not constitute a denial under oath or affidavit, as contemplated by the statute, which required the defendant's signature or the execution of the note to be denied by his oath or affidavit.

In Bray Clothing Co. v. Shealy (1898) 53 S. C. 12, 30 S. E. 620, an action on account and to set aside certain mortgages, attachment was issued on plaintiff's ex parte application, and the defendants thereafter moved to dissolve the attachment. It appeared that the plaintiff resided in another state and one of its attorneys undertook to verify the complaint. The Code did not allow an attorney or agent to verify a complaint, but it was provided by the statute (§ 178) that "the affidavit may be also made by the agent or attorney, if the action or defense be founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument be in the possession of the agent or attorney, or if all the material allegations of the pleadings be within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney." It was held that the complaint was not verified as to the account sued on, since, although the account for goods sold was verified by an officer of the plaintiff corporation, yet the affiant could not be said, as attorney for the plaintiff, to be able to verify the complaint when this account was set up.

In Bullock Beresford Mfg. Co. v. Hedges (1907) 76 Ohio St. 91, 81 N. E. 171, the question presented was whether the petition in an action instituted by a corporation having its place of business in the county should have been stricken from the files because it was not verified by an officer of the corporation. The verification complained of was by the corporation's attorney, no reason being given why it was not verified by an officer, and no statement being made that the facts were within the personal knowledge of the attorney. This question involved the construction of two statutory provisions. The first (Rev. Stat. § 5102) read as follows: "When a corporation is the party, the verification may be made by an officer thereof, its agent or attorney." Another (§ 5109) provided that a pleading can be verified by "the agent or attorney" only, in certain cases therein named. It was held that the attorney was not authorized to verify.

In Heintzelman v. L'Amoroux (1867) 3 Nev. 377, an action on a promissory note, the answer was verified by the defendant's attorney. The signed affidavit read as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says he is one of the attorneys for the defendant the Trinity & Sacramento Silver Mining Company, one of the defendants in above action; that the foregoing answer is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on his information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true. Deponent further says the reason why this verification is not made by the defendant the Trinity & Sacramento Silver Mining Company is that said defendant is a corporation under the laws of the state of New York, and, further, that said defendant is absent from the county where the attorneys of said defendants reside." The statute (Practice Act, § 55) provided as follows: "In all cases of the verification of a pleading the affidavit of the party shall state that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on his information or belief, and as to those matters, that he believes it to be true. And where a pleading is verified, it shall be by the affidavit of the party, unless he be absent from the county where the attorney resides; or from some cause unable to verify it; or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same. When the pleading is verified by the attorney or any other person except the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit the reason why it is not made by the party. When a corporation is a party the verification may be made by an officer thereof; or when the territory, or any officer thereof in its behalf, is a party, the verification may be made by any person acquainted with the facts; except that in actions prosecuted by the attorney general or district attorney in behalf of the territory, the pleadings need not, in any case, be verified." The respondent contended and it was held that when a corporation is a party to an action it is not sufficient to show that the corporation is absent to entitle its attorney to verify a pleading, but it must be shown that all officers of the corporation are absent before the attorney can verify on the sole ground of the absence of the party whom he represents.

Stockholder.

In National City Bank v. Zimmer Vacuum Renovator Co. (1916) 132 Minn. 211, 156 N. W. 265, an action on a promissory note and a guaranty thereof, the answer of the defendant corporation was verified by a codefendant and stockholder, who stated in the verification that he was one of the defendants, that he had read the answer, and "that the facts therein set forth are true except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." The statute (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8448) provided that "every written instrument purporting to have been signed or executed by any person shall be proof that it was so signed or executed until such person shall deny the signature or execution of the same by his oath or affidavit." It was held that the answer and verification were not sufficient to devert the notes in controversy of the probative effect given them by statute.

Cashier.

In Van Horne v. Montgomery (1851) 5 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 238, the complaint was sworn to by the cashier of the bank, the affidavit stating that "he had read the complaint, and that the same was true according to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that if the cashier was to be regarded as a party the verification was insufficient under the statute (Code, § 157).

Manager.

In Meton v. Isham Wagon Co. (1888) 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 259, 4 N. Y. Supp. 215, there was a motion to set aside a judgment as by default, on the ground that the answer was not properly verified. The defendant was a domestic corporation, and the answer was verified by one who, in the affidavit of verification, swore that he was the general manager of the defendant, and that the reason of his making the affidavit of verification was that the defendant was a corporation. The statute (§ 525, subd. 1) provided that when the party was a domestic corporation the verification must be made by an officer thereof. It was held that the verification was defective in not stating that the affiant was an officer of the defendant, either expressly, or by stating the duties he performed from which it might be inferred that he was an officer of the corporation and that, while an agent qualified as provided in subd. 3 of that section may verify a pleading, setting forth his qualifications in his affidavit, none but an officer can verify a pleading in behalf of a domestic corporation. The court said it did not find the word "manager" in any definition or synonym of the word "officer" nor any statute which uses the word manager to designate an officer of a corporation, but that the nearest approach to it is found in § 431, subd. 3, authorizing service upon the president or other head of a corporation, the secretary or clerk of the corporation, the cashier, the treasurer, or a director or managing agent. In respect to this the court remarked that it was plain from this provision that the managing agent was deemed to be an officer.

Secretary.

In North Penn Iron Co. v. Boyce (1904) 71 N. J. L. 434, 58 Atl. 1094, a motion to quash a writ of attachment, the writ was verified by the secretary of the plaintiff corporation, and it did not appear that he was the plaintiff's agent or attorney. The statute (Pamph. Laws 1901, p. 158) authorized an attachment to issue "where the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, shall make affidavit," etc. The authority of the secretary of a corporation as defined by the statute (Pamph. Laws 1896, p. 277) concerning corporations was "to record all the votes of the corporation and directors . . . and perform such other duties as shall be assigned to him." It was held that the verification by the secretary was not sufficient, since it did not appear that the secretary was the plaintiff's agent or attorney, and plainly, in the absence of a special assignment, the authority defined by the statute did not extend to the making of an affidavit on which litigation is to be instituted.

In Taylor v. Sutherlin-Meade Tobacco Co. (1908) 107 Va. 787, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 60 S. E. 132, an attachment in equity brought by a domestic corporation against a foreign corporation, the affidavit was made by the secretary and treasurer of the attaching company, and the question was whether the words "secretary and treasurer" ex vi termini import that such officer is the agent of the corporation, it being contended that the affidavit on which the attachment was issued did not show that it was made by the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, as required by statute (Va. Code 1904, §§ 2959, 2964). It was held that the verification was insufficient because it could not be said as a matter of law, in the absence of averment, that the term "secretary and treasurer" necessarily imports the relation of agency between such officer and his corporation, and correct practice requires the affidavit to aver that the affiant is "the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney."

In Kelly v. Woman Pub. Co. (1888; City Ct. Spec. T.) 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 259, note, 4 N. Y. Supp. 99, the defendant, a domestic corporation, was sued for a balance of rent. The verification was by a former president of the corporation and, omitting the formal parts, read as follows: [Affiant], "being duly sworn, says that he is the former president of the defendant; that all the officers of the defendant, including deponent, tendered their resignations from office in said defendant prior to the commencement of this action, and no other officers have yet been elected or chosen in their place; that the foregoing answer is true," etc. The statute (Code, § 525) required that a verification of a pleading by a domestic corporation must be made "by an officer thereof." It was held that a verification by an ex-officer is unauthorized and insufficient.

2. Foreign corporation.

Under the various statutes it is generally held that the pleadings of a foreign corporation may be verified by its officer, agent or attorney. West v. Home Ins. Co. (1883) 9 Sawy. 412, 18 Fed. 622; Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427; Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v. Stever (1899) 29 Misc. 571, 6 N. Y. Supp. 241; Phonoharp Co. v. Stobbe (1897) 20 Misc. 698, 46 N. Y. Supp. 678; Bank of Wooster v. Spencer (1840) Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 386; Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt (1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500; Glaubenskle v. Hamburg & A. Packet Co. (1859) 9 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 104; American Audit Co. v. Industrial Federation (1903) 84 App. Div. 304, 82 N. Y. Supp. 642; High Rock Knitting Co. v. Bronner (1896) 18 Misc. 627, 43 N. Y. Supp. 725; St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Earl (1915) 54 Okla. 305, 153 Pac. 867; De Witt Wire Cloth Co. v. Griffith (1911) 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 273; Western Bank v. Tallman (1862) 15 Wis. 92. See also Heintzelman v. L'Amoureux (1867) 3 Nev. 377.

Where a complaint is verified by the president of a foreign corporation, the affidavit need not allege why the verification is not by the party. Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt (1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500.

In De Witt Wire Cloth Co. v. Griffith (1911) 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 273, an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, it was held that the plaintiff, being a foreign corporation duly registered and authorized to do business in the state, and having a store and salesroom within the state, the verification of the statement by the manager of that store through which the sale was made, who was entirely familiar with the transaction, was sufficient.

In West v. Home Ins. Co. (1883) 9 Sawy. 412, 18 Fed. 622, an action on a fire insurance policy, the answer was verified by the local agent of the defendant corporation, who stated therein that he made the affidavit because he knew the facts contained in the answer "of his own knowledge," and that none of the "officers" of the defendant are within the state. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 79) required that an answer shall "be verified by the party, his agent or attorney, to the effect that he believes it to be true." The verification must be made by the affidavit of the party; but, if he is absent or incapable of making it, his agent or attorney may make it; and such agent or attorney may make it in any case, "if all the material allegations" of the answer are within his "personal knowledge." In the case of a corporation "the verification may be made by any officer thereof, upon whom service of a summons might be made." It was held that the agent was a proper person to make such affidavit.

In Phonoharp Co. v. Stobbe (1897) 20 Misc. 698, 46 N. Y. Supp. 678, an action to recover for goods sold and delivered, the complaint described the plaintiff as a foreign corporation. The signed affidavit verifying the complaint was by a person who described himself as plaintiff, and did not show any connection with the corporation. It was held that the verification was clearly defective, since a foreign corporation can act only by its representative or agent.

In American Audit Co. v. Industrial Federation (1903) 84 App. Div. 304, 82 N. Y. Supp. 642, it was held that the answer of a foreign corporation was sufficiently verified by its attorney.

The fact that the complainant is a foreign corporation, which appears from the bill itself, is sufficient cause to justify the verification of a bill by an agent. Bank of Wooster v. Spencer (1840) Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 386.

In St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Earl

(1915) 54 Okla. 305, 153 Pac. 867, an action on a fire insurance policy, an answer was filed denying under oath that the company had executed the policy. No proof was made by the plaintiff of its execution, but it was contended that, inasmuch as the affidavit attached to the answer was sworn to by an attorney, the same was insufficient, because it did not comply with the statute (Rev. Laws 1910, § 4765) by showing that the defendant was a foreign corporation, and it was insisted that a showing in the affidavit that the general agents of the said company were not residents of the state of Oklahoma, and were not then within the state, was insufficient on which to base an affidavit under that section, and thereby allow the attorney to verify such affidavit. It was held that the verification was a sufficient compliance with the statute in view of the admitted fact, a statement that the affiant was attorney for the defendant, and that the general agents were not residents of the state, and not then within the state.

In Glaubenskle v. Hamburgh & A. Packet Co. (1859) 9 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 104, an action for damages for personal injuries received by a vessel, the defendant's answer was verified by its agent by an affidavit stating that deponent was one of the managing agents of the defendants, and that the complaint was served upon him, and that he had charge of all the business of the defendant in the United States. The answer was returned on the ground that the verification was insufficient, in that it did not set forth affiant's grounds of belief and source of knowledge as to the matter stated in the answer. The statute (Code, § 157) provided that where a corporation is a party the verification of the pleading might be made by any officer thereof, and (by § 134) a summons might be served on the managing agent of a corporation. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since, by the last-named section, the service of summons on a managing agent makes him an officer for the purpose of the action.

In Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v.

Stever (1899) 29 Misc. 571, 62 N. Y. Supp. 249, it was argued that the verification of the complaint by the plaintiff's attorney gave none of the reasons which, under the statute (Code, § 925), authorize a pleading to be verified by a person other than a party. The statement in this respect was as follows: "That the reason why this verification is not made by the plaintiff is because it does not reside in the county of Columbia, and is a corporation." It was held that the affidavit of verification was sufficient in this respect, especially as the complaint which the affiant by his affidavit said was true contained the statement that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation.

In Western Bank v. Tallman (1862) 15 Wis. 92, an action to foreclose a farm mortgage brought by a foreign corporation, an application for change of venue, based upon alleged prejudice of the judge, was verified by the affidavit of the attorney of the plaintiff. The statute provided that such applications must be verified by the oath or affidavit of the party, without provision as to what officers of a corporation could make the affidavit. Other provisions ordinarily confined the right of verification to the officers of the corporation. Another provision prescribed that on certain facts a pleading may be verified by an ordinary agent or attorney, but made no such provision with respect to an application to change the venue because of the prejudice of the judge. It was held that the affidavit was insufficient.

In Bank of Wooster v. Spencer (1840) Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 386, a motion for the appointment of a receiver on a creditors' bill was verified by a clerk in the office of complainants' solicitors. The bill was sworn to by a person describing himself as agent for the complainants, duly authorized thereto by the complainants' solicitors, who swears that he has read the bill, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the complainants' having been informed of certain facts, and that in those cases he (the deponent) has been informed of those facts, with the remaining part of the usual jurat. He added: "And further, during the proceedings in the action in which the said judgment was obtained, he was, and still is, a clerk in the office of the attorneys of the said plaintiffs therein, had personal knowledge of the facts of the obtaining of the said judgment, and of the return indorsed upon, and the filing in the clerk's office of, the said execution." The defendants objected that the bill was not properly sworn to under the rules and practice of the court. The (17th) rule required the bill to be verified by the oath of the complainant, or in case of his absence from the state, or other sufficient cause shown, by the oath of his agent, attorney, or solicitor. It was held that the bill was sufficiently verified, since a clerk who had been sent to transact the business would perhaps be as competent and as good a witness to the truth of these averments as the attorney, except as to the last averment; and if the bill was exhibited by collusion with the defendants, they would not have been present to oppose the motion.

In Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt (1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500, the complaint of the plaintiff, a foreign corporation, was verified by its president. It stated that he was its president, and the form of verification was that usually employed by a party. The grounds of the president's belief as to matters alleged on information were not stated. The verification was held sufficient.

In Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427, the answer of the defendant foreign corporation, verified by the defendant's secretary, was returned on the ground that the secretary did not set forth in his affidavit of verification the grounds of his belief as to the matters stated on information and belief in the answer. The statute provided that "the verification of a pleading 'must' be made by a 'party,' 'except' (only what is applicable being here cited) that, where the 'party' is a domestic corporation, it 'must' be made by an officer thereof, and that, where a foreign corporation, it 'may' be made by 'the agent of or the attorney for the party.'" It was held that the secretary could not verify the answer as an agent, but to do so he must comply with the statute "and set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters stated on his own knowledge;" but he need not set forth "the reason why it was not made by the party," as that would be senseless in the case of a corporation.

1. In general.

Without regard to whether the interests of the parties are joint or several, and in some instances by virtue of statute, it has been held that the verification of a pleading by one coparty for all is sufficient.

Texas. — Cherryhomes v. Carter (1886) 66 Tex. 167, 19 S. W. 443; Jones v. Austin (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 505, 26 S. W. 14; Dodson v. Warren Hardware Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 952; Queen Ins. Co. v. Keller (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 186 S. W. 359.

In Brown v. Jones (1836) 3 Port. (Ala.) 420, an action of assumpsit on a promissory note, it was objected that inasmuch as both of the defendants joined in their pleas they should be verified by both, and that the oath of one of them was insufficient verification. The statute under which the pleas were made declared that any writing (the foundation of an action), whether the same be under seal or not, shall be received as evidence of the debt or duty for which it is given; and that it shall not be lawful to deny its execution, unless by plea, supported by the affidavit of the party pleading it. The court held that while a literal interpretation of the statute would doubtless render necessary the affidavit of all parties uniting in the plea, to deny the execution of a promissory note it was not believed that the intention or language of the statute required all parties to plead, but that, as the statute was enacted to require an affidavit to show prima facie that execution is not carelessly denied, and this being quite as apparent where the plea is verified by one, as when it is verified by all the defendants pleading it, the verification of the plea by one was in compliance with the spirit of the statute.

In Kerr v. Hedge (1861) 12 Iowa, 426, one of the plaintiffs verified the replication by an affidavit in which it was stated that the affiant was not personally acquainted with the matters set up in the replication, but from the information of his codefendant, he believed the facts stated were true in substance and in fact. The statute (Code, § 1745) provided that "a replication not sworn to could not be regarded as evidence for the plaintiff, but it could be considered as a pleading, putting in issue the allegations to which it responds." But another section (1749) provided that such replication must be sworn to by the party himself, "or some one of the parties, when there are several, or by someone showing himself to be possessed of equal information with the party," etc. It was held that the verification was sufficient, coming fully within the requirements of the statutes, as it was made by one of several parties under oath.

In Willett v. Porter (1873) 42 Ind. 250, a proceeding to contest and set aside a will, the complaint and amendments thereof were verified by one of the plaintiffs only, and the defendants moved to dismiss the action as to all plaintiffs who had not sworn to the complaint, and demurred on the ground, among others, that the complaint was not verified by the affidavits of the plaintiffs. It appeared that the statute governing proceedings to contest a will provided as follows: "Any person may contest the validity of any will, or resist the probate thereof, at any time within three years after the same has been offered for probate, by filing in the proper court his allegation in writing, verified by his affidavit, setting forth," etc. "The allegation of the party contesting must be verified by his affidavit." It was held that the statutory requirement that the allegations of the party contesting must be verified by affidavit is complied with when the complaint has been sworn to by any one or more of the plaintiffs.

In Claiborne v. Castle (1898) 98 Cal. 30, 32 Pac. 807, an action to enforce a vendor's lien on realty, it was insisted that the default of one defendant should have been entered, for the reason that the answer was verified by the other defendant alone, he stating that he also made the affidavit on behalf of his codefendant. It was held that the necessity for verification of the pleading arose from statute alone, and that the solution of the question was dependent entirely on the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) under which it was quite apparent that a verification of a pleading by one codefendant or coplaintiff was sufficient.

In Kinnaman v. Kinnaman (1880) 71 Ind. 417, an action brought by children and heirs at law of deceased to contest a will, the court remarked that the complaint was duly verified by one of the plaintiffs.

The verification of the statements in an injunction bill by the affidavit of any one of the complainants is sufficient. Hemphill v. Ruckersville Bank (1847) 3 Ga. 435.

In Jones v. Austin (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 505, 26 S. W. 144, a suit brought on an account, two of the defendants did not reside in the county, but their codefendant did have a residence therein. The two nonresident defendants pleaded in abatement their privilege to be sued in the county of their residence. The plea was duly verified by one of them, who stated that he was cognizant of the facts. It was held that this was all that was necessary to make the plea available to both defendants.

An affidavit verifying a writ of garnishment made by one of the plaintiffs is a sufficient verification. Dodson v. Warren Hardware Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 852.

In Patterson v. Ely (1861) 19 Cal. 28, an action in ejectment, it was held that it was not necessary that the verification of the complaint should have been made by both of the plaintiffs, the affidavit of one being sufficient.

In Queen Ins. Co. v. Keller (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 186 S. W. 859, a petition for temporary injunction, it was held that a plea of privilege, made in behalf of two defendants, was sufficiently verified by one of the defendants to make the plea available for both.

In Williams v. International Grain & S. Bd. (1894) 99 Mich. 80, 57 N. W. 1089, a garnishment proceeding, the affidavit in each case was made by one of the plaintiffs and stated all the requirements of the statute, and that the plaintiffs "are justly apprehensive of loss," etc., "unless a writ of garnishment issue." It was held that where the affidavit is made by one of the plaintiffs, and he swears that they both are justly apprehensive, it must be presumed that he has personal knowledge.

In Queen Ins. Co. v. Keller (Tex.) supra, a petition for temporary injunction, one of the trustees of a church made an application for a writ of garnishment on behalf of all the trustees. The applicant alone made the affidavit in support of the application. It was contended that the affidavit could be made only by the plaintiff in the main suit, to which the garnishment suit was only auxiliary, or by an agent or attorney, and if by an agent or attorney, the capacity of the affiant and his authority must appear in the application of the affidavit. It was held that, as the affiant was one of the trustees and one of the plaintiffs, he had full authority to make the application on behalf of all the plaintiffs for the writs of garnishment, and that he had authority to perform the ministerial act of verification.

However, in Cherryhomes v. Carter (1886) 66 Tex. 167, 18 S. W. 443, an answer setting up the defense of usury was verified by one of the defendants, who not only did not join in the plea, but refused to avail himself of it. The statute (Rev. Stat. art. 2981) was peremptory that "no evidence of usurious interest shall be received on the trial of any cause unless the same shall be specially pleaded, and verified by the affidavit of the party wishing to avail himself of such defense." It was held that the verification was not sufficient.

In Stevenson v. Farnsworth (1845) 7 Ill. 715, the declaration was in assumpsit on a note made payable to the plaintiffs. The defendants pleaded, first, nonassumpsit, and, second, that they did not make and execute the note declared on. A statute provided as follows: "No person shall be permitted to deny on trial, the execution of any instrument in writing, whether sealed or not, upon which any action may have been brought, or which shall be pleaded or set up by way of defense, or set-off, unless the person so denying the same shall, if defendant, verify his plea by affidavit; and, if plaintiff, shall file his or her affidavit, denying the execution of such instrument." Another statute provided as follows: "On actions upon contracts, express or implied, against two or more defendants, alleged to have been made or executed by such defendants, as partners or joint obligors or payors, proof of joint liability or partnership of the defendants, or their Christian or surnames, shall not in the first instance be required, to entitle the plaintiff to judgment, unless such proof shall be rendered necessary by pleading in abatement, or the filing of pleas denying the execution of such writing, as is required by the 'Act Concerning Practice in Courts of Law.'" It was held that, as it is the person and not the party who is to verify the plea, where there are several defendants, each must for himself verify the plea.

In Harrison v. Lebanon Waterworks (1891) 91 Ky. 255, 84 Am. St. Rep. 180, 15 S. W. 522, the statute involved (§ 117, subsec. 4) provided that on motion of a party who files his affidavit, stating his belief that an adverse party, whose pleading has been verified by a person other than himself, knows that a statement thereof in the affidavit mentioned is untrue, and that the motion is not made for delay, the court, if such statement be material, shall require such adverse party to verify the pleading; and, if he fail to do so within a reasonable time, shall treat it, with regard to him, as if it had not been filed. It was held that, where one of the plaintiffs verified the petition, the failure of the other plaintiff to verify his pleading, and his refusal to obey a rule issued on a motion requiring him to do so, the court properly ordered that said pleadings be treated, with regard to him, as if they had not been filed.

In Maryland, there are three early cases decided at about the same time, which are apparently conflicting. Thus it was held that a bill praying for an injunction may be verified by one of the plaintiffs, where there are more than one. Jones v. Magill (1825) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 177; Salmon v. Clagett (1828) 3 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 125.

But in Binney's Case (1828) 2 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 100, it was held that where there are a plurality of defendants, they may join in making answer to the bill, or they may answer separately, or they may make a joint and several answer as best suits their convenience or pleasure; but in whatever form the response may be it is essential, if not waived by the plaintiff, that each defendant should swear to his answer, and therefore, when the answer purports to be the answer of two or more, and is not sworn to by all, it may be taken off the file, or can only be received as the answer of him who has so sworn to it.

In Mooney v. Ryerson (1885; City Ct. Spec. T.) 8 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 435, the action was by a husband to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by the wife through the negligence of the servants of two defendants. The answer was verified by one defendant only, the verification being in the usual form of a verification by a party pleading alone. It was held that it was sufficient.

But in an early case it was said that although an answer by joint and several defendants named in the title should have been sworn to by all instead of one, yet the oath and signature may be waived by the plaintiffs, by a reply. Fulton Bank v. Beach (1880) 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 86.

And see in Jaillard v. Tones (1877) 8 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 24, an action for goods sold and delivered, in which the answer was verified by one of the defendants' attorneys, who stated in the verification that the ground of his belief as to the truth of the answer was information derived from one of the defendants, who was a partner of another defendant at the time mentioned in the complaint. This statement in the verification was directly contradictory to the statement contained in the answer that the defendants were not copartners. It was held that the other partner must serve an answer verified by himself in the action.

B. Joint interest.

Where the interest of coparties is joint, one of the parties may verify a pleading for all.

Tennessee.—Moody v. Alter (1873) 12 Heisk. 142.

Thus, where codefendants are jointly liable in an action on a note, it would appear that a verification by one is a verification for both. Alfred v. Watkins (1852) N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 343.

In an action brought on a contract against the defendants as copartners, the answer was verified by only one of the codefendants. It was urged that: "it does not appear thereby that the defendant who makes or attempts to make the same is acquainted with the facts." It was held that the verification was sufficient in this respect, as it appeared from the pleadings, presumptively at least, that the defendant making the verification was "acquainted with the facts." Paddock v. Palmer (1900) 32 Misc. 426, 66 N. Y. Supp. 743.

In Mathis v. Ballard (1911) 73 Misc. 274, 130 N. Y. Supp. 873, an action by four defendants as next of kin of an intestate, to recover a balance alleged to be due, the answer was returned by the plaintiff's attorney on the ground that the verification was insufficient "in that the answer was made by four parties united in interest, and the verification was made by one who is not acquainted with the facts." It was held that the verification was sufficient.

In Warren v. Chambers (1850) 12 Ill. 124, a declaration in assumpsit against the defendants as partners, and containing the common count for money paid and advanced, it was said that when the joint liability of several, sued on a written instrument, is put in issue by a plea in abatement, it is sufficient to verify the plea by the affidavit of one of the defendants, or a third person.

In Butterfield v. Graves (1902) 138 Cal. 155, 71 Pac. 510, an action to quiet title, it was held that, as the defendants were sued jointly, and it was alleged that they "claim an estate or interest therein adverse to the said plaintiff," the answer was sufficiently verified by the affidavit of one defendant, under a statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) providing that verification must be by the affidavit of one party.

Where the claim made by a bill is a joint claim, the affidavit of one of the joint claimants is a sufficient verification. Reed v. Ryburn (1861) 28 Ark. 47.

In Holmes v. Moore (1902) 63 S. C. 182, 41 S. E. 90, an action on two promissory notes and for goods sold and delivered, the verification of the complaint was by one of the members of the firm. It was contended that the verification was not sufficient, because the party who verified did not live in the same county with his attorney. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 178) provided as follows: "The verification . . . must be by the affidavit of the party, or if there be several parties united in interest and pleading together, by one at least of such parties acquainted with the facts, if such party be within the county where the attorney resides, and capable of making the affidavit," etc. The verification was held sufficient, since the provisions of the Code did not restrict a party to a suit in verifying his own pleadings, but merely provided that he must verify, leaving unaffected the general principle that a party may always verify his own pleadings.

By direct provision of an early New York statute (Code, § 157), it was provided that, if there are several parties united in interest and pleading together, "the verification to the pleading may be made by one of such parties acquainted with the facts." Harley v. Ritter (1859) 9 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 400, 18 How. Pr. 147.

In Swales v. Grubbs (1890) 126 Ind. 106, 25 N. E. 877, a suit against the heirs and legal representatives of a decedent for the purpose of obtaining a judgment against the estate on certain promissory notes, it was contended that as only one of the defendants had pleaded non est factum the ex-execution of the notes was admitted. The answer was filed by all of the defendants except the administrator, and was verified by only one of the defendants. It was held that the notes, although referred to in the complaint, were not the foundation of the action, and while possibly it may have been necessary that the execution of the instruments therein referred to should have been denied under oath, it was not necessary that all the heirs should verify the answer denying that their ancestor and grantor executed the notes referred to in the complaint.

When the opposing creditor joining in specifications opposing a discharge in bankruptcy is a partnership, verification may be made by the signing member, or by another partner, if the facts are known to him and not to the member signing the pleading. Re Glass (1902) 119 Fed. 509.

In Deved v. Carrington (1904) 98 Md. 376, 56 Atl. 818, a suit against indorsers on two overdue promissory notes, it appeared that joint pleas of nil debet and nonassumpsit were verified by one of the defendants by an affidavit reading as follows: "On this 19th day of May, in the year 1903, before me, the subscriber, a notary public of the state of Maryland, in and for Baltimore city, personally appeared James Bartol (one of) the above-named defendants, and made oath in due form of law, that every plea so pleaded by the defendants is true, and they admit none of plaintiff's claim to be due and owing, and all is disputed; and further, that the affiant verily believes the defendants will be able at the trial of the cause to produce sufficient evidence to support the said pleas, and that he is advised by counsel to file the said pleas." It was held that the verification was sufficient under the requirement of the statute (Laws 1898, chap. 123, Baltimore City Charter, §§ 312, 313); that the affidavit itself should show that it was made on behalf of all of the defendants.

In Moody v. Alter (1873) 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 142, wherein an attachment was issued, the affidavit of verification, on its face, purported to have been sworn to by one of the firm of "Moody & Bigelow," but the name did not appear in the body of the instrument, which was signed "J. W. Moody & Bigelow," and the magistrate certified that it was subscribed and sworn to before him on a certain date. Objection to the sufficiency of this affidavit was taken, on the ground that the individual name of neither of the plaintiffs composing the firm of "Moody & Bigelow" was inserted in the body of the affidavit, nor subscribed thereto, in verification of its contents. The affidavit was held sufficient because the recital that one of the firm of Moody & Bigelow made oath, etc., and the fact that the affidavit was subscribed "J. W. Moody & Bigelow," and attested as subscribed and sworn to, sufficiently complied with the requirements of the statute, and as J. W. Moody's name was signed in full, the addition of the name of Bigelow did not vitiate the affidavit.

In Ashley v. Gunton (1855) 15 Ark. 415, a proceeding in the probate court for the allowance and classification of a claim against the estate of a deceased person, it was held that the claim was sufficiently authenticated under the provisions of the statute by the affidavit of one of the joint claimants.

In Conolly v. Schroeder (1907) 121 App. Div. 634, 106 N. Y. Supp. 308, the verification of the answer was by one of the defendants, stating that he was such, and that the answer was true of his own knowledge except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged upon information and belief, and that as to those matters he believed it to be true. It was contended that the verification was incomplete, in that it did not state that it was made by a defendant acquainted with the facts. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525) provided as follows: "If there are two or more parties united in interest, and they plead together, the verification of a pleading must be made by at least one of them who is acquainted with the facts, except in certain instances, where it may be made by other individuals. Where the pleadings themselves show that the several defendants are united in interest, and that presumptively the verifying defendant is acquainted with the facts, the verification need not so state." It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the pleadings on their face showed that the verifying defendant presumably had knowledge of the facts, and it was unnecessary so to state in the verification itself.

In Paddock v. Palmer (1900) 32 Misc. 426, 66 N. Y. Supp. 743, an action brought on a contract against the defendants as copartners, it was objected that the answer was verified by only one of the codefendants. The statute (Code, § 525) provided that with certain exceptions the verification of a pleading must be made by the affidavit of the party, or if there were two or more parties united in interest, and pleading together, by at least one of them who was acquainted with the facts. The complaint sought to charge the defendants solely as copartners. The defendants, while denying that they were copartners during all of the times alleged in the complaint, admitted their liability as copartners for part of the goods mentioned in the complaint, and denied that certain of the other goods were delivered to them as copartners, or at all, but claimed that they were delivered to some third person. It was held that the verification was sufficient.

In Ballard v. Lockwood (1861) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 158, the complaint was verified by one of the coplaintiffs as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is one of the plaintiffs in this action; that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." The verification was held to be sufficient as made by one of the plaintiffs, and for that reason was made by one of several parties united in interest, and who was acquainted with the facts.

See also Ruch v. Jones (1863) 33 Mo. 393, a suit on an account for painting and glazing, wherein the petition charged one defendant as the debtor and the other as the owner of the property sought to be charged with the lien. The answer was made jointly by both defendants, and was verified by the defendant described as debtor. The court held that the joint answer of several codefendants was sufficiently verified by the affidavit of one of them.

However, in White v. North Georgia Electric Co. (1911) 136 Ga. 21, 70 S. E. 639, it was held that a joint plea to the jurisdiction, by several defendants, based on the ground that none of the defendants against whom substantial relief was prayed resided in the county where the suit was instituted, was not properly verified by one of the defendants, although the plea was sufficient as to the defendant who signed, since a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the defendant is not suable in the county where the suit was filed is a personal plea, and must be sworn to by the defendant who files it.

And in Feeney v. Mazelin (1882) 87 Ind. 226, an action on a promissory note, it was held that the court below did not err in refusing the plaintiff's motion to strike out the 2d paragraph of plaintiff's reply to the 2d paragraph of the appellant's answer, which was verified by one of two codefendants, since it had no other effect as to the defendant who did not verify than simply to require the production of the note, even if, as to the verifying defendant, it put in issue the execution of the note.

And compare Davis v. Scarritt (1855) 17 Ill. 202, an action on a promissory note, wherein it appeared that the defendants were sued as late partners, trading and doing business under a firm name stated. A statute provided that when two or more are sued as partners or joint obligors, the plaintiff need not prove the joint liability or partnership "unless such proof shall be rendered necessary by pleading in abatement, or the filing of pleas denying the execution of such writing, verified by affidavit as required by law." It was held that the defendants were sued both as partners and as joint obligors, in the sense in which these words are used in the statute, and that a plea verified by one of the defendants was sufficient to put in issue the making of the note by him or the existence of the alleged firm, and he was entitled to make his defense under the sworn plea, although the implied admission created by statute still exists as to the other defendant, who was not entitled to any benefit from the oath of his codefendant, except the incidental benefit which would result from the plaintiff failing to maintain the issue as to one of the joint defendants.

3. Several interest.

Where the interest of coparties is several, the pleading must be verified by all, and if verified by one it will be considered as verified only as to him. Re Glass (1902) 119 Fed. 509; Andrews v. Storms (1852) 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 609; Wendt v. Peyser (1878) 14 Hun (N. Y.) 114; Hull v. Ball (1856) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 306; Gray v. Kendall (1859) 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 606; Alfred v. Watkins (1852) N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 343. See also Ferguson v. State Bank (1848) 8 Ark. 416.

Thus where codefendants are severally liable on a note, a verification by one is not a verification for the other codefendants. Alfred v. Watkins (1852) N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 343.

And in Gray v. Kendall (1859) 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 606, 10 Abb. Pr. 66, it appeared that a statute (Code, §§ 156, 157 [133, 134]) provided that, when any pleading is verified, "it must be by the affidavit of the party, or if there be several parties united in interest and pleading together, by at least one of such parties acquainted with the facts, if such party be within the county where the attorney resides, and capable of making the affidavit." It was provided by another statute that, whenever in any statute any "party or person is described or referred to by words importing the singular number," several persons shall be deemed to be included. 2 Rev. Stat. 1st ed. p. 778, § 11. It was held that when the Code required the verification to be made by the affidavit of the party, it required the affidavit to be made by every party who united in the pleading, whose interest was several, and if this be not done the adverse party would not be required to treat it as a pleading verified as the Code required.

In Wendt v. Peyser (1878) 14 Hun (N. Y.) 114, an action brought for the construction of a will, the statute then in force (Code Civ. Proc. § 525) declared that the verification must be made by the affidavit of the party, or, if there should be two or more parties united in interest and verifying together, by at least one of them, who is acquainted with the facts, except in certain cases. It was held that the verification was defective. Since the Code required the verification to be made by the affidavit of the party, it required the affidavit to be made by every party who united in the pleading and whose interest was several.

In Hull v. Ball (1856) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 306, an action on a promissory note against the maker and first and second indorsers, the defendant's answer was verified by one of the defendants. The court held that there were three distinct causes of action, and hence the verification by one defendant was not good for the rest, since, although the defendants may have one common defense, their interest is in no respect a joint or united interest, and each must verify his answer whether they answer separately or jointly.

If there is more than one creditor in specifications opposing a petition for discharge in bankruptcy, all must sign it and all must swear to it. Re Glass (1902) 119 Fed. 509.

In Andrews v. Storms (1852) 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 609, an action on a note which was verified by only one of two codefendants, the plaintiff moved to strike out the answer of the defendant not verifying, on the ground that it was not verified by him. The defendants contended that they were "united in interest," and that a verification by one was a compliance with § 157 of the Code. It was held that this was not sufficient as to the defendant not verifying.

And see Ferguson v. State Bank (1848) 8 Ark. 416, an action of debt wherein it appeared that one defendant filed a verified plea of nil debet.

The statute (Rev. Code, chap. 116, § 104) provided that "the pleas of nil debet and non assumpsit may be filed in all actions of debt or assumpsit founded on any instrument of writing not under seal; but such pleas shall not put in issue the execution of such writing unless the same shall be verified by affidavit." It was held that the verification only put in issue the signature of the affiant to the note in question, and that the signatures of the other defendants were proved by the note itself, since they had taken no steps to impeach it.

4. Husband and wife.

(a) Several interest.

Where husband and wife are co-parties, but with a several interest, their pleadings must be verified by both, the verification of one not being sufficient. Harley v. Ritter (1859) 9 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 400, 18 How. Pr. 147; Reed v. Butler (1860) 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 589; Youngs v. Seely (1855) 12 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 395.

Thus, in Youngs v. Seely (N. Y.) supra, an action for the partition of certain premises, brought against husband and wife, the answer was verified by the husband only. The statute (Code, § 398) declared that if the pleading is required to be verified, it must be done by the affidavit of the party; or, if there be several parties united in interest and pleading together, by one at least of such parties acquainted with the facts, if such party be within the county where the attorney resides, and capable of making the affidavit. It appeared that the wife's interest was separate from that of her husband. It was held that the petition should have been verified by the wife as well as by the husband.

In Reed v. Butler (1860) 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 589, a motion to strike out a joint answer of husband and wife for want of sufficient verification, the defendants answered jointly, denying that the property in question was purchased and paid for by the husband, and claiming that property as the separate estate of the wife, and the wife alone verified the answer. It was held that the answer was not sufficiently verified, since, if it was relied on as the answer of both, it must be verified by both, because they were not united in interest.

In Harley v. Ritter (1859) 9 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 400, 18 How. Pr. 147, an action against husband and wife, the statute involved (Code, § 157) provided as follows: "If there be several parties united in interest, and pleading together, the verification to the pleading may be made by one of such parties acquainted with the facts." It was held that where the husband and wife are not united in interest, a verification by the husband of a joint answer would not be sufficient, the court saying: "By § 114 it is provided that when a married woman is a party her husband must be joined with her, except in cases where the action concerns her separate property, and where the action is between herself and her husband. It follows, therefore, that in actions against a married woman in reference to her separate estate, the husband must be joined, and that the husband is made a defendant in right of the wife. As we have seen, in such cases the wife may answer separately, as matter of course, on application. . . . It thus appears that the wife held her separate property as if she were a feme sole; that when sued in reference to it, although her husband must be joined with her, an answer put in by him for her would not be good without her verification, and that, in cases where the husband is joined as a defendant in right of his wife, she may answer separately as matter of course, if she apply for leave to do so. However harmonious with the old practice, which originated during the existence of the more severe legal doctrine in relation to a married woman, her estate, and her being, there seems to be no reason for the long continuance of the rule requiring her to ask leave of the court to answer, when the action concerns her separate estate, and, in my opinion, such a rule would not only impose the performance of an idle ceremony, but would impair her right to enjoy and protect her separate estate in the manner, and to the extent and purpose, designated by the legislature. And I think, as well, that it would not be in accordance with the spirit of the Code, which was to 'simplify' as well as 'to abridge the practice, pleadings, and proceedings of the courts of this state.'"

In Huntington v. House (1856) 22 Mo. 365, an action for slander and malicious prosecution brought by husband and wife, the petition was verified by the affidavit of the husband. It was held that the affidavit of the husband was a sufficient verification of the petition.

In one New York case there was a similar holding. Hartley v. James (1864) 18 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 299. In that case, an action on a contract on the part of a husband and wife, the defendants answered jointly, claiming damages for both, and their answer was verified by the husband in the usual form. It was held that the verification was sufficient under the statute (Code, § 157), since the plaintiff brought his action on a joint contract by the defendants to recover for the breach of it.

But in an earlier case it was held that a joint answer of husband and wife must be sworn to by both, unless the complainant consents to receive the answer of both upon the oath of the husband only. New York Chemical Co. v. Flowers (1837) 6 Paige (N. Y.) 654.

This holding finds support in a New Jersey case, in which it was held that where husband and wife are made defendants in a bill in equity, and the husband must appear for both, the complainant is entitled to a joint answer which must be sworn to by the wife as well as by the husband, or it will be suppressed for irregularity. Collard v. Smith (1860) 13 N. J. Eq. 43.

See also Hudgins v. Nix (1846) 10 Ala. 575, wherein, under a statute providing that when the demand does not exceed $100 "the oath of the plaintiff shall be received as evidence of the demand, unless the same be controverted by the oath of the defendant," with an exception in the case of executors, administrators, trustees, and guardians, where a husband was sued for a debt due from his wife, when sole, it was held that the wife with whom the contract was alleged to have been made was the defendant indicated by the statute, to controvert the plaintiff's oath.

e. Guardian ad litem.

A guardian ad litem or next friend of an incompetent plaintiff may verify the petition or complaint. Reed v. Ryburn (1861) 23 Ark. 47; Turner v. Cook (1871) 36 Ind. 129; Imlay v. New York & H. R. Co. (1848) 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 94, 1 Sandf. 732; Anable v. Anable (1861) 24 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 92; Clay v. Baker (1886) 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 1; Hill v. Thaxter (1848) 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 407; Leftwick v. Hamilton (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 310; Phillips v. Portage Transit Co. (1908) 137 Wis. 189, 118 N. W. 539.

Thus, in Anable v. Anable (1861) 24 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 92, an action for divorce by an infant plaintiff, it was held that the plaintiff was not required to verify, but that the complaint was properly verified by the guardian, on the theory that the guardian may be regarded as the plaintiff.

And in Reed v. Ryburn (1861) 23 Ark. 47, it was said that if the bill had been prosecuted by a minor alone, a proper affidavit of the next friend to the bill would have been a sufficient verification.

In Phillips v. Portage Transit Co. (1908) 137 Wis. 189, 118 N. W. 539, an action for damages for personal injuries, the complaint was verified by the guardian ad litem of the infant plaintiff positively and of his own knowledge. It was contended that this was not a good verification, but that the verification should have been made by the infant plaintiff, and it was urged that the guardian occupied the position of an agent of the plaintiff, and therefore it was necessary that he should have stated his knowledge. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the guardian ad litem verifies as a party, and not as an agent of the infant plaintiff.

The next friend, suing in behalf of a married woman, may properly make oath to the truth of the facts in the petition. Leftwick v. Hamilton (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 810.

In Clay v. Baker (1886) 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 1, a motion to compel the plaintiff to receive an unverified answer, it appeared that the plaintiff was an infant, and the guardian ad litem verified the complaint by an affidavit, stating that he was such guardian and that the complaint was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and as to those matters he believed it to be true. The defendants served an answer without verification, which was returned because it was unverified. Thereupon the defendants moved to require its acceptance as an answer to the complaint, and from the denial of the motion this appeal was taken. The contention of the defendants was that as the affidavit was not made by the party plaintiff it was ineffectual as a verification, because it did not set forth the grounds of his belief and the reason why it was not made by such party. The statute provided that the verification must be made by the affidavit of the party, except that under certain prescribed circumstances it might be made by the agent or attorney (Code Civ. Proc. § 525), and that, when made by a person other than the party, he must set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge, and the reason why it was not made by the party (id. § 526). It was held that the affidavit was sufficient, since, although the guardian was not a party plaintiff, he prosecuted the action, and the complaint was his pleading in behalf of the infant plaintiff, and the latter could not be required to verify the pleading; nor was it any evidence against her, nor did it conclude the infant party.

In Turner v. Cook (1871) 36 Ind. 129, a suit to contest a will, it was held that the section of the statute requiring the claimant to verify his complaint by his affidavit must be construed to apply to adults, and not to infants, and that a verification by the next friend of an infant complainant was sufficient.

However, in Hill v. Thacter (1848) 8 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 407, a civil action for speaking defamatory words of and concerning the plaintiff, it was held that while a complaint of an infant plaintiff could have been verified by his guardian ad litem or attorney, the verification of the complaint by a person described therein as guardian ad litem, but not then appointed as such, and who did not describe himself as agent or attorney, but simply as father of the plaintiff, was not sufficient under the statute (Code, § 132), which required that the complaint, answer, and reply must be verified by the party, his agent, or attorney.

1. Third person.

Under various statutes a pleading may, in some instances, be verified by a third person who has knowledge of the facts. Martin v. Dortch (1888) 1 Stew. (Ala.) 479; Jones v. Magill (1825) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 177; Deved v. Carrington (1904) 98 Md. 376, 56 Atl. 818; Youngblood v. Schamp (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 42; Campbell v. Morrison (1888) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 157; Alston v. Jones (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 397; Nelson v. Baruch (1908) 60 Misc. 357, 113 N. Y. Supp. 449; Friedlander v. Pollock (1868) 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 490.

In Youngblood v. Schamp (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 42, a bill for injunction, it was held that the facts should be proved by the special affidavit of the complainant, but that where the material facts are not within his knowledge, they should be verified by the oath or affirmation of some person who has a knowledge of the facts.

A bill praying for an injunction may be verified by the affidavit of some third person, if the plaintiff is not a resident of the state, and the affiant especially shows how he happens to have knowledge of the facts set forth in the bill. Jones v. Magill (1825) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 177.

In Martin v. Dortch (1828) 1 Stew. (Ala.) 479, in discussing the statute (Ala. Laws, 454) providing "that no plea of non est factum shall be admitted to be pleaded but when accompanied with an affidavit of its truth," the court remarked that the statute contained no qualification or exceptions as to the persons who might make the affidavit.

In Deved v. Carrington (1904) 98 Md. 376, 56 Atl. 818, a suit against indorsers on two overdue promissory notes, the statute (Laws 1898, § 812), by its express terms, permitted the affidavit to the defendant's pleas, in such cases, to be made by a third party on the defendant's behalf, doubtless for the reason that, in some instances, the defense might rest on grounds to which some other person could with more safety and knowledge swear.

The law is well settled that, where a particular allegation is inserted in a bill for the purpose of transferring the jurisdiction from a court of law to a court of equity, that particular allegation in the bill must be verified by the oath of the complainant, or by oath of some other person who knows the facts, on his behalf. Alston v. Jones (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 397.

And see Campbell v. Morrison (1838) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 157, an application for injunction, wherein it was held that on an application for a general injunction, ex parte, if the complainant has no personal knowledge of the facts on which the right to the injunction rests, he should state the facts on his information and belief, and should annex to the bill the affidavit of the person from whom he derived his information, and who can swear to the facts.

However, where a pleading was verified by a person other than the party, who stated simply "that the sources of deponent's belief as to the matters not stated upon his knowledge are facts obtained in an investigation made for and in behalf of the said defendant and the statements of a witness, in deponent's possession, relating to the matters referred to in the complaint, and letters and documents in deponent's possession relating to said matters," it was held that the affidavit was defective, since the disclosure of the grounds of belief in the verification amounted to nothing more than the affiant's statement of his conclusion that the information possessed by him would justify his belief.

III. Formal sufficiency of verification.

a. Allegation of right to verify.

1. Generally.

When a person verifies a pleading in behalf of the party, he should, in his affidavit, state facts showing that he is entitled to verify as being within one of the classes of persons who are, by virtue of statute, authorized to verify for or instead of the party.

Thus, in Hamilton v. The Ironton (1854) 19 Mo. 523, it was held that, when not made by the plaintiff himself, the verification of the complaint should show what means the affiant had of knowing the truth of the particulars specified in the complaint.

In Guyton v. Terrell (1901) 132 Ala. 66, 31 So. 83, a bill brought by a judgment creditor, seeking assets alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed and property concealed, the verification of the bill was by the affidavit of a person who affirmed that he was the agent of the complainant and duly authorized to act as such agent in the matter in question, and that the complainant was a nonresident, residing in the state of Texas, and that the affiant of his own knowledge knew that the facts in the original bill and amendment thereto were true, as therein stated. Some of the facts alleged in the bill were stated as on the knowledge of the complainant. The affidavit positively affirmed the truth of such facts as on the affiant's knowledge. Other facts were alleged on information and belief. It was held that the affidavit was an affirmation that the affiant knew that the complainant was informed and believed as alleged, and that as to both classes of allegations the verification was sufficient.

Mo. 356, a suit instituted according to the provisions of the act to provide for the collection of demands against boats and vessels, the affidavit annexed to the complaint stated that "[the affiant], being duly sworn by me, the subscriber, on his oath declareth and saith that the above complaint is true, to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that the court below did not err in quashing the complaint, since the affiant, not being the party complaining, did not show what means he had of knowing the truth of any of the particulars specified in the complaint, whether he was clerk, bookkeeper, or agent.

In St. Joseph's Polish Catholic Beneficial Soc. v. St. Hedwig's Church (1901) 3 Penn. (Del.) 229, 50 Atl. 535, an action on a note, the plaintiff filed an affidavit of demand which was signed by its treasurer. The verification was by the treasurer, and read in part as follows: "And said deponent further says that he verily believes that the same is justly and truly due from the said defendant to the said plaintiff." It was held that the affidavit was not sufficient, since the affiant did not swear that he was the treasurer of the corporation.

And to the same effect see Wilmington Sash & Door Co. v. Taylor (1911) 2 Boyce (Del.) 528, 82 Atl. 86, an action by a corporation against a copartnership, wherein there was an affidavit of demand signed by a person as "treasurer," and it was held that the affidavit was defective because the affiant did not swear that he was treasurer.

In Fitch v. Bigelow (1851) 3 N. Y. Code Rep. 216, 5 How. Pr. 237, an action on a promissory note, the complaint was verified by the plaintiff's attorney by a signed affidavit, stating that the "[affiant], attorney for the plaintiff, being duly sworn, says that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on his information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." The statute (Code, § 157) required that where the pleading was verified by the attorney, he should set forth in his affidavit his knowledge, and the reasons why it was not made by the party. It was held that the verification was defective for failure to show the existence of facts authorizing the attorney to verify.

In Garfield County v. Isenberg (1900) 10 Okla. 378, 61 Pac. 1067, the answer was verified by plaintiff's attorney. The statute applicable (Stat. 1893, p. 70, § 3986) among other provisions declared that "the correctness of any account duly verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney, shall be taken as true unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney," and (§ 3992) that "when the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only, first, when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney; second, when the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned; third, when the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney; fourth, when the party is not a resident of, or is absent from, the county." It was held that the verification was defective since no reason was given why the plea denying the account was not signed and sworn to by the proper officer, and no attempt was made to bring it within any one of the four classes or subdivisions mentioned in the statute.

Where one who signed the petition to an affidavit of garnishment did not describe himself as agent or attorney, although his name is the same as the surname of one of the attorneys who signed the petition, it was held that the affidavit is not sufficient, as the court cannot know that the person who makes the affidavit, is one of the persons who signed the petition as attorneys for the plaintiff, nor will the court look to the records in the original suit to find information which ought to be contained in the affidavit itself. Willis v. Lyman (1858) 22 Tex. 268.

In Kirst v. Wells (1879) 47 Wis. 56, 1 N. W. 357, an action for goods sold and delivered, the complaint was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys. His affidavit was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs in the foregoing entitled action, and that the foregoing complaint is true, as deponent verily believes; that such belief is founded upon the admissions of the defendant that said bill is correct, and the said amount due thereon, and from communications had from said plaintiffs in relation thereto; that the reason this verification is not made by said plaintiffs is because neither of them is within said county, and both reside long distances therefrom." The objection urged against the affidavit was "that the attorney who made it stated his grounds for believing that the complaint was true to be 'the admissions of the defendant that said bill is correct, and the said amount due thereon,' when no bill is mentioned in the complaint." It was held that while the verification was informal it complied substantially with the requirements of the statute (Rev. Stat. 1858, chap. 125, § 19), since obviously the bill referred to in the verification meant the account for goods upon which the action was brought.

In an action on two promissory notes, the declaration was verified by one of the attorneys for the plaintiff by an affidavit which read as follows: "[Affiant] says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in this action; that there is actually due the plaintiff, as such assignee, on the promissory notes hereto annexed, the sum of $4,298.69." It was contended that the affidavit was not in conformity with the statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 140, § 14), because it did not state that it was made for and in behalf of the plaintiff to the action. It was held that the affidavit substantially conformed to the statute, since, although the attorney did not state in so many words that he made the affidavit on behalf of the plaintiff, yet he swore that he was one of the attorneys to the action, and this fact disclosed his means of information as to the precise amount due on the notes, and also sufficiently showed his connection with the suit, and authority to make the affidavit. Blaikie v. Griswold (1860) 10 Wis. 294.

In Bergh v. Poupard (1842) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 5, a motion for the appointment of a receiver on a judgment creditor's bill, it appeared that a rule of court (110) required bills of this description to be verified by the oath of the complainant, or, in case of his absence from the state, or other sufficient cause shown, by the oath of his agent or attorney. It was held that where the bill was verified by the complainant's agent, who was not also the solicitor of the complainant, the jurat must state the person verifying to be the agent of the complainant.

In Ré Mahoney (1908) 88 App. Div. 140, 84 N. Y. Supp. 329, it appeared that the verification was by the attorney for the plaintiff. The objection to the verification was that the attorney had not stated sufficient grounds why the affidavit was made by himself and not by the petitioner. It was held that the surrogate properly overruled this objection, since the affidavit of verification showed that all the other papers were in the hands of the attorneys, and that he was more familiar with the facts than the commissioner himself, and the facts recited in the petition showed that they were such as to have been almost entirely, if not wholly, within the knowledge of the attorney.

When an agent or attorney verifies a pleading on his personal knowledge of its material allegations, he must, besides saying that he knows it to be true, set forth his knowledge upon the subject, and when a pleading is verified upon information and belief the form of averments is not material. Morley v. Guild (1861) 13 Wis. 577.

In the Senorita v. Simonds (1859) 1 Or. 274, an action brought on the statute relating to liens on boats and vessels, the complaint was verified by an agent of the plaintiffs, the signed affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, says that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge; that all the facts therein alleged he has a personal knowledge of; that he has been and was the agent of said wharf-boat company, and had the management of said business during the time said indebtedness was incurred." One objection to the verification was that it did not appear that the affiant was the agent of the plaintiffs in the court below. It was held that, from what appeared on the face of the affidavit, his agency was sufficiently manifest, since he acted as agent in making the affidavit, and was recognized as such by those for whom he acted, and it appeared that he transacted the identical business out of which the alleged indebtedness grew.

In Reichert v. Lonsberg (1894) 87 Wis. 543, 58 N. W. 1030, a suit against two partners on an account stated for goods sold and delivered, the complaint was verified by an agent of the plaintiffs, who stated in the verification that the complaint was true of his own knowledge. It was held that the verification of the complaint was insufficient because the agent who attempted to verify it did not state what knowledge he had of the facts.

In Van Horne v. Montgomery (1851) 5 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 238, the complaint was sworn to by the cashier of the bank, the affidavit stating that "he had read the complaint and that the same was true according to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that, if the cashier was supposed to act as an agent or attorney, the verification was not sufficient, since the affidavit did not set forth his source of knowledge.

In Turner v. Loomis (1910) 146 Iowa, 655, 125 N. W. 662, it appeared that the answer was verified by the defendant's attorney. The statute (Code, § 3583) required the competency of an attorney to verify a pleading to appear from his affidavit. The affidavit recited that he was "familiar with all the statements made in the answer and was familiar with the facts in this case, as claimed by the defendant, and that such statements were true as he verily believed." And this was held sufficient to establish his competency to verify the answer.

In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchison (1882) 87 N. C. 22, the verification of a complaint filed by a corporation was by an officer thereof, and read as follows: "[Affiant] maketh oath that the plaintiff is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the United States; that he is an officer thereof, to wit, the president; and that the facts herein set forth of his own knowledge are true; those otherwise stated he believes to be true." It was claimed that the verification was by an officer, and that it should go further and set forth "his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reasons why it was not made by the party," as required by statute (Code, § 117). It was held that the verification was sufficient, since a corporation cannot take an oath, and can, therefore, make no verification.

In Silcox v. Lang (1889) 78 Cal. 118, 20 Pac. 297, an action on an injunction bond, it appeared that when motion was made to strike out the answer because it was not verified, the attorney for the defendants asked leave to verify the same himself, and tendered the following verification: "[Affiant] deposes and says, in behalf of the defendants in the above-entitled action, that he has read the foregoing answer and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters which are therein stated on information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true; that he is the attorney for defendants, and as such attorney the facts are more fully known to him than to said defendants, and therefore he makes this affidavit." Objection was made, on the ground that the affidavit stated no reason why the verification was not made by a party. The objection was overruled, and the answer permitted to be filed, to all of which the plaintiffs excepted. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) provided that "where a pleading is verified it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the parties are absent from the county where the attorney resides, or from some cause unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same." It was held that the affidavit did not bring the case within the first two conditions, and was insufficient under the third condition in that it did not show that the facts were within the knowledge of the attorney, but only that the facts were more fully known to him than to the defendants.

In Re Howell (1876) 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 299, a petition for leave to issue execution on a judgment obtained against the executors on the merits, a preliminary objection was made on behalf of the executors that the petition was neither signed nor verified by the petitioner. It was held that the statute (Code, § 157) clearly applied to the verification in surrogates' courts, and that the verification of the petition in question did not conform to the requirements of that section in that it did not set out in the affidavit the knowledge of the attorney, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, or the reason why it was not made by a party.

An affidavit verifying a plea made by a corporation, if made by a competent person, is insufficient if it does not contain the necessary averments required by the statute. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Hoeske (1870) 32 Md. 317.

In Johnson v. Smith (1893) 158 Pa. 568, 28 Atl. 144, plaintiff's statement was verified by its agent and manager, and read as follows: "Personally appeared before me, the prothonotary in and for said county, H. W. Bostwick, agent and manager for above plaintiffs, who, being duly sworn, says that the sum of $508.75, with interest from date, is the amount he verily believes to be due and owing from the above defendant to the above plaintiffs upon the instrument in writing recorded, etc., and upon which suit is brought in this case, and that the above statement is true to the best of his knowledge and belief." It appeared that the affidavit required in the rules of the court might be made by the agent or attorney of the party,

"where such agent or attorney is cognizant of the facts constituting the cause of action." And by another rule: "Plaintiff's statement shall contain a specific averment of facts sufficient to constitute a good cause of action. Such statements shall be supported by an affidavit of the truth of the matters alleged as the basis of the claim." It was held that the verification is defective in that the agent did not state that "he [was] cognizant of the facts" constituting the cause of action, and did not say that the statement was true, but that he believed it was true, and no reason was suggested for the failure of some one of the living plaintiffs to make the affidavit.

In Kinografen v. Henius (1914) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 980, the statement of claim of the plaintiff foreign corporation was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys by an affidavit as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is of counsel for plaintiff above named; that he has been furnished by plaintiff with all the facts and data set forth in the foregoing statement of claim; that he is the duly authorized agent of plaintiff for the purpose of making affidavit to said statement, and that the facts as therein set forth are, as he is informed and believes, true and correct." The rule of court (13) "provides for the making of such an affidavit by an agent of the party in a proper case, but it also requires that 'all facts and statements which are within the affiant's knowledge shall be sworn or affirmed to be true,' and all other facts and statements shall be sworn or affirmed to be true, as affiant is informed and believes and expects to be able to prove upon the trial of the cause." It was held that the affidavit was defective in not averring, in addition to the matters appearing therein, that he expected to be able to prove the said facts upon the trial of the case, and the approved form should not have been departed from when the affidavit was made by the agent or attorney of the agent.

253, a motion to set aside a judgment in an action on a promissory note, the answer was verified by two of the defendants, and by one of the affiants for a third codefendant. The statute requiring the verification of pleadings (Code, § 157) provided that the verification might be made by an agent or attorney where the action or defense was founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument was in the possession of the agent or attorney of the party. It also provided that "when the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reason why it is not made by the party." It was said that an attorney verifying a pleading founded on a written instrument must state that he has possession of the written instrument described in the pleading, that it is inconvenient, for any or some reason, to procure the verification of the party, also what knowledge he has, if any or grounds to believe that the written instrument is genuine, or that he knows the signature of the party, or that he had admitted it or any other appropriate fact on the subject.

In Newberger v. Webb (1881) 24 Hun (N. Y.) 347, an action to recover a demand for goods sold, the verification of a separate answer of one of the defendants was by his attorney, who stated that he resided in the county and that the answer was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be on information and belief, and as to those matters he believed the same to be true, giving as a reason why the affidavit was not made by the defendant that the latter was not a resident or within the county, and stating the grounds of his belief. It was held that the verification of the attorney was justified by Code, § 525, which provided that where the party was not within the county of which the attorney was a resident nor capable of making the affidavit, the verification could be made by his agent or attorney, and that, when made by an attorney, by § 26 he should be required to state the grounds of his belief upon all matters not stated of his knowledge, the reasons why it was not made by the party, and the reasons for his belief.

In Myers v. Gerrits (1861) 13 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 106, an action on two promissory notes, the complaint was verified as follows: "[Affiant] . . . doth depose and say that the above complaint is true to his own knowledge, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. That the plaintiff is now absent from this state, which is the reason why this verification is not made by him; that deponent's knowledge is derived from possession of the notes in suit, and from other sources." Under the statute (Code, § 157), "the verification may be made by the agent or attorney, if the action or defense be founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument be in the possession of the agent or attorney, or if all the material facts relating to such instrument, and embraced in the allegations of the pleading, be known to such agent or attorney." This verification was held sufficient by the court, although doubt was presented arising from the fact that the verification did not contain an averment that the person making it was the agent, but the deponent stated that the plaintiff was absent and that his knowledge was derived from the presence of notes in the suit, and the conclusion upon such notes fairly was that the affiant was the agent of the plaintiff, and the Code did not require the person who made the oath to state that he was an agent if the facts presented were such that the relation might be reasonably inferred.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Mitchell (1907) 19 Okla. 579, 101 Pac. 850, the answer was verified by one of defendant's attorneys by a signed affidavit reading: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, on oath states that he is attorney for the above-named defendant; that said defendant is a corporation, and that the statements contained in the foregoing answer are true, as affiant is informed and verily believes." The statute was as follows: "Wilson's Revised Statutes, § 4312: 'In all actions, allegations of the execution of written instruments and indorsements thereon, of the existence of a corporation or partnership, or of any appointment or authority, or the correction of any account duly verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney, shall be taken as true unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney.' Section 4314: 'If there be several persons united in interest and pleading together, the affidavit may be made by any one of such parties. When a municipal or other corporation is a party, the verification may be made by an officer thereof, its agent or attorney.' Section 4318: 'When the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney, it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only: First, when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. Second, when the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned. Third, when the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney. Fourth, when the party is not a resident of, or is absent from, the county.'" It was held that the verification was defective in that it did not state why it was not made by the party.

In People ex rel. Smith v. Allen (1856) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 384, the complaint was verified by the attorney of the relator, and the attorney of the defendant, deeming the verification defective, put in an answer without verification. The verification by the attorney of the relator stated that the action was founded on the official bond of a defendant named, as sheriff, etc.; that a certified copy thereof was in the possession of his attorney, together with the order of the supreme court, made in the action, and the affidavits on which such order was granted; that the said relator was not within the county in which the deponent resides, but resided in the county of Madison, and was not capable of making the affidavit of verification of the complaint; that he, the deponent, had read the complaint, and knew the contents thereof, and that the same was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which were therein stated on his information and belief, and as to those matters he believed it to be true. The statute (Code, § 157) required, when a pleading was verified by any other person than the party, that the person making the verification set forth in the affidavit his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject. It was held that the affidavit of verification was defective, since the attorney should have set forth in his affidavit, specifically, his knowledge of each of the "material" facts contained in the complaint, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and he must state what knowledge he has, and the source of his information, as well as the grounds of his belief.

In Carolina Grocery Co. v. Moore (1902) 63 S. C. 184, 41 S. E. 88, two actions on promissory notes and open accounts for goods sold and delivered, the signed verification by an agent in the first case, being practically the same as that in the second, was as follows: "Personally appeared before me [affiant] and says that he is the lawful agent of the plaintiff in this action; that he has read the foregoing complaint, and the allegations therein are true of his own knowledge. The deponent's knowledge is derived from the fact that he was manager of the business carried on by the said plaintiff, Thomas Wilson, under the name and style of the 'Carolina Grocery Company,' and from the notes mentioned in said complaint which were in the possession of this deponent up to the time they were delivered to the plaintiff's attorney for the purposes of this suit, and from the admissions of the defendant to this deponent. Deponent further says that the reason why this verification is not made by the plaintiff is that the material allegations of the complaint are not within the personal knowledge of the plaintiff." The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 178) provided that "the verification must be to the effect that same is true, to the knowledge of the person making it, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true; and must be by the affidavit of the party, or if there be several parties united in interest, and pleading together, by one at least of such parties acquainted with the facts, if such party be within the county where the attorney resides and capable of making the affidavit. The affidavit may also be made by the agent or attorney, if the action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only and such instrument be in the possession of the agent or attorney, or if all the material allegations of the pleadings be within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. When the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on that subject, and the reason why it is not made by the party," etc. It was held that the complaint was properly verified, since the verification showed that the affiant was the agent of the plaintiff, not only by special allegation of that fact, but by the statement that he was the manager of the business carried on by the plaintiff, and had possession of the notes in question until they were given over to the attorney for suit, and the affidavit further showed that the notes in question were in the agent's possession until delivered to the attorney for suit.

In Bullock Beresford Mfg. Co. v. Hedges (1907) 76 Ohio St. 91, 81 N. E. 171, the petition was verified by the attorney of the plaintiff as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney of the plaintiff, duly authorized in the premises; that the statements contained in the foregoing petition are true, as he verily believes." The petition was stricken from the files, because the verification did not show that the attorney who verified did not do so in conformity to the statute (Rev. Stat. § 5109). The plaintiff contended that this was error; and its contention is that § 5109 does not apply to an agent or attorney of a corporation. By § 5102 it was provided that a pleading must be verified by "the party, his agent or attorney." By § 5109 it was provided that a pleading can be verified by "the agent or attorney" only in certain cases therein named. It was held that the affidavit was defective since the agent or attorney must still give the reason why he verified by stating in the affidavit that the case is included in one of the classes defined in § 5109, and that when the party is a corporation it must be verified by an officer thereof, or by its agent or attorney, and, as "officer" and "agent" are not equivalent terms, when the pleading is verified by an agent or attorney the affiant must in all cases state in the affidavit that the case is one included in one or more of the clauses of § 5109, and the judgment was affirmed.

In Rude v. Crandell (1886) 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 11, it was held that the verification of the answer by an agent of the defendant, which did not state the grounds of the affiant's belief nor the reason why it was not made by the defendant, the affidavit reading: "[Affiant], being sworn, says that he is the agent for the defendant in the above-entitled action; that the foregoing answer is true to his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true, sworn," etc., was not in compliance with the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 526), but for all practical purposes complied substantially with the requirements of the Code.

In Barrett Min. Co. v. Tappan (1873) 2 Colo. 124, the action was on an appeal bond. It was held that although the statute (Justices Act, Rev. Stat. p. 399, § 14) seemed to require a personal denial of the signature to an instrument, this being impossible to a corporation, to avoid denying a substantial right, the affidavit of someone acting for and in behalf of the corporation must be received, but the denial must nevertheless appear to be the act of the corporation, and one who so acts for a corporation should show in the affidavit that he had authority from the corporation.

See also in Nichols v. Jones (1890) 14 Colo. 61, 23 Pac. 86, wherein it was contended on appeal that the verification of the complaint was defective, in that the reasons why it was made by an attorney, and not by one of the parties to the action, were not stated therein, as required by the Civil Code. It was held that if the verification was defective in the particular mentioned, such defect was waived by failure to properly object to the form of the affidavit in the court below, and in filing an answer duly verified as to certain defenses, and not verified as to others, so that, as the verification was equally applicable to all portions of the complaint, the defendants ought not to be permitted to treat it as sufficient for some counts in the complaint and insufficient as to others.

And see Wright v. Coles (1846) 11 Met. (Mass.) 293, an action under a statute (Stat. 1840, chap. 87, § 1) which gave to the supreme judicial court original jurisdiction in civil suits (except in Suffolk county) in which the damages demanded shall exceed $300, "and in which the plaintiff, or someone in his behalf, shall, before service of the writ, make oath or affirmation, before some justice of the peace, that the matter sought to be recovered actually exceeds" that sum; "a certificate of which oath or affirmation shall be indorsed on or annexed to the writ." It was held that when an attorney of the court, known as such by the roll, makes an affidavit on a writ issued under his direction, for the collection of a debt, it is not necessary that it should appear by the affidavit itself, but the court is to infer that he does the act in behalf of the plaintiff, which satisfies the statute.

2. In action for injunction.

Where a bill for injunction is verified by a person other than the party, it must be stated in the affidavit that the affiant has personal knowledge of the allegations of the bill, and in some instances the source of such knowledge has been required. Bowes v. Hoeg (1875) 15 Fla. 403; Orme v. McPherson (1867) 36 Ga. 571; Brunswick v. Finney (1875) 54 Ga. 317; Dunham v. Curtis (1893) 92 Ga. 514, 17 S. E. 910; King v. Partridge (1895) 60 Ill. App. 475; Jones v. Magill (1825) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 177; Fowble v. Kemp (1901) 92 Md. 630, 43 Atl. 379; Bowie v. Smith (1903) 97 Md. 326, 55 Atl. 625; Moffat v. Calvert County (1903) 97 Md. 266, 54 Atl. 960; Justices of Pitt County v. Cosby (1859) 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 254; Bowles v. Glasgow (1871) 36 Tex. 94; Hook v. Payne (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 1014.

Thus, where a third person verifies a bill for injunction on the ground that the plaintiff is out of the state, the affiant must specially show in his affidavit how he happens to have knowledge of the facts set forth in the bill. Jones v. Magill (1825) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 177.

In Fowble v. Kemp (1901) 92 Md. 630, 43 Atl. 379, a bill for injunction, the court held a verification by attorney to be insufficient, since it did not appear that the affiant's knowledge was personal, when the affidavit on its face showed that it was not made by a party to the cause, but by a person who could not be presumed to know the facts except by hearsay, unless his means of knowing them in such a way as to authorize him to testify be disclosed. The court said that if his knowledge were personal it ought to have appeared that it was, as the court had no right to assume that his knowledge was personal rather than hearsay, and that the verification must extend to all material facts and be direct and positive.

In Bowie v. Smith (1903) 97 Md. 326, 55 Atl. 625, a bill for a mandatory injunction, the affidavit to the bill was made by one of the attorneys of record for the appellant. The affiant stated "that the matters and things set forth in the above petition are true to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that the affidavit was defective, since such affidavit may be verified by the agent or attorney only if his knowledge be personal, but not if it be hearsay, and it is well settled that the verification of the bill must extend to all the material facts upon which a right to injunction rests, and must be direct and positive.

In Justices of Pitt County v. Cosby (1859) 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 254, a bill for an injunction, wherein the affidavit annexed was to the effect that "[affiant] makes oath that he believes the facts set forth in the foregoing bill are just and true," the court found it unnecessary to notice with much particularity the objection of the defendant to the insufficiency of the affidavit annexed to the bill, but said that it did not approve it, because, when an oath is made by an agent for a corporation, it should state that he has read the bill, or heard it read, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on the information or belief of the complainants, and as to those matters the deponent believes it to be true.

In Orme v. McPherson (1867) 36 Ga. 571, it appeared that an application for ne exeat was verified by an agent who was not shown to have had any knowledge of the facts charged in the bill, and who only swore that what was contained in the bill, "so far as it concerns deponent's own act or deeds, or comes within his own knowledge, is true of his own knowledge, and that which relates to the act or deed of any other persons deponent believes to be true." It was held that this was not a sufficient verification to authorize the issuing of the writ, and that the affidavit must be positive, and not to the best of the knowledge and belief of deponent. It was further held that the allegations of the bill may be examined in connection with the affidavit to determine whether the charges are distinctly made and verified so as to warrant the issuance of the writ, since the allegations of the bill, if sworn to, become in effect a part of the affidavit.

In King v. Partridge (1895) 60 Ill. App. 475, a bill for an injunction, the verification of the bill was by one who stated that he was the agent of the complainant therein named, that he had read the foregoing bill of complaint, and knew the contents thereof, and knew the same to be true of his own knowledge, except as to such matters and things as were therein stated to be upon his information and belief, and as to those things so stated he believed them to be true. It was held that as the charges in the bill were made by complainant, who therein "represented" that various matters existed, the affidavit in effect was that affiant knew that complainant represented certain things to be as set forth in the bill; so that, since nothing in the bill was stated on the information or belief of the agent, the affidavit was, in this regard, meaningless.

In Moffat v. Calvert County (1903) 97 Md. 266, 54 Atl. 960, a suit, among other things, praying for an injunction, the bill purported to have been sworn to by an agent and attorney in fact for the complainant, who made oath "that the matters and things stated in the foregoing bill of complaint are true, to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that the bill was defective, since a bill cannot be verified by a person not a party to the cause, who simply states that the matters in the bill are true to the best of his knowledge and belief, but does not inform the court as to the source of his information or what knowledge he has on the subject.

In Bowes v. Hoeg (1875) 15 Fla. 403, a bill for an injunction, the affidavit on which the injunction was based was made by plaintiff's counsel, and read as follows: "Personally appeared [affiant], one of the complainant's solicitors to the foregoing bill of complaint, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that the statements made in the said bill, as far as the same are disclosed by the minutes and records of said gaslight company, and in so far as the same have come otherwise directly to deponent's knowledge, he knows to be true, and all else he believes to be true." It was held that the affidavit was not sufficient to justify the court in granting an injunction, because the affidavit was not positive and direct as to any single material fact, and the truth of what is sworn to by the counsel was placed on two conditions; that it should appear by the records and minutes of the corporation, and that the facts must have come directly to his knowledge.

See also Hook v. Payne (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 1014, an action for an injunction wherein the petition was signed by the attorneys for the plaintiff, and the affidavit was made by one whose surname was the same as one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, but who did not in the affidavit describe himself either as the agent or attorney of the plaintiff. It was held that the affidavit was not sufficient because there was nothing in the petition or affidavit to show that the affiant was a member of the firm who signed the petition.

Dunham v. Curtis (1893) 92 Ga. 514, 17 S. E. 910, was a petition for injunction wherein the petition was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys "to the best of his knowledge and belief." On motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that the verification was insufficient, the plaintiff's attorneys offered additional affidavits which verified most of the material allegations of the petition. It was held that such additional verification was sufficient.

b. Facts within knowledge of affiant.

1. In general.

The statutes usually provide that an agent or attorney or third person may verify a pleading where all the material allegations thereof are within his knowledge, it being required in some cases that the affiant allege in his affidavit of verification the sources of his knowledge.

In Guyton v. Terrell (1901) 182 Ala. 66, 21 So. 82, a bill was brought by a judgment creditor praying for the subjection of assets alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed, and for the discovery of property concealed, and its subjection to the complainant's judgment. The verification of the bill stated that the complainant was a non-resident of the state, and that the affiant knew the facts alleged to be true, and was duly authorized to act as agent. It was held that the verification set "forth a sufficient reason why" the verification was not made by the complainant, and was a sufficient verification under the statute (Code, p. 1205, rule 15).

In Brady v. Otis (1847) 40 Iowa, 97, it was held that the verification of a complaint by the plaintiff's attorney was sufficient, where the affidavit of verification showed the affiant's knowledge of the facts stated, and the source of his information, and especially where he could hardly have derived information from a different source, or possessed other or greater knowledge of the facts.

In Eldridge v. The William Campbell (1859) 27 Mo. 595, a process against a steamboat, brought under the act concerning boats and vessels, the signed verification of the complaint was as follows: "[Affiant], attorney for plaintiff, makes oath and says he believes the foregoing petition, and the matters therein as stated, are true." It was held that the verification was not sufficient, because the affidavit did not disclose the agent's means of knowing the facts stated in the complaint.

In Gourney v. Wersuland (1854) 3 Duer (N. Y.) 613, the complaint was verified by an agent who swore that the facts set forth were true of his own knowledge, and that his reason for making the affidavit was that the facts were fully known to him, and but partially to the plaintiff. It was held that this verification was sufficient, it not being necessary to aver the absence of the party when the pleading is verified by an attorney having full knowledge of the facts, such an averment being necessary only when the affidavit is made by the attorney on information and belief.

In Newman v. Bird (1892) 60 Cal. 372, an action to recover possession of certain premises, the complaint, which was required by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1175) to be verified, was verified by a third person, who stated that he was the agent of the plaintiffs; that he had heard read the foregoing complaint; that he knew the contents thereof, and that the same was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on his information or belief, etc.; that the facts stated were within the knowledge of the affiant, and therefore affiant swore that the facts stated in the complaint were within his own knowledge, and that they were true. The statute provided as follows: "When a pleading is verified it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the parties are absent from the county where the attorney resides, or for some cause unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney, or other person verifying the same. When the pleading is verified by the attorney, or any other person except one of the parties, he must set forth in the affidavit the reasons why it is not made by one of the parties." It was held that the complaint was properly verified, since the reason given for the verification by the agent was that the facts were within his knowledge, and that brought the case within the language of the Code section quoted.

In Baldwin v. Moser (1909) — Iowa, —, 123 N. W. 989, an action brought by a partnership on a contract of sale, the plaintiff's amendment to its reply to a counterclaim was verified by a third party, who stated that his knowledge of the facts averred in said reply was better than any knowledge thereof that plaintiff could have, and that he knew the facts and statements of said reply to be true, and in this amendment to reply it was stated that "in truth and in fact, prior to January 4, 1906, they [plaintiff] did sell twenty-five pianos in the town of Walnut, Iowa, to Koll & Son of that place, and the same were sold by Koll & Son by means of a word contest plan like that one proposed to the defendant in this action." Following this averment there was a list of twenty-five pianos, described by name, number, and style. In his verification of the reply, to which this was an amendment, affiant had stated that he had personal knowledge of all the facts growing out of the action and counterclaim in said case, and on his examination as a witness on the trial it appeared that he was plaintiff's traveling agent for the territory, including that in which defendant was conducting his business, and another town. There was a motion overruled to strike this amendment to the reply, on the ground that it was not properly verified. It was held that the verification was sufficient under the statute (Code, §§ 8584 and 8591).

In Pence v. Durbin (1874) 1 Idaho, 550, an action for damages sustained by reason of the issuing of an injunction, it appeared that the answer was verified by the affidavit of one not a party to the action, on the ground, as provided by statute (Civ. Prac. Act, § 55), that all the facts were within his own personal knowledge. This was held to be a sufficient verification, although the affidavit did not state the other statutory grounds that the defendants are absent from the county or that they are unable to verify the answer, the court saying: "We think the verification good. The affidavit is made by Freeman, against whom the injunction was issued, and who swears that the facts stated in the answer are within his personal knowledge, which is one of the cases in which the affidavit may be made by another person than the party. Freeman does not state that the defendants are absent from the county, or that they are unable to verify the answer, but upon the other ground, provided in § 55 of the Civil Practice Act, that all the facts are within his own personal knowledge. The reason he assigns for making the affidavit is the very reason why the defendants do not make, or at least one of the reasons why they need not make, it. In the reason assigned by him for making the affidavit is embodied the very reason why the defendants do not make it."

In Rausch v. Moore (1878) 48 Iowa, 611, 30 Am. Rep. 412, an action on a judgment, wherein the petition averred that the defendant was a non-resident of the state, and an attachment was issued and levied on defendant's individual interest in certain real estate, the verification to the petition was made by the attorney of the plaintiff, and read as follows: "I (attorney's name), being duly sworn on oath, say that I am the agent of the plaintiff in the foregoing petition for the collection of the debt declared on in the above petition; that I have read the foregoing petition and know the contents thereof; that, as attorney for the late (person named), I obtained the judgment herein declared on, and am more conversant with the facts alleged in said petition than is plaintiff himself, and the facts therein stated are true as I believe. And I further depose and say that the facts alleged as grounds for the issuance of a writ of attachment are known to me, and said allegations are true." Section 2678 of the Code provided "that if the statements of a pleading are known to any person other than the party, such person may make the affidavit, which shall contain averments showing affiant competent to make the same." It was held that the verification was sufficient, since no further showing of competency was required than a personal knowledge of the facts as to the existence of the judgment, and the fact that it was unpaid, and the affidavit set forth that the facts which were the ground for the attachment were known to the affiant, and that they were true, and that the affiant was the attorney who obtained the judgment, and the agent for its collection, and was more conversant with the facts than the plaintiff.

In Jirava v. Brieska (1878) 4 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 296, an action on a note and mortgage, wherein the answer was verified by one of the attorneys for the defendants, the affidavit was as follows: "[Affiant] . . . says he is one of the attorneys of the defendants in the above-entitled action, and that the matters and things in the above answer contained are true, as he verily believes; and that said matters and things are within the personal knowledge of affiant." It was contended that the affiant should have set out not only that the facts stated in the answer were within his personal knowledge, but also the reason why the answer was not sworn to by the real defendants in the case. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since, while the statute made the distinction and said that the reason must be set out why the affidavit is not made by the party himself, when the attorney in making the affidavit sets out that the matters and things are within his personal knowledge, that is a sufficient reason why the affidavit is not made by the party himself.

Beyer v. Wilson (1887) 46 Hun (N. Y.) 397, the answer was verified by an agent of defendant by an affidavit reading as follows: "That he has read the foregoing answer and knows the contents thereof; and that the same is true to his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true; that the reason that this affidavit is made by deponent, and not by said defendant, is that the said defendant is without the state, and is not within the county now; that the sources of deponent's knowledge and grounds of his belief as to the allegations of said answer are obtained from papers of said defendant, in his custody, relating to the matter in issue, and from conversations had with said defendant relating thereto." Under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525), a pleading may be verified by the agent of the party "where the party is not within the county where the attorney resides." The Code did not prescribe in what respect the agency must exist, nor that the nature of it be stated in the verification. The verification was held sufficient, because nothing was stated in the answer on information and belief, and hence the agent had sworn to every allegation as true of his own knowledge so that the letter and form of the Code were complied with; and while it was probable that the agent had sworn that to be true of his own knowledge which he could not have known to be true, as the Code permitted this certificate to the truth of the pleading, the court did not feel at liberty to set it aside.

In H. G. Bittleston Law & Collection Agency v. Howard (1916) 172 Cal. 357, 156 Pac. 515, an action for the alleged breach of two agreements, the verification of the complaint was by the affidavit of the plaintiff's assignor, and was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the assignor of plaintiff in the above-entitled action, and, for that reason, is better informed as to the facts thereof than the said plaintiff; that he has read the foregoing complaint and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to matters which are therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true." The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446) provided as follows: "Every pleading must be subscribed by the party or his attorney. . . . In all cases of a verification of a pleading, the affidavit of the party must state that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are herein stated on his information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes it to be true, and where a pleading is verified, it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the parties are absent from the county where the attorney has his office, or from some cause are unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same. When the pleading is verified by the attorney, or any other person except one of the parties, he must set forth in the affidavit the reasons why it is not made by one of the parties. When a corporation is a party, the verification may be made by any officer thereof. . . ." It was held that although the affidavit contained the usual qualification of the statute, "except as to the matters which are therein stated as on his information or belief," as no fact was stated in the body of the complaint upon the information and belief of affiant, the verification must be regarded as a positive affirmation of the truth of the allegations of the complaint, notwithstanding the use of such usual form, so that the affidavit was the equivalent of an averment in the exact language of the section that "the facts are within the knowledge," of affiant, and considering the additional fact that the affiant was the assignor of the plaintiff, and agreements set out in the complaint established this fact, the requirements of this branch of the section were fully complied with.

In The Senorita v. Simonds (1859) 1 Or. 274, an action brought on the statute relating to liens on boats and vessels, the complaint was verified by an agent of the plaintiffs, the signed affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, says that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge; that all the facts therein alleged he has a personal knowledge of; that he has been and was the agent of said wharf-boat company, and had the management of said business during the time said indebtedness was incurred." One objection to the verification was that it did not appear by the affidavit that the plaintiffs were absent from the county in which the suit was brought, at the time of making the affidavit, since otherwise, if either of the plaintiffs was in the county, the statute required that the verification should have been made by a party, and not by an agent. The second clause of the statute referred to (§ 54, p. 91) provided that the verification should be made by a party, if he be within the county in which the action is brought, unless the action or defense be founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument be in the possession of the agent; or if all the material allegations of the pleadings be within the personal knowledge of the agent, in which case the affidavit may also be made by such agent. It was contended that a third clause qualified the second clause. It was held this second clause was to be construed as standing by itself unqualified, and that under it the verification was sufficient.

In Aiken v. Franz (1895) 2 Kan. App. 75, 43 Pac. 306, an action on account, it was held that the verification of the reply by plaintiff's attorney was not sufficient under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 114), which provided as follows: "It can be made by the agent or attorney only: First, when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. . . . Fourth, when the party is not a resident of, or is absent from, the county." The affidavit did not in any way show or attempt to show that the attorney had any personal knowledge of the facts set out or involved in the pleadings.

Tallmadge v. Lounsbury (1889) 23 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 331, 10 N. Y. Supp. 129, was a motion to compel the plaintiff to accept the defendant's answer, which was verified as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says 'that he is the secretary of the defendant herein; that he has read the foregoing answer and knows the contents thereof; that the same is true to his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged upon information, and as to those matters he believes it to be true.'" The plaintiff returned the answer on the ground that a duly verified answer had not been interposed, the same not having been verified by the defendant's treasurer, or his agent or attorney. It was held that the cause shown by the plaintiff was sufficient.

In Moran v. Helf (1900) 52 App. Div. 481, 65 N. Y. Supp. 113, the averments contained in the complaint were positive, nothing being alleged on information and belief, and the verification was that the allegations were true. It was held that the verification was sufficient under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 526), but was defective because the affiant went too far in his statement by immediately proceeding to show that the sources of his information as to the facts alleged in the complaint were conversations had with the plaintiff, and it appeared that he had no personal knowledge of the facts.

In Hunt v. Meacham (1852) 6 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 400, a motion to set aside or strike out an answer for defective verification, a signed affidavit made by the attorney for one of two defendants stated that both defendants were absent from the state and that the verification by either of the said defendants to the plea or answer could not be procured and that deponent further says he believes the facts set forth in the foregoing answer to be true; that he has no personal knowledge of the same other than that derived from the statements made by his client, part of which were made upon oath in the presence of the deponent, and part in an interview with the said client, and while deponent was acting as counsel for him, and which statement deponent believes to be true. The statute (Code, § 157) provided that if the defense be not founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only, in the possession of the attorney, he must have a personal knowledge of all the allegations of the answer to enable him to verify. It was held that the verification was defective, since no such instrument was the foundation of the defense, nor did the attorney possess the requisite knowledge.

In First Nat. Bank v. Mason (1881) 57 Iowa, 105, 10 N. W. 294, an action by an indorsee on a written acceptance of a draft, a motion was made to strike the reply because it was not properly verified. The verification was by a person describing himself as the secretary of the drawer company, and stating that, as such, he was familiar with all transactions between said company and the defendant therein, since the beginning of 1879 to the time of making affidavit. He further stated in the affidavit that he had read the foregoing reply of the plaintiff, and that the same was true as he verily believed. The statute (Code, § 2673) provided that "if the statements of a pleading are known to any person other than the party, such person may make the affidavit, which shall contain averments showing affiant competent to make the same." It was urged by counsel that the verification was insufficient, because it did not show that the affiant knew the fact as to whether the draft was transferred before or after maturity. It was also insisted that although it appeared from the record that the affiant was the secretary of the drawer, and signed the draft and indorsed it, there was no showing that he knew when it was indorsed, because the statute requires the averment of knowledge of the facts to be made in the affidavit. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the law does not require that the affidavit shall be to a certain intent in every particular, and it is sufficient if it shows that the affiant was possessed of the requisite knowledge of the facts to make the verification to the general denial contained in the reply.

In Morris v. Fowler (1900) 99 App. Div. 245, 90 N. Y. Supp. 918, an action for goods sold and delivered, an attempted verification of the complaint by an attorney for the plaintiff read, in part, as follows: "He says that he resides in the borough of Manhattan and that he is the plaintiff's attorney; that he has read the foregoing complaint, and that the same is true of his own knowledge and belief, except as to the matters therein alleged on information and belief, and as to these matters he believes it to be true." The affiant further said "that the grounds of his belief and the source of his information, as to the matters therein not stated on his knowledge, are as follows: . . . He has interviewed the defendant, and has received letters from the defendant, acknowledging his indebtedness to the plaintiffs and promising to pay same. Dependent further says that the reason this verification is not made by the plaintiffs, or either of them, is that the plaintiffs are without the state of New York, and have no personal knowledge of the facts herein stated."

This was held insufficient, since from the statements made in the affidavit of verification it appeared that the attorney had no personal knowledge of the facts stated in the complaint.

In Hammerslaugh v. Farrior (1886) 95 N. C. 135, a civil action in the nature of assumpsit for goods sold, the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney written on the complaint as a verification thereof read as follows "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney of the plaintiffs in this action, and that the facts set forth in this complaint are true, except as to those stated on information and belief, and as to those he believes it to be true, and that his knowledge and belief of the facts are derived from an affidavit of the plaintiff . . . and from admissions of the defendant . . . made in frequent interviews with this affiant; and that this affidavit is not made by the plaintiffs, because they are nonresidents, as this affiant is informed and believes." The statute (Code, § 257) provided that "every pleading in a court of record must be subscribed by the party, or his attorney; and when any pleading is verified, every subsequent pleading, except a demurrer, must be verified also;" and by another section (§ 258) it was declared that "the verification must be to the effect that the same is true to the knowledge of the person making it, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters, he believes it to be true, and must be by affidavit of the party, or if there be several parties united in interest, and pleading together, by one at least of such parties, acquainted with the facts, if such party be within the county where the attorney resides, and capable of making the affidavit. The affidavit may also be made by the agent or attorney if the action or defense be founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument be in the possession of the agent or attorney, or if all the material allegations be within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney." The court held that the verification was insufficient, since the attorney who made it did not pretend to have any personal knowledge of the allegations of the complaint, and the action was not founded upon a written instrument.

In Quesenberry v. People's Bldg. Loan & Sav. Asso. (1898) 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. 73, it was held that the verification of a pleading by the attorney for the defendant corporation was incomplete and insufficient where it did not show that he was personally cognizant of the facts, and was hearsay on its face.

Tibballs v. Selfridge (1856) 12 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 64, was a motion to strike the verification of a complaint which read as follows: "A. B., being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney of plaintiffs in this action; that he knows the contents of the foregoing complaint, and that the same is true, except as to matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true; that the grounds of deponent's knowledge are the admissions of defendant . . . to him, as also from other persons; and that the reason why plaintiffs do not verify this complaint is that they are absent from this county." The statute (Code, § 157) declared that "a pleading must be verified, as 'true to the knowledge of the person making it, except,'" etc. It was urged that subsequently stating "the grounds of deponent's knowledge" shows what he must have meant, and supplies any deficiency in the prior language. It was held that the verification was bad, since it was perfectly easy to make it right, and no hardship was imposed on anyone in requiring it to be made so, and certainly would never be obtained otherwise.

In Globe Iron Roofing & Corrugating Co. v. Thacher (1888) 87 Ala. 458, 6 So. 366, a proceeding to enforce a statutory lien, it appeared that the statute (Code, § 3022) required the statement of claim in such cases to be "verified by the oath of the claimant or some other person having knowledge of the facts." The verification was made by an officer of the claimant corporation, and read, in part, that "the foregoing statement is true as to the best of the affiant's knowledge and belief." It was held that affiant, whether he was considered as the claimant or another person, and although it be conceded that he was the claimant, did not have a knowledge of the facts embraced in the statement, and the verification was insufficient, since the affiant did not swear that he knew the facts to be true, or that they were true, but, on the contrary, the construction of the verification most favorable to the lien would be that some of the facts were known to be true, and others, though not within the knowledge of the affiant, were believed to be true.

In Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt (1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500, the answer was verified by the affidavit of defendant's attorney, reading as follows: "That he is the attorney for defendant in the above-entitled action, and that he has read the answer herein and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true. That the reason this verification is made by deponent, and not by defendant, is that defendant is absent from the county where deponent has his principal office and place of business, and deponent is familiar with the facts." The statute (§ 525, subd. 3) provided that an attorney might verify where all the material allegations of the pleading were within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. It was held that the verification did not comport with this provision, and that the complaint was not properly verified.

In Branch Bank v. Coleman (1852) 20 Ala. 140, a petition for supersedeas, it was objected the petition was verified by an agent. It appeared that the statute which authorized the circuit court judges to grant writs of supersedeas in vacation read as follows: "The judges of the circuit court, respectively, shall have power and authority, in vacation, to supersede any execution, when it shall satisfactorily appear to them, or any of them, that the same shall have improperly issued from the clerk's office of any of the circuit courts of this state." It was held that the objection could not be allowed to prevail, and that the petition presented should be verified by the oath of the person in whose name and in whose behalf it was filed; but that it was sufficient, if the judge to whom it was presented was satisfied that the execution had improperly issued; and any person who knew the matters set forth in the petition to be true, might verify it.

In Goldbeck v. Brady (1887) 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 169, the action involved the Married Woman's Property Act (June 3, 1887, P. L. 333, the Act of May 25, 1887, P. L. 271), relating to proceedings in civil causes, and a rule of court (126) which provided as follows: "Plaintiff's statement shall contain a specific averment of facts sufficient to constitute a good cause of action. Such statement shall be supported by an affidavit of the truth of the matters alleged as the basis of the claim." It was held that where a stranger makes the affidavit the reason in some manner should appear, since otherwise unjust demands and unjust defenses might be made.

In Fowble v. Kemp (1901) 92 Md. 630, 48 Atl. 379, it was held that the prima facie evidence to authorize a court of equity to issue an injunction may consist of the oath of the plaintiff or of a third person, if he knows the facts, or of documentary evidence, such verification of the bill being required in addition to the sufficiency of the allegations so that the confidence of the court may be obtained.

In American Insulator Co. v. Bankers' & M. Teleg. Co. (1885) 13 Daly, 200, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 443, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 120, it was held that, where the verification of a pleading is made by a person other than the party, he must set forth in his affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge, and the reason why it is not made by the party (Code Civ. Proc. § 526).

When the territory or any officer in its behalf is a party, the verification of a pleading may, under direct provisions of statute (Practice Act, § 55), be made by any person acquainted with the facts, except that, in an action prosecuted by the attorney general or district attorney in behalf of the territory, the pleadings need not in any case be verified. And a pleading may be verified by a third person where the facts are within the knowledge of such person, and he sets forth in his affidavit the reason why it is not made by the party. Heintzelman v. L'Amoroux (1867) 8 Nev. 377.

In Colorado Springs Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Albrecht (1912) 22 Colo. App. 201, 128 Pac. 957, an action for damages, motion was made to strike the separate replications because they were verified by the plaintiff's attorney and the affidavit failed to state the reasons why it was not made by one of the parties, as required by the Code. It was held that the verification was not sufficient, since the provision of the Code is mandatory, and the affidavit was rather an allegation that the attorney was familiar with the pleadings than that the facts were within his knowledge, and; further, that if the verification was made by the attorney because the facts were within his knowledge, it should have been substantially in the form required by the Code when made by a party to the suit, instead of in the form allowed where the affidavit is made by an agent or attorney for a corporation.

In Pollard v. Southern Fertilizer Co. (1898) 122 Ala. 409, 25 So. 169, a suit seeking the appointment of a receiver, the signed verification was by one of the attorneys for the complainant, and read as follows: "In person appeared before the undersigned officer [Affiant], who, first being sworn, deposes and says that he is attorney at law for the complainant named in the foregoing bill, and that the facts and allegations stated therein, so far as they come within his own knowledge, are true, and so far as derived from the knowledge of others, he believes them to be true." It was held that the verification was so defective that it practically amounted to no evidence of the facts alleged in the bill.

In Johnson v. Woodbury Trust Co. (1899; Kan.) 57 Pac. 134, an attachment action under the Landlord and Tenant Act, the answer of the defendant, which contained a general denial, and was verified, stated that the affiant "deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys and agent for the defendant herein; that he is familiar with all the facts set out in the above and foregoing answer, and knows the contents thereof; and that said answer, and all the facts and allegations and matters in said answer contained and alleged, are true and correct, as I verily believe." Section 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided that in all actions allegations of the execution of written instruments and indorsements thereon, and of the existence of a corporation, shall be taken as true, unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney. Section 114, under which the verification was made, reads: "When the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney, it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only: First, when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney; second, when the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned; third, when the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney; fourth, when the party is not a resident of or is absent from the county." The question was whether the answer of the defendant, verified as above stated, was sufficient to put the plaintiff upon its proof as to the allegations of corporate existence and of the assignment of the lease, no evidence having been offered in support of such allegations, and the reply having been unverified. It was held that the words of the affidavit, "that he is familiar with all the facts set out in the above and foregoing answer," showed that the affiant possessed a personal knowledge of those facts, in even stronger language than that found in the statute, and hence the verification was sufficient.

And in the same case on appeal, Johnson v. Woodbury (1901) 63 Kan. 880, 64 Pac. 1030, an action for the recovery of rental in which attachment was issued, it appeared that the defendant answered: (1) By a general denial; (2) in substance, denying the ownership of the property by the Sioux Investment Company, or its right to lease the same, and the right of the plaintiff to recover the rental agreed upon. The defendant's answer was verified by an attorney and agent of the defendant, by an affidavit as follows: "[The affiant], of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys and agent of defendant herein; that he is familiar with all the facts set out in the above and foregoing answer, and knows the contents thereof; and that said answer, and all of the facts and allegations and matters in said answer contained and alleged, are true and correct, as I verily believe." It was held that neither the answer itself nor the affidavit intended to verify the pleading showed such a state of facts as authorized the affiant, as the agent or attorney for the defendant, to verify the pleading under the provisions of the Code, and hence the verification was insufficient. The court, however, did not cite the Code provisions, nor did it point out wherein the affidavit was insufficient.

In Banks v. Gay Mfg. Co. (1891) 108 N. C. 282, 12 S. E. 741, an action for damages for malicious prosecution, the verification of the answer was by an agent of the corporation, and was as follows: "[Affiant], agent for the said Gay Manufacturing Company, being duly sworn, maketh oath that the facts stated in the above answer are true of his own knowledge." It was held that, even if this affidavit could be made by an agent of the corporation, it was not sufficient, in that it did not set forth "his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reason why it was not made by the party," as it is necessary to set out these things in all cases where the verification is made by agent or attorney.

In Boston Locomotive Works v. Wright (1875) 15 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 253, the verification of the complaint by an alleged agent of the plaintiff was held defective because it did not show the extent of the affiant's agency, or his character as agent, and because he did not profess to have any knowledge, or did not state any, with respect to the "material allegations of the pleading," the statute (Code, § 157) requiring that, when the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in his affidavit his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reason why it is not made by the party.

Searle v. Richardson (1885) 67 Iowa, 170, 25 N. W. 118, an action on a promissory note, there was attached to the original answer the affidavit of one of the attorneys who appeared for defendant, in which he swore that he appeared as attorney for defendant in an action brought by plaintiff on the same promissory note, in which it was judicially determined that plaintiff did, for a valuable consideration, extend the time of payment of said note to the maker, and that on the trial of said cause plaintiff admitted that this defendant was surety on the note, and that her agreement with the maker was made without defendant's knowledge or consent. After reciting these facts, the affidavit concluded with the following statement: "Wherefore, the affiant says he has personal knowledge of the matters alleged in the foregoing answer, and of the allegations therein contained, as I verily believe." Plaintiff filed a motion to strike the answer from the files, on the ground that it was not properly verified. The statute (Code, § 2669) provided that, when the petition was verified, all subsequent pleadings must be verified also. It was provided by the statute (Code, § 2673) that "if the statements of a pleading are known to any person other than the party, such person may make the affidavit, which shall contain averments showing affiant competent to make the same." The question raised by the motion was whether it was shown by the averments of the affidavit that the attorney was competent to make it. It was held that the affiant was undoubtedly competent to verify those statements in the answer, the truth of which the plaintiff had admitted in his presence, but as to the adjudications, it was the fact which he swears was adjudicated, and not the adjudication, which was pleaded, and . . . his knowledge of the adjudication alone [did] not render him competent to verify the statement of the fact."

In Sioux Valley State Bank v. Kellog (1890) 81 Iowa, 124, 46 N. W. 859, an action on a promissory note, the defendant moved in the court below to strike the verification of the plaintiff's petition on the ground that, being made by the attorney for the plaintiff, it failed to show that he had knowledge of the statements contained in the petition or to show his competency to make the affidavits, in accordance with the provisions of the statute (Code, § 2672). It was held that the verification was sufficient, because it was made under § 2951 of the Code, which provided that the petition in an action wherein an attachment is sought must be verified, but which contained no provision to the effect that the competency of the affiant must be shown in the verification.

And see Hoopes v. Buford & G. Implement Co. (1891) 45 Kan. 549, 26 Pac. 34, which was an action brought by a corporation against partners, at the same time that an order of attachment was procured by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's reply was verified by one of its attorneys, the signed affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that he believes the facts stated in the foregoing answer to be true, and the reason why this affidavit is not made by the plaintiff is, that said plaintiff is not a resident of and is now absent from the state." It was contended that this verification was not sufficient, for the reason that it did not state that the facts set out in the plaintiff's pleading were within the personal knowledge of the attorney verifying. The court held that, in view of the statute (Civ. Code, §§ 108 and 114), the court below did not commit any material error in overruling an objection to the pleading until after a large portion of the evidence had been introduced, and that the trial court probably at that time had the discretion either to overrule the objection, as it did, or to require that the verification be amended.

In Ross v. Longmuir (1862) 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 326, the signed verification of the answer by the defendant's agent was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is, and has for a long time been, agent for the defendant in this action; that the foregoing answer is true to his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Deponent further says that the reason why the verification is not made by the defendant is that all the material allegations in the answer are within the personal knowledge of deponent, and not within the personal knowledge of the defendant." The statute (Code, § 57) allowed the affidavit of verification to be made by the agent or attorney of the party in a case where the action or defense was founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only. It was contended that the affidavit failed to set forth the knowledge or the grounds of belief of the agent who made it. It was held that the verification was not defective, since there was nothing in the answer stated on information and belief, but each and every allegation was stated positively, and without qualification, so that that part of the affidavit which referred to matters in the answer supposed to have been stated on information and belief might be treated as surplusage.

2. Statement of grounds of information or belief.

(a) Majority rule.

Under the various statutes it is generally held that when an agent or attorney verifies on information and belief he must also allege in his affidavit the grounds of such information and belief, or at least it must appear that he has some knowledge touching the matter, on which to form a belief.

In Bank of Maine v. Buel (1857) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 311, the verification of the complaint by the plaintiff's attorney read as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says he is plaintiff's attorney in this action, and that the foregoing complaint is true to the knowledge of this deponent, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. And deponent further says that the drafts or bills of exchange set out in the complaint are both in the possession of deponent; and he has heard defendant, in talking of same, admit, or at least assume, that they were genuine, and that he had the money thereon from the plaintiff; and the same information has been communicated to deponent by the president of said bank (the plaintiff.)" It was held that the verification of both the complaint and the answer was insufficient, because in each case the attorney failed to give the grounds of his belief.

In Bank of Orleans v. Skinner (1841) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 307, the verification of the bill was by the agent of the complainant corporation. The affiant stated in the affidavit that he had read the bill and knew the contents thereof, that he had information as to all the matters stated therein, and that a number of the material and important facts stated in the bill and the principal part thereof he knew of his own knowledge to be true, and that he believed all the statements in the bill were true. It was held that the affidavit was defective in not stating what allegations in the bill were matters within his own knowledge, and what were founded upon his belief only, as derived from the information of others.

In Bowery Sav. Bank v. Ward (1919) 188 App. Div. 598, 177 N. Y. Supp. 219, a verification of a complaint by plaintiff's agent was held insufficient for the reasons (1) that there were three paragraphs of the complaint the facts contained in which were alleged upon information and belief, and that as to those matters there was no averment as required by the Code, that the affiant believes it to be true; and (2) that the verification being by the agent and not by the party, he failed to set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to those three paragraphs.

In Soutter v. Mather (1862) 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 440, an action on a promissory note, the signed verification of the complaint by one of the firm of plaintiff's attorneys read as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is one of the firm of Benedict & Boardman, the attorneys for the plaintiff in this action; that the foregoing complaint is true to his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Deponent further says that this action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only; namely, under a promissory note; and such instrument is in the possession of deponent's said firm, as attorneys for the plaintiff." The verification in the answer by the affidavit of one of the defendant's attorneys was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is one of the attorneys for the defendant Mather in this action, and that he has read the foregoing answer, and knows the contents thereof; and that the same is true according to this deponent's belief; that the reason why he believes the same to be true is because the said defendant Mather told him so." The plaintiff's attorney returned the answer as not sufficiently verified. The defendant's attorneys reserved the answer, calling plaintiff's attention to the fact that they claimed the right to serve an unverified answer, on the ground of the defective verification of the complaint. The plaintiff entered judgment by default as for want of answer, which defendant moved to vacate. The court granted the motion, apparently on the ground that the attorney should have stated his grounds of belief, saying: "It is laid down that, in all cases of verification by an attorney, he must state his knowledge or grounds of belief. The cases of Meads v. Gleason (1856) 13 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 309, and Treadwell v. Fassett (1854) 10 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 184, in which the court held the verifications defective, were actions on promissory notes, the verifications were by attorney in substantially the same form as the verification to the complaint in this action. As these decisions were rendered at special terms in other districts, I should not feel bound to follow them if I thought them erroneous; but I think the construction given by these decisions to the section of the Code under consideration correct."

In Stannard v. Mattice (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 4, the complaint in the action was verified by the plain-tiff's attorney by a signed affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant] says that he has read the foregoing complaint, and that he knows the contents thereof and knows the same to be true, except as to the matters therein stated to be on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes the same to be true. That the reason plaintiff does not make this affidavit is that he resides in Albany county. Deponent has more knowledge of the record evidence and proceedings than the plaintiff; that he, this deponent, has been the plaintiff's attorney in all the proceedings set out in the complaint and knows the existence thereof as therein stated, of the deed in the clerk's office; heard the defendant admit the fact that said deed was executed when he was not present, and when said Henry Mattice was on his way off to leave this state. Deponent knows the fact, from information, that Henry Mattice was unembarrassed and owed no debts, and was in easy circumstances in January, 1850; that the plaintiff is a poor man and that it will be an unnecessary expense to send to him to make oath to his complaint, and further deponent says not." It was contended, without denying that the complaint could be made by attorney, that the verification as made by the attorney was insufficient. The statute then in force provided that the verification can be made by the party if such party is within the county where the attorney resides and capable of making the verification, and in no other case does the statute require the affidavit to be made by the party. But the same section further provides that the affidavit may be made by the agent or attorney if the action or defense be founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument be in the possession of the agent or attorney, or if all the material allegations of the pleading be within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. It is also provided in the same section that "where the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge" or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reasons why it is not made by the party. The complaint was held sufficient.

In Leach v. Keach (1858) 7 Iowa, 232, the reply was verified by the wife of the complainant, and, to show her means of information, and her ability to answer for the party, she stated that she was the wife of the complainant; that he was absent in California; that he left her his agent, and that she was well acquainted with his business before he left, and still was; that certain transactions, having taken place after his leaving, were peculiarly within her knowledge, and she stated reasons why she believed she had knowledge of others and that she verily believed the allegations in relation to the agreement to be untrue; and that, if such had existed, she could but believe that she would have known it; but did not claim any specific or certain knowledge upon this transaction. The court held the verification insufficient because the agent who made the sworn denial did not pretend any special information upon it, nor to such as might be supposed to arise from a general knowledge of her husband's affairs, and thus did not answer the requirement of the statute.

In Meads v. Gleason (1856) 13 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 309, a motion to set aside the judgment in an action brought on a promissory note, the complaint was verified by one of plaintiff's attorneys as follows: "[Affiant] of the city of Albany, being duly sworn, says that he is one of the plaintiff's attorneys in this action; that said plaintiff is not now within the county of Albany, where deponent resides; that this action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, to wit, the promissory note set forth and described in the foregoing complaint, and which note is now in the possession of deponent as such attorney; that the said complaint is true of deponent's own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes the same to be true." It was held that the verification was defective, since, in order to dispense with a verification by the party, the person who makes the affidavit, stating that the facts set forth in the pleading are true of his own knowledge, must state what knowledge he has on the subject; and when he states that he believes the facts alleged upon information and belief to be true, he must state the grounds on which his belief is founded; and then, in addition to this, he must go on to state why he and not the party makes the affidavit.

In Pickle v. Ezzell (1855) 27 Ala. 623, a claim against an insolvent estate, the statute (Code, § 1847) required all claims against insolvent estates to be verified by the oath of the claimant, or of some other person, "who knows the correctness of the claim, and that the same is due." The claims were verified by a third person who stated that said claims, "to the best of affiant's knowledge, information, and belief, are yet due and unpaid." It was held that the affidavit could not be regarded as a fulfilment of the requisition of the Code provision, in that it did not show that the affiant had any knowledge either as to the correctness of the claim or that it was then due, and that even if no objection had been made to it, the court should have allowed the claim.

So in another case, involving a claim against an insolvent estate, it was held that the affidavit of a person not a party to the claim "that the annexed account is just and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief" did not sufficiently verify the claim. Dennis v. Coker (1859) 34 Ala. 611.

In Hubbard v. National Protection Ins. Co. (1855) 11 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 149, an action on a fire insurance policy, the complaint was verified by the plaintiff's attorney. The affidavit read as follows: "The matters and things stated in the complaint are true, except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief, and that as to those matters he believes it to be true; that the action is founded on an instrument for the payment of money only, which instrument was in his possession as attorney for the plaintiffs, neither of whom were residents of Erie county, where the attorney resided, nor was either of them capable of making the affidavit verifying the complaint." The statute (Code, § 157) "requires, when a pleading is verified by any person other than the party, that the party verifying 'shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reasons why it is not made by the party.'" It was held that the verification was defective, since the affiant did not set forth his knowledge or the ground of his belief on that subject.

In Re Hotchkiss (1881) 58 Cal. 39, a proceeding to remove an attorney at law, it was required that, in such proceedings, when brought at the instance of some other person than the court, the "accusation" must be verified by oath "to the effect that the charges therein contained are true" (Code Civ. Proc. § 291). The statute relating to verification, generally, provided as follows: "Where a pleading is verified, it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the parties are absent from the county where the attorney resides, or from some cause unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same. When the pleading is verified by the attorney, or any other person except one of the parties, he must set forth in the affidavit the reason why it is not made by one of the parties." The accusation was signed by two persons styling themselves informants, and all the allegations of acts involving moral turpitude of the attorney sought to be removed were "upon information." The affidavit attached, subscribed by a third person, was that the affiant, "being duly sworn, says that he has read the foregoing information, and knows the contents thereof, and the same is true of his own knowledge except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes them to be true." It was held that the verification was insufficient in form and substance, because there was no pretense in the accusation or affidavit that the affiant had any information on the subject except such as might be derived from the recitals in the accusation, and that anyone else who had confidence in the complainants could have made the affidavit.

But in Patterson v. Ely (1861) 19 Cal. 28, an action in ejectment, the complaint was verified by one of the plaintiffs, who "says the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on the information and belief of plaintiffs, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." The statute (Practice Act, § 55) declared that the verification to the complaint complied with the statute treating the complaint in an action of ejectment, and another statute (§ 113) provided a somewhat different form, but in substance the same, where an injunction is sought, requiring that the affidavit must state that "the person making the oath has read the complaint, or heard the complaint read, and knows the contents thereof." It was held that the verification of the complaint was sufficient under § 55, treating the complaint as a pleading in an action of ejectment, and that, without the use of the words required by § 113, a knowledge of the contents of a pleading is affirmed by everyone who undertakes to swear to its truth. On rehearing, it was further held that § 55 should have a reasonable interpretation, so that if the pleading does not contain a statement of any matters on information or belief, there can be no occasion for any expression of belief in the affidavit as to such matters, the object of the verification being to insure good faith in the averments of the party; hence, if the pleader avers positively, the verification will be sufficient if the affiant states that the pleading is true of his knowledge; and if he avers matters "upon information and belief," or "upon information or belief," the verification will be sufficient if his affidavit states that as to the matters thus alleged he believes the pleading to be true, and that to require anything further would be to sink the evident spirit and object of the statute into a mere observance of its letter.

In Hecht v. Friesleben (1888) 28

S. C. 181, 5 S. E. 475, an action by alleged copartners on an account, the complaint was verified by one of the plaintiffs' attorneys as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says he is an attorney for the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action; that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. That the sources of his knowledge and information are the possession of a verified itemized statement of the account sued upon, the admissions and statements of the defendant. . . . That the reason this verification is made by one of the plaintiffs is that neither of them is in this county or state, in which defendant is a resident." The Code required that, "when the pleading is verified by any other person than the party, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reasons why it is not made by the party." It was held that the verification was not sufficient in substance, since it was of the most general and indefinite character and did not state what were the admissions or statements of the defendant, or what were the statements of the third persons named, or that the defendant admitted all or even any material allegation of the complaint, or made any specific statements from which such admission might be inferred, and what was the nature of the statements made by the third persons did not appear, and there was no fact stated in the verification from which the court could infer that there was any ground for the belief that all the material allegations of the complaint were true.

In Bridgeford v. The Elk (1840) 6 Mo. 356, a suit instituted under the Boats and Vessels Act (Rev. Code 1835, p. 103) the verification was by an individual not a party, agent, or attorney. The affidavit annexed to the complaint read as follows: "[Affiant] . . . on his oath declareth and saith that the above complaint is true, to the best of his knowledge and belief." It was held that the affidavit was not sufficient, since the person making the affidavit, obviously not being the party complaining, did not show what means he had of knowing the truth of any of the particulars specified, and, coupled with the qualifying words at the end of his affidavit, might have been under a great misconception of the construction which its law would put on it.

In Dixwell v. Wordsworth (1849) 2 N. Y. Code Rep. 1, the answer was verified by the defendant's attorney, his affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant], being sworn, says he is attorney for the defendant above named, and resides at Hyde Park in the county of Dutchess, and that said defendant resides in but is now absent from the county of Dutchess (being engaged in business at Yonkers in the county of Westchester, at which place he now remains), which absence of the defendant is the reason why this verification is not made by him. That from the information furnished this deponent by said defendant, and from his representations (which are the grounds of this deponent's knowledge and belief in the matter) he believes the foregoing answer to be true." It was objected that if such a verification as this were allowed it would be a complete evasion of the spirit of the Code, for a defendant need but represent to his attorney that the answer is true, and then leave the county, to enable the attorney to verify the pleading, which he might safely do in this manner, although the answer were totally and wholly false. It was held that the verification was sufficient, the court saying that it is seldom that an attorney has more knowledge of the subject-matter of the action than that which he derives from the representations of his client, and such representations are sufficient grounds for the attorney to form a belief on the subject.

In Burgess v. Martin (1895) 111 Ala. 656, 20 So. 506, a bill praying for the discovery of assets and the appointment of a receiver, etc., the allegations of the bill were sworn to by a person named, "as true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief." It was held that if the affidavit were to be construed according to the general rule most unfavorable to the party relying on it, there was no room for affirmatively saying that the words used meant anything more than that the affiant believed the allegations of the bill to be true, although he had neither knowledge nor information of their truth, the court saying further: "As said by counsel for appellant, it is quite true that it is frequently necessary, especially in bills for discovery, as this one is, to aver facts 'upon information and belief.' This is not to say, however, that an averment upon either information or belief would be good. The form of the averment is that complainant has been informed and believes, and upon such information and belief charges the fact to be, etc., etc., and whether the allegations intended to be verified are made positively or upon information and belief, an affidavit of belief in their truth simply amounts to nothing. When the averment is positive the verification should be so. When it is upon information and belief, the verification should embrace both the facts that the affiant has been informed and believes them to be true, either in terms or by affirming positively that the facts alleged in the bill are true as therein stated."

Wilkin v. Gilman (1856) 13 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 225, was an action for labor and services. The verification of the answer was made by the defendant's attorney, stating that the defendant resided in New York city, and the attorney in the county of Sullivan. The affidavit of verification stated that "deponent's knowledge of the material allegations of the answer is founded upon communications made to him by the defendant, through his son." The verification then proceeded to state that the "answer is true of deponent's own knowledge, except such matters as are stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." It was held that the verification, although sufficient by the liberal construction enjoined by the framers of the Code, was awkwardly expressed, since the statements in the answer were made on information and belief, and the attorney was required to state in his verification why he believed the allegation to be true.

In High Rock Knitting Co. v. Bronner (1896) 18 Misc. 627, 43 N. Y. Supp. 725, the complaint of a domestic corporation was verified by the attorney. The affidavit of the verification contained the following language: "And this deponent's knowledge is derived from information received from the letters of plaintiff now in deponent's possession, and also from the admissions of defendant to this deponent on the 29th day of October, 1896, that he was owing the full amount as claimed in the complaint and that it would be due as therein stated on the 30th day of October, 1896." The Code required a person making a verification, other than party, to set forth "the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated by his knowledge." It was held that while the language was not in the form usually employed, it was sufficient.

In Cowles v. Hardin (1878) 79 N. C. 577, a civil action to recover land was brought under a statute which directed "that the complaint shall be sworn to as is prescribed in other actions." The signed verification was by an agent of the plaintiff, and read: "[Affiant], agent of the plaintiff, makes oath that the facts herein stated are true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief." The Code (§§ 116, 117) declared that the oath must be to the effect that the complaint or other pleading verified "is true to the knowledge of the person making it, except as to those matters stated upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." It was held that the complaint was insufficient, since the proceeding was special and the essential requirements of the statute must be observed.

In Plant v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. (1893) 92 Ga. 636, 19 S. E. 719, a process of garnishment, it was held that the statement by an agent of the garnishee that the answer was true to the best of his knowledge and belief was insufficient, without a further statement pointing out what facts he knew and what facts he believed, together with the grounds of his belief.

In Clute Bros. v. Hazleton (1879) 51 Iowa, 355, 1 N. W. 672, an action on a promissory note, the reply was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys, by an affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, deposes and says: I am the principal attorney for the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action; that all the correspondence had by plaintiffs or their attorney, in regard to said action, has been had with me; that I have the contract of purchase of said engine in my possession (or copy of same); that I believe the above reply to be correct and true; that said plaintiffs are nonresidents of the state of Iowa, and are not now within the state of Iowa." It was held that the affidavit was insufficient, since it failed to show the affiant to be competent, in that he did not state in the affidavit, as required, that he had any knowledge whatever of the truth of the allegations in the answer or reply.

In Yoe v. Nichols (1879) 51 Iowa, 330, 1 N. W. 664, an action on account for goods sold and delivered, the reply read as follows: "Comes now the plaintiff in this cause and for reply avers the following facts: That as to the truth of the facts stated in the answer of defendant, on which affirmative relief is asked other than as a defense pro tanto to plaintiffs' claim, plaintiffs have no knowledge sufficient to form a belief, and therefore deny them." It was verified by a signed affidavit of the plaintiffs' attorney as follows: "[Affiant] being duly sworn, on oath deposes and says: I am one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs in this cause; that plaintiffs are a co-partnership residing in Chicago, in the state of Illinois; that I have held no correspondence with plaintiffs since the filing of defendant's amended answer, and I believe they can have no knowledge of the facts stated therein, nor of the truth of said facts; that since the commencing this action I have had sole charge of the same, and my knowledge of the facts and the truth of the facts stated in said answer is better than any knowledge thereof that plaintiffs could have; that I know the contents of the foregoing reply, and the facts stated therein are true as I believe." By statute (Code, § 2673), "if the statements of a pleading are known to any other person than the party, such person may make the affidavit which shall contain averments showing affiant competent to make the same." It was held that the verification was sufficient, since plaintiffs had not sufficient knowledge to form a belief, and the affiant stated this to be true as he believes, which is sufficient in the absence of a statute providing otherwise.

In Thomas v. Kean (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 190 S. W. 847, the verification of the answer by one of the defendant's attorneys read as follows: "[Affiant], one of the attorneys for defendant herein, deposes and says that the things set forth in the foregoing answer are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, formed upon information furnished by his client." The statute (Act 33 Leg. chap. 217 [Vernon's Sayles's Anno. Civ. Stat. 1914, arts. 1827, 1829, 1829a, 1829b]) required that the affiant must state the pleadings are true, or that he "believes" them true. The affidavit was held defective, since it should be positive to the truth of the statements made in the answer, or it must show that the affiant believes them to be true.

In American Audit Co. v. Industrial Federation (1908) 84 App. Div. 304, 82 N. Y. Supp. 642, in which the answer was verified by the signed affidavit of the attorney for the defendant as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney for the above-named defendant; that he has read the foregoing answer; that the same is true to the knowledge of the deponent, except as to those matters therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and that as to those matters he believes it to be true, and that the reason why this verification is not made by the defendant is that the said defendant is a foreign corporation." Among other things it was claimed that the affidavit was defective in that the attorney did not set forth the grounds of his belief, but it was held that the verification was in proper form, the court saying: "It is claimed that the verification is defective in that the attorney did not set forth the grounds of his belief, but the allegations of the answer are not on information and belief. On the contrary, the defendant denies any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. It is difficult to see, where one has no knowledge or information whatever on a subject, how he can state the grounds of his belief. The answer is in proper form to raise an issue. The verification is in proper form, and is verified by a proper person."

The requirement of the Code that, where the verification is by a person other than the party, "he must set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge," was held in Davidson v. Penn-Virginia Coal & Coke Co. (1919) 109 Misc. 180, 178 N. Y. Supp. 205, to be sufficiently complied with in case of verification of an answer by the vice president of a foreign corporation by the statement that the sources of deponent's information and the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated on his knowledge are the books and records of said corporation. The court said that, taking these words in a reasonably broad sense, it was fair to infer that the books and records contained information relative to the matters in question in the answer, and that there was a sufficient presumption of the truth of such sources of information to warrant the court in treating the affidavit as a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Code.

Compare Johnson v. Case (1916) 97 Misc. 247, 162 N. Y. Supp. 841, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 179 App. Div. 948, 165 N. Y. Supp. 1093, where in it was held that, when the treasurer of an unincorporated association verifies a pleading as provided by statute, he does so as to the plaintiff himself, and thus it is not the case of an agent or attorney verifying, and his verification, therefore, is not rendered defective because the affidavit fails to state the sources of his information and the grounds of his belief, as required by statute (Code, § 526).

However, it has been held in Wisconsin that it is not necessary to allege specifically in the affidavit of verification the source of information or grounds of belief. Taylor v. Robinson (1870) 26 Wis. 545; Roosevelt v. Ulmer (1898) 98 Wis. 356, 74 N. W. 124.

Thus in Taylor v. Robinson (Wis.) supra, an action to recover the balance due on a bill of goods and merchandise, the allegations in the complaint were positive and direct, but the verification was made by the attorney, who stated that he believed each and every allegation to be true, stating fully his grounds of belief on the subject and the reasons why the complaint was not verified by one of the plaintiffs. It was contended that because the allegations in the complaint were absolute and unqualified, the verification should have stated that the same were true to the knowledge of the attorney. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since, when a pleading is verified by the agent or attorney upon information or belief, the form of the averments is not material, because the conscience of the person making the affidavit may be as firmly bound, and perjury as well assigned, when the averments are direct and positive, as when they are made on information and belief. If he makes the affidavit without having reasonable grounds for believing, and without believing, that all the material facts and allegations are true, in whichever form they may be stated, he is forsworn, and upon proper proof may be convicted of perjury.

In Roosevelt v. Ulmer (1898) 98 Wis. 356, 74 N. W. 124, an action to recover instalments due on the lease of certain real estate, the plaintiff being a nonresident, the complaint was verified by his agent and attorney, the principal allegations in the complaint being made on knowledge. The verification showed that the affiant had acted as agent for the plaintiff in collecting rents from the defendants for several years, and as to the allegations in the complaint made upon information and belief the affiant stated in effect that the grounds of his belief were founded on and derived from such transactions. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the affiant's agency would necessarily place him in possession of the material facts, and the grounds of his belief are shown to have been founded upon and derived from transactions wherein he was the plaintiff's agent.

c. Action on written instrument for payment of money.

1. In general.

It is generally provided by statute that an agent or attorney, having in his possession a written instrument for the payment of money only on which the action or defense is founded, may verify the pleadings. See Gibson v. Shorb (1898) 7 Kan. App. 732, 52 Pac. 579; Smith v. Mulliken (1858) 2 Minn. 319, Gil. 273; Abbott v. Campbell (1903) 69 Neb. 371, 95 N. W. 591; Boykins Buggy Co. v. Lightsey (1915) 102 S. C. 283, 86 S. E. 639.

In Boykins Buggy Co. v. Lightsey (S. C.) supra, an action on a check and three sealed notes, the complaint was verified by the plaintiff's attorney, who stated in the verification, in substance, that the facts were true of his own knowledge, so far as knowledge of them could be derived from the instruments sued on, and that the allegations in each cause of action were based on information derived from correspondence with the plaintiff and the instruments sued on, which were in his possession, and that he made the verification as attorney for the plaintiff. The objection to the verification was that it failed to show why it was not made by the plaintiff. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 207) provided that the verification might be made by the attorney, if the action were founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only, and if that instrument were in the possession of the attorney. The statute also provided that, when verification shall be made by the attorney, he shall set forth in his affidavit his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject, which was done, and the reason why it was not made by the party. It was held that the complaint was sufficiently verified.

In Abbott v. Campbell (1903) 69 Neb. 371, 95 N. W. 591, the petition was verified by an attorney, who stated, among other things, that the action was founded "upon a contract for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in my possession." It was held that the verification was not rendered defective by its failure to state expressly that the instrument sued on was written, and that the verification was not subject to the objection that it did not state that the action was founded upon a "written instrument for the payment of money only," as required by statute (Code, § 120), since the verification of a pleading need not be in the exact words of the statute, it being sufficient if the substance of the statutory requirements be fairly set forth.

In Smith v. Milliken (1858) 2 Minn. 319, Gil. 273, an action on a foreign judgment, the complaint was verified by the attorney for the plaintiff under a statute (March 1, 1856, Sess. Laws 1856, p. 687) which provided that "when the action or defense is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney," the pleading may be verified by such agent or attorney. The verification was held to be insufficient, because the words "written instrument for the payment of money only," in the statute, referred to and comprehended bills of exchange, notes, bonds, contracts, or any instrument, the creature of contracting parties, containing stipulations for the payment of money only, but did not include a judgment.

In Gibson v. Shorb (1898) 7 Kan. App. 732, 52 Pac. 579, an action for an amount due on a promissory note, the answer of one of the defendants was verified by an affidavit reading as follows: "[Affiant] . . . says that he is attorney for the defendant, Perry A. Gibson; that said Perry A. Gibson is a nonresident of the state, and is at this time absent therefrom; that affiant has read the allegations of the foregoing answer, and that the allegations therein contained are true, as affiant is informed and verily believes." A section (108) of the statute provided that certain allegations shall be taken as true unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent, or attorney. Section 111 provided that if the affidavit states that such party, agent, or attorney believes the facts stated in the pleading to be true, it shall be sufficient. Section 114 provided four different grounds on which the affidavit might be made by the agent or attorney, and the affidavit of the agent or attorney must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party: First, "when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney." Second, "when the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned." Third, "when the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney." Fourth, "when the party is not a resident of or is absent from the county." It was held that the complaint was sufficiently verified, since each reason was clearly sufficient within itself, and entirely independent of the other reasons.

But it has also been held that, in view of other statutory provisions requiring one who verifies for another to state the sources of his knowledge and the grounds of his information or belief, these allegations must be made in addition to alleging possession of the instrument. In Marshall Field Co. v. Oren Ruffcorn Co. (1902) 117 Iowa, 159, 90 N. W. 618, an action seeking recovery on three promissory notes, wherein it was said that where the officer of a corporation verifies a pleading under his statutory authority to do so (Code, § 3581) it is probable that the officer should show knowledge of the facts in order for him to verify an answer denying the signature of the notes.

held that an account verified by the maker, an officer of a corporation, is not a written instrument for the payment of money only, since the affiant could not say that the items as they appeared in the account were correct.

In Kerns v. Roberts (1861) 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 537, an action on a promissory note, verification of the petition by the signed affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney read as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney for the plaintiff in the above action, and that the note and mortgage upon which this action is brought are now in his possession, and that the facts stated in the allegations in the foregoing petition are true, as affiant believes." The statute contained the following provisions: "Every pleading of fact must be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent, or attorney; when the affidavit is made by the agent or attorney, it must set forth the reason why it is not made by the party himself. It can be made by the agent or attorney only (1) when the facts are within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney; (2) when the plaintiff is an infant, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned; (3) when the pleading to be verified is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent or attorney; (4) when the party is not a resident of or is absent from the county." It was urged that the mortgage on which the action was founded was a written instrument for the payment of money only. It was held that the affidavit was insufficient, since the mortgage itself was in the usual form to secure a promissory note, and while the note was an "instrument for the payment of money only," the mortgage was a pledge only and contained no promise to pay.

2. Rule in New York.

In New York, the decisions, with the exception of two early cases, support the general rule that an agent or attorney having in his possession a written instrument for the payment of money only, on which an action or defense is founded, may verify the pleadings. Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v. Stever (1899) 29 Misc. 571, 62 N. Y. Supp. 249; Hyde v. Saig (1882) 27 Hun, 369; Kirkland v. Aiken (1870) 66 Barb. 211; Smith v. Rosenthall (1855) 11 How. Pr. 442; Mason v. Brown (1852) 6 How. Pr. 481; Syracuse Moulding Co. v. Squires (1890) 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 241.

In Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v. Stever, supra, it was held that a statement contained in the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney that he had the contract on which the action was brought for the recovery of money only was sufficient to bring the complaint within the provision of the statute (Code, § 925, subd. 3), which authorized the agent or attorney for the plaintiff to verify a complaint, "where the action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, which is in the possession of the agent or attorney."

In Mason v. Brown (1852) 6 How. Pr. 481, an action on a promissory note, the affidavit of verification subjoined to plaintiff's reply was as follows: "The reply is true of the defendant's own knowledge, except as to matters stated upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true; that the ground of his belief is information derived from . . . the payee of the note mentioned in the complaint, and which he believes to be true; that the action is founded upon a written instrument, which is in the possession of the attorney; that the reason why the affidavit was not made by the plaintiff was that he resided at Nashua in the state of New Hampshire, and was not present to make it." By statute (Code, § 157) the affidavit of the attorney was allowable, when the action or defense was founded on a written instrument and when all the material allegations of the pleading were within his knowledge. It was held that the verification was sufficient, as the attorney showed his right to make affidavit under the first provision, and in such case it is unnecessary to bring himself within the latter.

sory note, the affidavit verifying the complaint was by one of the attorneys of the plaintiff, who stated, in addition to what was required in an affidavit of verification by a party, that he had in his possession the promissory note on which the action was brought. It was contended that the affidavit was defective in omitting to state the grounds of belief of the attorney; that the complaint was true; and the reason why it was not made by the party. It was held that the affidavit of verification was sufficient under the second clause of the statute (Code, § 157), since, when the action or defense is on a written instrument for the payment of money only, and the pleading is on information or belief, the affidavit is good, if it is stated by the agent or attorney that the instrument is in his possession, and that this sufficiently showed the ground of his belief and the reason why the party did not make the affidavit as provided under the third clause of the statute.

In Hyde v. Salg (1882) 27 Hun, 369, the verification of the complaint by one of the plaintiff's attorneys was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action, and that the within complaint is true to his knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated to be alleged on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. That said action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, now in deponent's possession for collection, which said instrument is the source of deponent's information and belief." It was held that if the affidavit had used "as the grounds of his belief," instead of "the source of deponent's information and belief," it would have been in the exact language of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 526), and that the verification was in substantial compliance with that section in that regard.

In Kirkland v. Aiken (1870) 66 Barb. 211, an action on a promissory note, the complaint was verified by the agent of the plaintiffs, having in his possession the note on which the action was brought, according to the provisions of § 157 of the Code. The defendants in their answer alleged that the note was given on the purchase by the defendant of certain goods of the plaintiffs, and set up by way of defense a warranty of quality of the goods, and a breach thereof, claiming damages therefor. The plaintiffs' attorney served a reply to the counterclaim, also verified by the agent by an affidavit in which he stated that he was the agent of the plaintiffs for the purpose of collecting the demand set forth in the complaint; that the action was founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only; that such instrument was in the possession of the deponent; and also stated the grounds of his belief as to the truth of the allegations of the reply, and the reasons why the verification was not made by the plaintiffs. The defendants' attorney returned the reply on the ground, amongst others, that it was not properly verified. The verification was held sufficient, the court saying: "In this case the action 'is founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only, and such instrument is in the possession of the agent.' Whatever plausibility there may be in the argument that the possession of the written instrument does not, in a case like the present, help the agent to any knowledge or information concerning the truth of the matters alleged in the reply, yet reasons might be suggested why the legislature should have intentionally provided that the agent, who is competent to verify the complaint for this reason, should also be permitted to verify the reply, and be enabled to bring the action to a speedy issue. At all events, the alleged absurdity is not so manifest as to require us to put a construction upon this provision of the Code which is not in accordance with its clear and explicit language. The order appealed from is affirmed."

However, the view that, in addition to the allegations as to the written instrument, the attorney must also state knowledge or grounds of belief, is supported by two early cases in New York: Matthews v. Smith (1886) 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 165; Treadwell v. Fassett (1854) 10 How Pr. 184. See also Gamble v. Beattie (1849) 4 How. Pr. 41.

In McConnell v. Fried (1919) 176 N. Y. Supp. 521, where the answer in an action on notes alleged "upon information and belief" that the notes were obtained from the defendant by plaintiff by duress and fraud, the verification by the defendant's attorney which was held sufficient contained the statement that the reason the verification was made by him was that the defendant was absent from the city and county of New York, and that the sources of deponent's information were personal interviews had with the defendant.

3. Rule in North Carolina.

In Griffin v. Asheville Light Co. (1892) 111 N. C. 434, 16 S. E. 423, an action on a promissory note, the complaint was verified by counsel for the plaintiffs, who stated with respect to his right to verify that plaintiffs were nonresidents of the state, "and there is not now time for this complaint to be forwarded to them for verification and be returned in time to be filed within the first three days of this term, and for the further reason that this action is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, which is in affiant's possession; that affiant has read the foregoing complaint and knows the contents thereof; that the same is true of his own knowledge, except it be as to matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true." The statute (Code, § 258) provided that, whenever the party was a non-resident of the county, the pleading might be verified by an agent or attorney in two cases: First, when the action was on written instrument for the payment of money only, and the instrument was in possession of the agent or attorney; second, when all the material allegations of the pleadings were within the personal knowledge of the agent or attorney. It was held that the verification was sufficient, since the allegation of the possession of the note sued on was an allegation of the "knowledge or ground of belief" of the matters in the complaint, material to be shown by plaintiff. In Johnson v. Maxwell (1882) 87 N. C. 18, an action to recover the amount due on several promissory notes, the plaintiff's agent and attorney made the signed affidavit to the replication, which was similar to that annexed to the complaint and was as follows: "[Affiant] makes oath that the plaintiffs are all nonresidents; that he is both agent and attorney for them in this county and state; that the claims sued on are all in writing and in his possession for collection; that most of the facts involved are in his personal knowledge, or derived from correspondence with the plaintiffs, and from frequent interviews for them with defendant, . . . and that the same are true except those stated on information and belief, and as to those he believes them true." It was held that the affidavit was in substantial compliance with the statute, and fulfilled the conditions prescribed when the verifying oath is made by the agent or attorney.

4. Rule in Wisconsin.

In Wisconsin, the majority of cases hold that, in view of the other statutory provisions requiring one who verifies for another to state the sources of his knowledge and grounds of his belief, these allegations must be made in an affidavit verifying a pleading, in addition to alleging possession of the instrument. Hecht v. Chase (1914) 158 Wis. 342, 149 N. W. 29; Closson v. Chase (1914) 158 Wis. 346, 149 N. W. 26; Crane v. Wiley (1861) 14 Wis. 658; Gillet v. Houghton (1858) 8 Wis. 311.

In Hecht v. Chase, supra, a suit on two promissory notes, the complaint was verified by the signed affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney in part as follows: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn on oath, says that he is the attorney for the above-named plaintiff in said action; that he has read the foregoing complaint and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true to his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. And deponent further says that the said action is founded on two certain written instruments for the payment of money only, and that said written instruments are now in his possession as such attorney, and that the reason why this affidavit is not made by the plaintiff is that the said plaintiff resides at Logansport, in the state of Indiana, and is not now within the county in which deponent resides." It was held that the verification was fatally defective, since, to support it, it would be necessary to hold that it would be a sufficient statement of the affiant's "knowledge and belief" to state that the written instrument was in the affiant's possession.

In Crane v. Wiley (1861) 14 Wis. 658, an action on a promissory note, all the allegations of the complaint were positive, none being stated on information and belief. The verification by plaintiff's attorney was as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says he is one of the attorneys of the plaintiff in this action; that the foregoing amended complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true; that the note referred to in said complaint is now in his possession, as one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, which is the ground of his belief. And deponent further says that the plaintiff in this action does not verify the said complaint for the reason that he does not reside in, and is now absent from the county . . . where his attorney resides." The statute provided that when the pleading is verified by another person, he shall set forth in the affidavit his knowledge or the grounds of his belief. It was held that while the attorney was authorized to verify the complaint, the verification was defective in not stating what knowledge the attorney had on the subject.

In Gillet v. Houghton (1858) 8 Wis. 311, it was held that the verification by an attorney of the complaint in an action upon a promissory note was sufficient, where the attorney not only alleged that the claim was founded on an instrument in writing for the payment of money only, and that the same was in his possession, but that his belief of the facts set forth was founded upon his possession of such instrument and the signature of the defendant thereto with which he was acquainted.

In Closson v. Chase (1914) 158 Wis. 846, 149 N. W. 26, an action on several promissory notes, a dishonorable check, and an account, the signed verification by the plaintiff's attorney was in the following words: "[Affiant], being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is the attorney for the above-entitled plaintiff, and makes this verification for and in his behalf and was authorized so to do; that he has read the foregoing complaint and knows the contents thereof and that the same is true; that the reason this verification is not made by the plaintiff is: (1) For the reason the notes described in the foregoing complaint, the check, and account, are for the payment of money only, and the said notes, check, and account, correspondence between defendant and payees in said notes, are all in affiant's possession, and form the grounds of affiant's belief as to the allegations set forth in said complaint. (2) That the said plaintiff is a nonresident of the state." It was held that the affidavit was a substantial compliance with the statute, though the attorney used the words, "is true," instead of "believes to be true."

However, in Market Nat. Bank v. Hogan (1867) 21 Wis. 318, an action on two promissory notes, the verification of the complaint was by one of the plaintiff's attorneys and stated that the complaint was true to affiant's own knowledge, except as to those matters which were therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believed it to be true; and that "the reason why this verification is not made by the plaintiff is, as well that said plaintiff is a corporation and nonresident . . . in said state, as that this action is founded upon written instruments for the payment of money only, and that such instruments are in the possession of deponent; and that his knowledge is derived from said instruments, and from the admission of the agent of the plaintiff to deponent in regard thereto; and that the grounds of his belief are the possession of said instruments and the aforesaid admissions." The statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 125, § 19) provided that the attorney might verify, if the action or defense were founded on a written instrument for the payment of money only; or if all the material allegations of the pleadings were within his personal knowledge. A subsequent provision was to the effect that, when a corporation is a party, verification may be made by an officer thereof. It was held that the verification was sufficient.

It is provided by statute in many jurisdictions that a pleading may be verified by the agent or attorney if the party is absent from the county in which the attorney resides, but that fact must be stated positively in the affidavit. Stephens v. Parrish (1890) 83 Cal. 561, 23 Pac. 797; Burgess v. Jacobs (1854) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 517; Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr (1898) 102 Ky. 586, 44 S. W. 216; Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt (1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500; Neuberger v. Webb (1881) 24 Hun (N. Y.) 347; Roscoe v. Maison (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 121; Lyons v. Murat (1877) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 23; Pardi v. Conde (1899) 27 Misc. 496, 58 N. Y. Supp. 410, reversing (1899) 26 Misc. 202, 29 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 48, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1004; Levey v. Duff (1904) 90 N. Y. Supp. 410; Frisk v. Reigelman (1890) 75 Wis. 499, 117 Am. St. Rep. 198, 43 N. W. 1117, 44 N. W. 766; Morley v. Guild (1861) 13 Wis. 577.

In Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr (1898) 102 Ky. 586, 44 S. W. 216, an action by a corporation on an account, it appeared that the plaintiff's attorney made the affidavit for attachment, which read as follows: "[Affiant] says that the plaintiff is a corporation; that he is its attorney; that the above statements are true." By statute (Civ. Code of Prac. § 196), under certain conditions, the agent or attorney of the plaintiff might make the affidavit. Another Code provision (§ 550) was as follows: "Any affidavit which this Code requires or authorizes a party to make may, unless otherwise expressed, be made by his agent or attorney, if he be absent from the county. . . . (5) The affidavit of an agent or attorney must state the absence from the county of the party or parties for whom it is made, and the fact that the affiant is agent or attorney." And by another section (§ 117) it was provided as follows: "Pleadings, the verification of which is required by this Code, must be verified as follows: . . . (2) That of a county, or of a municipal or private corporation, must be verified by its chief officer or agent, upon whom a summons in the action is lawfully served, or might be lawfully served if it were a defendant; or, if it have no such officer nor agent residing in the county in which the action is brought, or is pending, it may be verified by its attorney." It was held that the affidavit was defective, since it was essential that the agent or attorney should state the absence from the county of the party for whom he was making the affidavit.

In Lyons v. Murat (1877) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 23, the plaintiffs served alleged replies to new matter which was set up in the answers of the defendants, which replies were verified by the plaintiff's attorney on the ground that he could not find the plaintiff in the city, and that it was his last day to reply. It was held that the verification was insufficient, in that it did not state any legal reason why it was not made by the party.

In Neuberger v. Webb (1881) 24 Hun (N. Y.) 347, a separate answer was verified by an attorney who stated that he resided in the county and that the answer was true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be on information and belief, and that as to those matters he believed the same to be true, giving as a reason why the verification was not made by the defendant that the latter was not a resident of or within the county, and stating that the grounds of the affiant's belief were statements made by his client to him. It was held that the verification was sufficient, under a statute (Code, § 525) which allowed a verification to be made when the party was not within the county in which the attorney resided.

In Levey v. Duff (1904) 90 N. Y. Supp. 410, an amended answer was verified by the attorney for the defendant who in addition to setting forth the usual statements required in the verification of pleadings, added that the reasons why the verification was not made by the defendant was that he was not within the county where the deponent resided. The contention was that it was verified by the attorney, instead of the plaintiff himself. The statute (Mun. Ct. Act, § 164, Laws 1902, p. 1541, chap. 580) provided that the verification of a pleading might be by a party or (§ 164, subd. 3), where the party was not within the county where the attorney resided, the verification might be made by the agent of or attorney for the party. The verification was held to be sufficient.

In Pardi v. Conde (1899) 27 Misc. 496, 58 N. Y. Supp. 410, reversing on other grounds (1899) 26 Misc. 202, 22 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 48, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1004, the answer was verified by the defendant's attorney in the usual form required by the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 525, subd. 3), to the effect that the defendant was not within the state, and also alleged the source of the information concerning matters stated in the answer. It was conceded by the attorney for the respondent that, had the answer been verified by the defendant in person, the objections made by the appellant to its sufficiency would have been well taken, but he claimed that, the defendant having been absent from the county and the verification having been made by his attorney, these facts were sufficient to take the case out of the rule that where the allegations set forth in a pleading must, from their very nature, be within the knowledge of the defendant, he cannot deny on information merely. It was held that the verification was sufficient, though the answer itself was insufficient, and the facts that the party was absent from the county, and that his attorney had verified it in due form of law, did not cure the defects in the pleading itself.

In Roscoe v. Maison (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 121, the verification of the reply was by the plaintiff's attorney. The statute (Civ. Code, § 156) provided that when any pleading was verified every subsequent pleading except a demurrer must also be verified. Section 157 provided that the verification "must be by the affidavit of the party, or if there be several parties united in the interest, and pleading together, by one at least of such parties acquainted with the facts—if such party be within the county where the attorney resides, and capable of making the affidavit." It was held that the reply could be verified by the attorney on the ground that his client was absent from the county, and that the attorney, by substantially swearing to that fact, stated a sufficient reason for making the affidavit himself.

In Frisk v. Reigelman (1890) 75 Wis. 499, 17 Am. St. Rep. 198, 43 N. W. 1117, 44 N. W. 766, an action on an account for goods sold and delivered wherein a writ of attachment was issued, the complaint was verified by the plaintiffs' attorney to the effect that he was such attorney and made the verification in their behalf; that he had read the complaint and knew the contents thereof, and verily believed the same to be true; that the sources of his information were derived from statements of the plaintiffs' account, and letters in reference thereto, received by him from the plaintiffs; and that the reason that the complaint was not verified by one of the plaintiffs was that none of them were within the county in which he resided. It was held that the verification was sufficient.

In Treen Motors Corp. v. Van Pelt

(1919) 106 Misc. 357, 174 N. Y. Supp. 500, the answer was verified by the affidavit of the defendant's attorney and read as follows: "That he is the attorney for defendant in the above-entitled action, and that he has read the answer herein and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true. That the reason this verification is made by deponent, and not by defendant, is that defendant is absent from the county where deponent has his principal office and place of business, and deponent is familiar with the facts." The statute (Code, § 525, subd. 3) provided that to justify an attorney verifying on the ground that his client is absent, it must be shown that the client is "not within the county where the attorney resides, or, if the [client] is not a resident of the state, the county where he has his office and capable of making the affidavit." It was held that the verification did not come within this rule.

IV. Miscellaneous.

In Solomon v. Huey (1880) 1 Posey Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 265, a suit on a promissory note against an administrator, it was held that the widow of an intestate, being better informed, and for the protection of her interest, which otherwise might be jeopardized, could intervene to make the affidavit to a plea of non est factum, where the administrator was unwilling to make the affidavit.

In Hoffman's Estate (1899) 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 496, from the language of the court it would seem that under a rule of the court counsel could not verify a petition purporting to be by a son of a testator, who was not an appellant from the decision of the register admitting the will of his late father to probate.

In Sizer v. Miller (1842) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 605, an action to dissolve an injunction, a creditor's bill was verified by one complainant and by the oaths of the attorneys of the other complainants, who swore positively to the recovery of the judgments and other proceedings in favor of their respective clients in the suits at law, and also to the amounts due thereon, stating that their clients respectively resided in the city of New York, and were not as well acquainted with any of the facts in the bill as were the deponents. It was held that the objection that the affidavits of the defendant showed that a receiver of his property was unnecessary was frivolous.

The affidavit of the real party in interest, who was not a party to the action, in the form prescribed by statute (Code, § 157), and who swore that he was the real party in interest, and had taken the defense of the action upon himself, has been held to be a sufficient verification of a pleading. Taber v. Gardner (1869) 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 147. To the same effect see Hart v. Oatman (1847) 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 229.

In Carter v. Vaulx (1858) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 639, an action of debt on a lost note, an affidavit by an individual to whom the note was sworn to have been mailed, to the effect that the note had never come into his possession, and that he believed it had been lost or miscarried in the mail, was held defective, because the note never came into his hands, and he knew nothing of its existence or loss. The verification was also held defective on the ground that it was not verified before the court, as required by statute.

Ely v. Frisbie (1861) 17 Cal. 250, was an appeal from an order granting an injunction, restraining the enforcement of a judgment recovered by the defendants for the possession of certain premises in the occupation of plaintiff. The verification to the answer by one of the defendants stated that his codefendant left this state before the complaint was filed, "and is not in this state; that the foregoing answer is true of this defendant's own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated to be upon information and belief of defendants, and as to those matters he, this defendant, believes the same to be true." It was held that the verification, although not complying in form with the exact language of the statute, was sufficient to entitle the answer to be considered as an affidavit as offered, and that exhibits of pleadings and proceedings in the action brought in the name of the United States did not require verification, or at least need be verified only by the clerk of the circuit court by the United States.

In Alapaugh v. Adams (1887) 80 Ga. 345, 5 S. E. 496, it was held that while the affidavit of counsel in verification of a bill was not sufficient to warrant the grant of an injunction, where they do not swear positively, the sufficiency of the affidavits of others produced at the hearing would not be affected by that defect.

In Warman v. First Nat. Bank (1897) 70 Ill. App. 181, affirmed in (1900) 185 Ill. 60, 49 L.R.A. 412, 57 N. E. 6, an action in assumpsit on a promissory note, it appeared that the general issue in assumpsit was verified by an agent of the defendants by an affidavit that he had read it and "verily believes the same to be true." It was held that, waiving the inquiry whether such affidavit must be by the party himself, such an affidavit did not verify the plea, the court saying: "Upon writ of error in a criminal case, the cause must be determined solely upon the record sent up to this court, and the only exception in civil cases is where there is a plea in this court to the assignment of errors, setting up extrinsic matters, such as a release of errors, etc. In the absence of such plea, the same rule obtains in civil cases."

In Imlay v. New York & H. R. Co. (1848) 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 94, 1 Sandf. 733, it was objected that the affidavit of no answer was made by a stranger to the suit, whereas it should be made by the attorney. The person making it was not described as a clerk, or in any manner. It was held that the affidavit of no answer ought to have been made by the attorney, or by a managing clerk, or by some person shown in the affidavit to have had charge of the suit or to be otherwise in a situation to have had knowledge of the matter, but the court further held that the case did not require a decision of this point, because in another affidavit filed therewith, made by such person and forming a part of the same record, he was described as the clerk of the plaintiff's attorney, that the court was bound to take the two affidavits together, and that it sufficiently appeared that the affiant was in entire charge of the suit, which was a sufficient answer to the objection.

In Moore v. Holmes (1897) 68 Minn. 108, 70 N. W. 872, an action on a promissory note wherein the answer specifically denied the making or signing of the note, the verification of the answer was made by the defendant's attorney on information and belief, the defendant then being absent from the county where she resided. A statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5751) provided that "every written instrument purporting to have been signed or executed by any person shall be proof that it was so signed or executed, until the person by whom it purports to have been signed or executed shall deny the signature or execution of the same by his oath or affidavit." It was held that while the general denial in the answer, verified on information and belief by the defendant's attorney, put in issue the execution of the note as a rule of pleading, the statutory requirement with reference to the necessity of denying the signature and execution of a written instrument was a rule of evidence, and not of pleading, and the failure of the defendant to comply with the statute in this respect, by denying her signature or the execution of the note by her oath or affidavit, entitled the plaintiff to put the note in evidence without first proving its execution.

In Hecht v. Friesleben (1888) 28 S. C. 181, 5 S. E. 475, an action by alleged copartners on an open account, the complaint was verified by one of the plaintiff's attorneys as follows: "[Affiant], being duly sworn, says he is an attorney for the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action; that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. That the sources of his knowledge and information are the possession of a verified itemized statement of the account sued upon, the admissions and statements of the defendant, and . . . others. That the reason this verification is not made by one of the plaintiffs is that neither of them is in this county or state, in which deponent is a resident." It was held that the complaint was objectionable, as the verification was not in such form as would make it practicable to maintain an action for perjury thereon.

In Beirne v. Imboden (1853) 14 Ark. 237, under a statute requiring one who has a claim against the estate of a deceased person to authenticate his claim by his own affidavit before evidence shall be heard to sustain it, it was held that an authentication of a claim by another than the claimant was not sufficient, within the provision of the statute.

In Hernick v. Union P. R. Co. (1911) 85 Kan. 568, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 826, 118 Pac. 60, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 208, it was held that the verification of a pleading by the agent or attorney of a corporation, under direct provisions of a statute (Civ. Code, § 112), was sufficient, without compliance with another statute (§ 116) providing the manner in which a verification should be made by an agent or attorney.

In Bowen v. Powell (1869) 1 Lans. (N. Y.) 1, the plaintiff claimed that a contract involved was made with a named agent of the defendants. The answer was verified by that agent. In the affidavit of verification, the affiant said that he was the agent for the defendants in the matters out of which the cause of action, as claimed by the plaintiff, arose, and was acquainted with and had personal knowledge of all the material allegations contained in the answer; and that he had read the answer and that the reason of his making the affidavit was that the defendants were nonresidents of the county, and neither was present to make it. The statute (Code, § 157) authorized the verification of a pleading to be made by an agent. The court did not discuss the sufficiency of the verification, but held that it was not competent evidence to prove the fact of agency.

In Thompson v. First Nat. Bank (1904) 85 Miss. 261, 37 So. 645, a suit brought by a trustee in bankruptcy against the defendant bank, the verification of the answer was by the president of the bank, and, in part, read that he was "the proper person, as well as duly authorized, to swear to the discovery given in answer to the interrogatories contained in said bill, and, further, that the matters stated in said discovery as of his knowledge are true of his own personal knowledge, and those things stated on information and belief in said discovery he personally believes to be true upon his own personal information and belief." It was held that as the affidavit was, by its terms, restricted to those allegations which were made in response to the prayers for discovery, and did not aver the truth of all of the allegations contained in the answer, it did not challenge the character in which the plaintiff sued, which, by statute, was required to be specially denied by a verified pleading.

In Gamble v. Beattie (1849) 4 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 41, the complaint was founded on a promissory note, and was verified by the oath of the plaintiff's attorney to the effect that he believed it to be true. The answer denied the substance of the complaint, set up payment, and was verified in the same manner by the attorney for the defendant. It was held that the verification of the answer was sufficient "under the old Code" (evidently the original Code, § 133), but that the answer was not verified according to the amended Code (§ 157).

In Seiffert v. People's Bank (1873) 2 Tenn. Ch. 17, it was held that the affidavit to a plea was defective under a statute (Code, § 2901) providing that the truth on a plea in abatement must be "verified by the oath of the party or otherwise," and the further requirement that the oath must be positive, and not on information or belief.

The point that an affidavit to a plaintiff's amended petition, to which interrogatories are attached, was made by an attorney, cannot be considered on appeal where it appears that it was not made in the trial court. Blair v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1899) 109 Iowa, 369, 80 N. W. 673. R. H. H.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Fairfield County (Booth, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a broker's commission. Reversed.

Statement by Gager, J.:

The defendant employed the plaintiff to sell certain real estate for $6,500, for a commission of 2½ per cent. The plaintiff attempted to sell to one Robertson, who refused to pay more than $5,500. The defendant then authorized a sale for $6,000, but Robertson still refused to pay more than $5,500. Thereupon, at the request of the defendant, she was by the plaintiff introduced to Robertson under the agreement that if she sold to Robertson she would pay the plaintiff his commission. The defendant was unable to effect a sale to Robertson. Robertson, believing that a third party could buy cheaper than he could, arranged with one Ehlers to buy for not more than $5,750 and then deed the property to him, agreeing to furnish Ehlers the money. Ehlers then attempted to buy the property of the defendant, which, after considerable negotiation, he succeeded in doing, for $5,750. The defendant supposed and believed that Ehlers was acting for himself, and had no connection with or relation to either Robertson or the plaintiff, and before closing with Ehlers she called Robertson on the telephone, informed him of the offer and proposed to sell to him for $5,800, if he still desired to buy. Robertson, knowing Ehlers made the offer, declined to buy, and the defendant then entered into a written agreement to sell to Ehlers, who also paid something down. This was about August 2, 1915.

The defendant, some time after she had made her contract with Ehlers, and before September 8, 1915, learned of the arrangement between Ehlers and Robertson. She executed and delivered her deed to Ehlers September 20, 1915, and at the same time Ehlers executed and delivered his deed of the same property to Robertson. Robertson furnished Ehlers the money necessary to complete the transaction. Both deeds of the property were, at the request of the defendant, prepared by her attorney, after she learned of the Ehlers-Robertson arrangement, and prior to the day of delivery. The plaintiff knew nothing of the negotiations between Ehlers and the defendant, nor does it appear that he knew of the arrangement between Ehlers and Robertson until after the sale was completed and the deeds passed. The defendant had not withdrawn the property from the hands of the plaintiff prior to September 20, 1915.

Upon this statement of facts, slightly condensed from the record, the trial court rendered judgment for the plaintiff to recover his commission. The defendant appealed.

Messrs. William C. Rungee and George E. Beers, for appellant:

To be entitled to a commission, the broker must procure a customer ready, able, and willing to buy upon the terms prescribed by the owner.

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the owner may himself sell without incurring any liability for commissions.

9 C. J. 575; Hungerford v. Hicks, 39 Conn. 259.

Messrs. Walter M. Anderson and Spotswood D. Bowers, for appellee:

The fact that the sale was at a lower price and upon different terms than those upon which the plaintiff was authorized to sell does not prevent the recovery of the commission.

Hoadley v. Savings Bank, 71 Conn. 610, 44 L.R.A. 321, 42 Atl. 667; Schlegal v. Allerton, 65 Conn. 264, 82 Atl. 363; Wendle v. Palmer, 77 Conn. 12, 58 Atl. 12; 4 R. C. L. p. 313, note 12, p. 321, note 13; Notkins v. Pashalinski, 83 Conn. 458, 76 Atl. 1104, 20 Ann. Cas. 1023.

A finding that the plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale is a finding of fact which is conclusive unless unsupported by the subordinate facts, or in conflict with the settled rules of logic and reason, or found in violation of some rule or principle of law.

Seward v. M. Seward & Son Co. 91 Conn. 193, 99 Atl. 887.

Gager, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract did not give the plaintiff the exclusive right of sale. To have this effect, the right must be given to the

broker in unequivocal terms or by necessary implication. Hungerford v. Hicks, 39 Conn. 259; 4 R. C. L. 259; notes in 44 L.R.A. 344 and 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 279. This court has many times stated what was necessary to entitle a broker to his commission. In the recent case of Butler v. Ouwelant, 90 Conn. 434, 97 Atl. 310, the court, citing a number of earlier cases, said: "To entitle the plaintiffs, as brokers, to the compensation which they claim to recover in this action, it should appear that they produced a person who was ready, able, and willing, both to accept and live up to the terms offered by the defendant."

It is also well settled that a broker cannot put himself in a position antagonistic to his principal's interest. Ebert v. Haskell, 217 Mass. 211, 104 N. E. 556; Veasey v. Carson, 53 L.R.A. 241, and note (177 Mass. 117, 58 N. E. 177).

The appeal turns, substantially, upon the answer to the question: Was the plaintiff the procuring cause of the sale? The trial court found, as a conclusion of fact from subordinate facts set forth in the finding, that the plaintiff was the procuring cause.

This conclusion may be reviewed on appeal. Hoadley v. Savings Bank, 71 Conn. 599, 44 L.R.A. 321, 42 Atl. 667; Seward v. M. Seward & Son Co. 91 Conn. 190, 99 Atl. 887. Robertson appears to have been the only person with whom the plaintiff had negotiations. After twice failing to sell to him, the plaintiff and the defendant agreed that the defendant should be introduced to Robertson, and that if she succeeded in effecting a sale to him the plaintiff should have his commission. The defendant also failed to make the sale to Robertson, and negotiations with Robertson were at a standstill. It appears, however, that Robertson really wanted the property, and, entirely without the knowledge of either the plaintiff or defendant, put up a scheme by which he hoped ultimately to get the property at a less price than that for which he could buy it directly. He agreed with one Ehlers, hitherto unknown to both plaintiff and defendant as a possible purchaser, that Ehlers should buy the property, if possible, at a price as an original independent purchaser, and then convey to him. Ehlers offered $5,750, but the defendant, with the utmost good faith, both to the plaintiff and to Robertson, called up Robertson before closing with Ehlers and again offered him the property for $5,800. He declined to buy. The defendant's good faith to the plaintiff is clear when it is observed that a sale to Robertson for $5,800, less commission, would have meant a loss to the defendant of $95 as against the sale to Ehlers with no commission. Upon the refusal of Robertson to buy, the defendant made her contract with Ehlers, and became bound to convey to him. If bound to Ehlers, information subsequently obtained by her of Robertson's scheme is immaterial. She had no contract with Robertson. Knowing that Ehlers had made her an offer, Robertson had expressly declined to buy upon notice from the defendant and upon her offer still to sell to him before closing with Ehlers. Upon the plainest principles of estoppel, Robertson could not thereafter, as against the defendant, insist that he was the real principal. East Haddam Bank v. Shailor, 20 Conn. 18; 31 Cyc. 1234. Yet the plaintiff claims that, because pursuant to the secret agreement between Ehlers and Robertson the property was immediately conveyed by Ehlers to Robertson, the defendant should be held liable for commissions as upon a sale by her to Robertson under the modified agreement.

The finding is clear that the plaintiff did not in fact procure Ehlers as a purchaser. The plaintiff in no way intervened so as to bring Ehlers' attention to the property. But the plaintiff claims that because he had been in negotiations with —antagonistic position.

Appeal—review of facts.

Robertson, and Robertson made the contract with Ehlers to buy, therefore the plaintiff was the procuring cause of Ehlers' purchase. The plaintiff had nothing to do with the sale in fact made, nor did he know of it until after the sale had been consummated. Neither the plaintiff nor Robertson introduced Ehlers to the defendant. Ehlers approached the defendant entirely as an original independent purchaser and secured his contract in that guise. The general rule is stated in 9 C. J. 614, in this way: "The facts that a person with whom the broker unsuccessfully negotiated for a sale called the attention of another to the property, and that the other finally bought it, do not give the broker a right to a commission."

This rule is based upon the well-established distinction between what the books call the "causa causans" and the "causa sine qua non." The cases are numerous. We mention Burchell v. Gowrie & B. Collieries, [1910] A. C. 624, 80 L. J. P. C. N. S. 41, 103 L. T. N. S. 325; Imrie v. Wilson, — Ont. —, 3 D. L. R. 826, 21 Ont. Week. Rep. 964, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1145. In Gleason v. Nelson, 162 Mass. 245, 38 N. E. 497, it is said: "Where there has been no direct communication between the broker and the purchaser, it must be shown affirmatively that the latter was induced to enter into the negotiations which resulted in the purchase through the means employed by the broker for that purpose."

We also cite Johnson v. Seidel, 150 Pa. 396, 24 Atl. 687; Baumgartl v. Hoyne, 54 Ill. App. 496. See also the citations in note in 44 L.R.A. 321, i. d.

Perhaps we should here notice our own case of Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136. Here the broker had been engaged to sell. Burdick was looking for a house. His friend Goodwin, knowing this, and seeing the broker's advertisement, interviewed the broker and reported to Burdick, who requested Goodwin to examine the house and report to him. Goodwin did so, and Burdick then examined the house, negotiated directly with the owner, and bought the property without any personal interview or dealing with the broker. Before his purchase, Burdick was informed by Goodwin that the broker had the property for sale. In the superior court, Judge Loomis decided for the defendant. On appeal this court held that the broker was entitled to his commission on the ground that on these facts the principle, "qui facit per alium, facit per se," applied, and that Burdick obtained his information from the plaintiff through Goodwin, who was in fact the messenger and agent of Burdick. The facts clearly warranted the assumption of such an agency. The felt necessity of invoking the doctrine of agency but confirms the general rule stated above. Butler v. Ouwelant, supra, is decided upon the theory that the defendant, with knowledge of what the plaintiff broker had done, combined with a third party in the attempt unjustly to deprive the plaintiff of his commission. There is nothing in the present case to suggest in the slightest degree that the defendant desired or planned to avoid paying a commission. Directly the contrary is true.

The complaint is based upon a sale by the defendant to Robertson, and the finding shows the final arrangement between the plaintiff and defendant was based on the possible ability of the defendant to effect a sale to Robertson.

The plaintiff argues that the facts show that Ehlers was the undisclosed agent of Robertson. Whether the arrangement made between Robertson and Ehlers was a contract of purchase and sale or a contract of agency, it is not necessary now to decide. If it was a contract of purchase and sale, then clearly the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, for the sale would have been to Ehlers, and not to Robertson. If, on the contrary, Ehlers was in fact the undisclosed agent of Robertson, still the plaintiff cannot recover. The case is not one of agent for an undisclosed principal, that is, where the seller is aware that he is dealing with one who is acting as an agent, only the principal being undisclosed. In such case the law seems clear that either the agent or the principal may sue upon the contract. Rhoades v. Blackiston, 106 Mass. 334, 8 Am. Rep. 332, a case where the agent confessedly acted as such to the knowledge of the vendee, so states the general rule. In the present case the fact of the agency was not only undisclosed, but the defendant upon particular inquiry was, by the very person now claimed to have been the principal, justifiably led to believe there was no agency in fact, and thereupon made her sale as she rightfully supposed to a third person free of liability for commission which she would have had to pay had she sold, as in truth she unsuccessfully attempted, to Robertson himself.

This, however, is not a case of one acting as agent, but not disclosing the principal.

If we assume that, as between Ehlers and Robertson, the relation of principal and agent existed, not only was this fact not known to the defendant, but was purposely concealed from her by both Ehlers and Robertson. So that the most that the plaintiff can claim is that this is a case of undisclosed agency. The difference between these two situations must be kept in mind in determining the liability and rights of the vendor. Furthermore, we are not now deciding the rights of Robertson against Ehlers. The rules of law as frequently stated with reference to the right of an undisclosed principal against the vendee must be critically examined to determine whether the rule as stated is applied with reference to an undisclosed agency, or to a case of disclosed agency but undisclosed principal. Rhoades v. Blackiston, supra, is an illustration.

While it is generally true that a principal of an undisclosed agent may appear in his true character and claim all the benefits of the contract from the other contracting party, yet this rule is never applied when to follow it would work an injury to the other contracting party.

Principal and agent—undisclosed—principal—application of rule.

In Barry v. Page, 10 Gray, 398, cited with approval in Sullivan v. Shailor, 70 Conn. 737, 40 Atl. 1055, it is said: "As the contract of an agent is in law the contract of the principal, the latter may come forward and sue thereon, although at the time the contract was made the agent acted as and appeared to be the principal. There is a qualification of the rule, by which it is held that when a contract has been made for an undisclosed principal, who permits his agent to act as apparent principal in the transaction, the right of the former to intervene and bring suit in his own name is not allowed in any way to affect or impair the right of the other contracting party, but he will in such case be let into all the equities, set-offs, and other defenses to which he would have been entitled, if the action had been brought in the name of the agent."

As stated in 21 R. C. L. 898, the principal's right to claim the benefits of the contract is recognized "so far as he can do so without injury to that other by the substitution of himself for his agent." Numerous cases are cited in the note.

It needs no argument to show that if Robertson were permitted to substitute himself for his assumed agent under the circumstances of this case, thereby making the sale one from the defendant direct to him, and to bring the case within the allegations of the complaint and within the terms of the final brokerage contract between the plaintiff and defendant, this would be to the harm of the defendant to the extent of the commission on the sale. The defendant was thus under no obligation to Robertson under her contract with Ehlers, and Robertson could not have enforced Ehlers's contract with the defendant as his own. It is said in 2 Mechem, Agency, § 2070, if the vendor has "dealt with the agent as being in fact the principal and upon terms in a written contract which exclude the existence of any other principal," the undisclosed principal is not a party to the contract and cannot enforce it. To do so would contradict the writing. The finding does not set out the terms of the written contract, but does show there was such a contract, and the circumstances irresistibly point to the conclusion that no agency was suggested and by Robertson's own statement that certainly he was not connected with it. It is then clear that upon the settled principles of undisclosed agency the sale was not to Robertson, and that the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that he was the procuring cause of a sale to Robertson.

There is another point of view which shows that the plaintiff cannot recover. Should it still be held that the defendant in law, though certainly not in fact, sold to Robertson, because Robertson subsequently obtained title to the property, the plaintiff must as matter of law be held to have adopted the method by which Robertson subsequently obtained title. This method was, as we have seen, by secretly putting forward a third party as a purchaser in opposition to Robertson, to obtain the property at a less price than Robertson believed he could buy it for, and by adopting Robertson's statement to the defendant, upon specific inquiry by the defendant if he still wanted the property, that he did not want to buy. To be sure, the plaintiff did not in fact do this, but he must adopt this conduct, antagonistic to the interest of his client, to establish that he was the procuring cause of the sale the defendant in fact made. This he will not be allowed to do. To compel the defendant to pay commission on a sale so obtained, when she, though unsuccessful, took every possible means to make the sale as she supposed which would entitle the plaintiff to his commission, would inflict an undeserved loss upon her. The sale in fact was made through concealing the identity of the real purchaser, and so leading the defendant to sell at a less price. Veasey v. Carson, 177 Mass. 117, 53 L.R.A. 241, 58 N. E. 177; Pratt v. Patterson, 112 Pa. 475, 3 Atl. 858; Young v. Hughes, 32 N. J. Eq. 372; Alvord v. Cook, 174 Mass. 120, 54 N. E. 499. The plaintiff cannot benefit by an imposition practised upon the defendant by the very person whose conduct he must adopt to show any sale whatever.

Perhaps it is not irrelevant to call attention to Gormley v. Dangel, 214 Mass. 5, 100 N. E. 1084, a substantially parallel case. The plaintiff was generally authorized to find a purchaser, and negotiated with the defendant for a sale at $6,000, the lowest price the owner would take. The defendant ceased to negotiate with the plaintiff, posed as broker, and effected a sale by the owner to one Ross, who was, secretly, a dummy purchaser for the defendant. The defendant as an independent broker collected a commission from the owner, thereby getting the property from the owner really at the owner's price less commission. The court held that this conduct of the defendant was fraudulent to the plaintiff broker, and allowed the broker to recover his commission from the defendant. It appeared that the owner in good faith supposed Ross was the real purchaser and the defendant a broker in fact. As to the bearing of good faith on the part of the owner, the court says: "If the owner, knowing that Ross was merely the tool or agent of the defendant, had made the conveyance to him, the plaintiff could have recovered his commission from the owner."

The possible liability of the owner for commission is thus based on the assumption of her lack of good faith. But in that case, as in the present, the owner's good faith in supposing that she was actually selling to a third party was apparently unquestioned. In that case, too, the good faith of the owner in paying a commission to the one she innocently supposed was a disinterested broker is the same in effect as the good faith of the defendant in selling to a third party at a less price than she would have sold if she had become obligated to pay a commission.

For various somewhat analogous situations, see Quist v. Goodfellow, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 153, and cases collected in the note (99 Minn. 509, 110 N. W. 65, 9 Ann. Cas. 431).

We agree with the plaintiff's claim that the defendant was not released from the obligation to pay a commission merely from the fact that she sold for a less price than that to which the broker was limited, nor was she released by the mere fact that she in person made the sale; but we hold that the defendant did not as matter of fact sell to Robertson, and that, under the settled rules of agency, the plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale to Ehlers in any such sense as will entitle him to a commission.

There is error. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment for the defendant.

ANNOTATION.

Broker's right to commission where property is sold to third person who is acting for broker's customer.

It will be seen that in the reported case (RITCH v. ROBERTSON, ante, 81) it is held that the broker is not entitled to his commission if the owner in good faith sells to a dummy of the broker's customer. The court seems to base its decision largely on the proposition that the real buyer was estopped to say to the seller that he was the buyer. It is not clear why this estoppel should defeat the broker's claim to his commission. The court does not directly refer to the general rule that the owner's ignorance that the broker procured the customer is no defense to the broker's claim for commission.

In Feldman v. O'Brien (1898) 23 Misc. 341, 51 N. Y. Supp. 309, R., wishing to invest some money in real estate, called upon the plaintiff, a real estate broker, who showed her the houses in question, which were also in the hands of B., another broker; and R. negotiated about the matter severally with both brokers. Finally B. made a contract to buy the houses himself at a lower figure than was given to the plaintiff, stating that he hoped to sell them to R., which he did, assigning the contract. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any commission.

In White v. Maynard (1910) 15 B. C. 340, the defendant listed a lot with the plaintiff for sale, who interested R.; the defendants then gave an option to D., a real estate agent, who sold to R., not knowing of the former negotiation. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a commission, there being no evidence that the defendants knew that R. was the purchaser, or that they colluded with D. to deprive the plaintiff of his commission.

The two following cases are closely similar on the facts to the reported case (RITCH v. ROBERTSON):

In Goldstein v. Walters (1889) 15 Daly, 397, 28 N. Y. S. R. 177, 7 N. Y. Supp. 756, reargument denied in (1890) 29 N. Y. S. R. 323, 8 N. Y. Supp. 957, it was held that the plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale where the sale was made direct to another, acting for the plaintiff's customer, in the ignorance of the owner, the defendant. The court does not refer to the New York cases holding that the broker's right to commission is not affected by the owner's ignorance that he is the producing cause of the sale. See, for example, Lloyd v. Matthews (1872) 51 N. Y. 124; Sussendorff v. Schmidt (1873) 55 N. Y. 321.

In Stone v. Kreis (1916) 202 Ill. App. 43, after the plaintiffs had for two years endeavored to induce H. to purchase the property, H. and the defendant informed the plaintiffs that they would not negotiate further; thereafter the property was sold to W., who conveyed to H. It was held error to refuse to instruct the jury "that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant acted in good faith at the time he sold the property in question to Woodward, and did not know that Woodward was purchasing said property for the benefit of Joseph Hock, their verdict should be for defendant." The court said: "Where, as in the present case, there is evidence tending to show abandonment of negotiations with the broker's customer, and entry upon negotiations with another party, apparently in his own interest, but in fact as the secret representative of plaintiffs' customer, of which defendant was ignorant, and that defendant, on due inquiry, was led to believe that he was dealing with an entirely new party and was not to pay commissions, and was thereby induced to sell at such lower price, we think the element of good faith is material. It would not only seem unjust, if he acted in good faith in the transaction, that he should be mulcted for damages in the form of commissions because of bad faith and deceit practised upon him by plaintiffs' customer, but to present the question whether, so far as the operating influences on defendant are concerned, plaintiffs, under such circumstances, could be said to be the procuring cause of the sale." The court does not refer to Adams v. Decker (1899) 34 Ill. App. 20, holding that it was wholly unimportant whether the owner knew that his purchaser was sent by the broker or not.

In Baumgartl v. Hoyne (1894) 54

Ill. App. 496, agents employed the plaintiff to sell property, who saw several persons about it, one of whom spoke to R., who eventually bought the property and resold it at an advance to a syndicate composed of himself and several others, some of whom had been approached at first by the plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a commission, as he was not the proximate cause of the sale.

Gormley v. Dangel (1913) 214 Mass. 5, 100 N. E. 1084, is sufficiently set out in the reported case (RITCH v. ROBERTSON, ante, 81).

In Steidl v. McClymonds (1903) 90 Minn. 205, 95 N. W. 906, W., interested by the plaintiff, a broker, in property of the defendant in a distant city, sent C. to such city, who met the defendant's manager, and took contract and deed in his own name, and conveyed the property to W. It was held that the knowledge of the manager that C. was acting for W. was the knowledge of the defendant. [Minnesota does not support the general rule that ignorance of the owner that the broker procures the purchaser is no defense to the broker's claim for commission. See Quist v. Goodfellow (1906) 99 Minn. 509, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 153, 110 N. W. 65, 9 Ann. Cas. 431.]

It will be seen that the two following cases are directly opposed to the reported case (RITCH v. ROBERTSON):

In Glade v. Eastern Illinois Min. Co. (1908) 129 Mo. App. 443, 107 S. W. 1002, it was held that if one interested by the broker procures a third person to buy the defendant's property for him, the defendant is liable for the broker's commission, even though he did not know that the person interested by the broker was interested in the purchase.

In Schultz v. Zelman (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 111 S. W. 776, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation where the defendant placed the property with several agents for sale, including the plaintiff, who showed it to D. in the defendant's presence, and it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant should negotiate directly with D., but he was not able to see him; and D. bought the property through another broker, who told the defendant he was not acting for D., and the defendant did not discover the contrary until after signing the contract.

Where the plaintiffs, employed by the defendant's husband to sell her property, negotiated with the vice president of a bank, and the husband, having notice thereof, sold the property to such vice president for the bank, the conveyance being made to the cashier, the bank paying the money, the plaintiffs were held entitled to their commissions. Barnett v. Gluting (1891) 3 Ind. App. 415, 29 N. E. 154. The court said: "The fact that the conveyance was made to some person other than the real purchaser, if it was the same transaction, and resulted in a sale of the property of which the broker was the procuring cause, would not debar the latter from recovering his commission."

An agreement in substance that the broker was to have his commission if he sold or named a customer who bought, leased, or got full control of the property within a time mentioned, was fulfilled by the broker, where he named as probable customers a railroad company, and a coal company controlled by the railroad company, and the person who was secretary and treasurer of both companies bought the property and deeded it to the coal company within the time specified. Langdon v. Taylor (1910) 103 C. C. A. 531, 180 Fed. 385.

mission will not have that result. Randup v. Schroeder (1898) 22 Misc. 367, 49 N. Y. Supp. 290.

"An agent cannot be deprived of his commission merely because the actual purchaser takes title in another's name." Konner v. Anderson (1900) 32 Misc. 511, 66 N. Y. Supp. 388.

In Bogart v. Williams (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 31 S. W. 494, the plaintiffs procured a purchaser who only wished part of the property, and induced their employee to take the other part, with the knowledge of the owner, the defendant. Thereafter the defendant persuaded such employee to take a deed for the whole, and then to convey to the customer, but it was held that he could not in this way deprive the plaintiffs of their commission.

The following case, while not strictly in point on the facts, may be here referred to:

Where an agent has been employed to procure a purchaser of real estate at a price satisfactory to the owner, for a stated commission, and the agent introduces to the owner a prospective purchaser, who takes an option and allows it to be canceled, but the agent continues to discuss the matter with the person so introduced, who subsequently, with a partner, purchases the property by negotiations with the brother of the owner, in which the agent took no part, the agent, having introduced and continued to interest the person who, with his partner, did eventually buy, is entitled to his commission as agreed. Cumberland Sav. & T. Co. v. McGriff (1911) 61 Fla. 159, 54 So. 265. B. B. B.

Attorney and client — presumption of innocence.

1. In a proceeding to disbar an attorney at law, such attorney is presumed to be innocent of the charges preferred and to have performed his duty as an officer of the court in accordance with his oath, and the evidence in support of the charges must satisfy the court to a reasonable certainty that the charges are true and warrant a judgment of disbarment.

ORIGINAL action on motion of the Bar Commission for disbarment of respondent based on charges filed by relator. Findings and conclusions of referee recommending disbarment set aside, and proceeding dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. S. Pendleton, relator.

Mr. Frank Dale, prosecutor.

Messrs. E. R. Hastings and S. W. Hayes, for respondent:

Advances in the disbursement of the Enos Nichols estate by its representative for the benefit of Harriet Nichols Cook and her estate could be made before the final distribution of the estate.

Owen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original action brought on motion of the Bar Commission, based on charges filed by W. S. Pendleton, hereinafter referred to as relator, for disbarment of F. H. Reily, a member of the bar of Pottawatomie county. Honorable James R. Tolbert of Hobart was appointed referee to take testimony and report his findings of fact and conclusions of law. He reported specific findings as to three counts of the charges, together with his conclusions, recommending disbarment of respondent. To this report exceptions were filed.

Respondent was attorney for one Harriet Nichols Cook, of New Jersey, claimed to be sole heir at law of Enos Nichols, deceased, who died in Pottawatomie county in December, 1911. He was employed as associate counsel under the direction of J. Warren Davis of New Jersey. Harriet Nichols Cook died, and J. Warren Davis was appointed executor of her estate, respondent continuing under his direction to represent the estate as a beneficiary of the Enos Nichols estate. Prior to her death respondent secured a loan of $5,000 for her, guaranteeing payment himself by separate instrument. Lydick and Eggerman, attorneys of Shawnee, held an assignment from Harriet Nichols Cook of $30,000 of her interest in the Enos Nichols estate, claiming that amount as attorneys' fees. Respondent brought suit to cancel this assignment. A compromise was effected by the terms of which Lydick and Eggerman were to receive $15,000. But by agreement judgment was entered in their favor for $20,000, and $5,000 of this amount was paid to respondent, for which he gave receipt in the name of Harriet Nichols Cook estate by himself as attorney. This transaction was at the time unknown to the executor, but when explained to him a few days later was entirely satisfactory and ratified. Respondent deposited this $5,000 to his own account, and retained same with the consent of his client until September, 1917, when he returned the money to the executor. In explanation of this transaction respondent shows the money was secured to protect him on his guaranty of the $5,000 loan of Harriet Nichols Cook, and his client agreed he might keep the money until he had been relieved of this personal obligation. The uncontradicted evidence shows he returned the money when the first demand was made. The referee found that respondent wrongfully converted the $5,000 to his own use with the attempt to deprive the estate of same, and was therefore guilty of the crime of embezzlement. We do not approve the method used by respondent in obtaining this money, and we are not unmindful that irregularities of this character sometimes lead to grave consequences. Yet we do not find that the transaction, as explained by respondent, shows any intent on his part to defraud, or that the estate was to any extent defrauded.

The second count alleges fraud and irregularities in the collection of an expense account of $1,835, from the administrator of the Enos Nichols estate, and made a charge against the estate of Harriet Nichols Cook. This account was for money advanced by respondent for court costs and expense of taking depositions in various parts of the United States, representing the Harriet Nichols Cook estate. The account was submitted to James Mercer Davis, attorney for J. Warren Davis, who approved the same, and his action was later ratified by J. Warren Davis as executor. It does not appear the account was either itemized or sworn to, but the amount was recognized as correct, and was paid as a proper claim against the estate of Harriet Nichols Cook as an advancement out of the Enos Nichols estate. Respondent later prepared the report for the executor, which was filed with the county court of Pottawatomie county, showing the expenditures of this $1,835 item.

The referee found that respondent acted arbitrarily, and had been grossly negligent and guilty of conduct unbecoming a lawyer in this transaction, although not prompted by a bad or criminal motive. There was no question as to the correctness of the account, and while good business methods and that degree of care due the handling of accounts by lawyers for their clients would require the account be itemized and verified, the evidence is not sufficient to warrant disbarment.

The third count alleges, in substance, that respondent entered into a conspiracy with E. E. Hood, an attorney of Shawnee, to employ a number of attorneys of that county, and by paying them a retaining fee disqualify them in an election of special judge to preside in the hearing of the probate of the will of Enos Nichols, and thereby thwarting the administration of justice. The referee found that respondent, acting with his associate counsel, had the administrator pay out the sum of $390 to eight different lawyers, with the express purpose and intent to disqualify them in participating in the election of the special judge, and that he was thereby guilty of an attempt to pollute the administration of the law. It appears Hood represented some of the same interests represented by respondent, but was not employed as an associate counsel with respondent. His employment was by J. Warren Davis, and he reported directly to him and to one Farrington, who represented some of the heirs of Harriet Nichols Cook residing at Springfield, Missouri. Hood suggested to respondent the necessity of retaining additional attorneys to assist in such matters as might arise in connection with the Harriet Nichols Cook estate. The probate of the proffered will was being bitterly contested. A large number of lawyers had been employed by the interests adverse to those of the Harriet Nichols Cook estate. Depositions were being taken in various parts of the United States, necessitating the absence of respondent from Shawnee much of the time. Lawyers were retained and paid by Hood, totaling $390, and this amount was allowed by the administrator on the advice of respondent. But the attorneys retained were not shown to have been unfriendly to respondent, or to the interests he represented, and there is no evidence indicating they would have voted adverse to his interests. A special judge suggested by opposing litigants was elected, and rendered a judgment adverse to respondent and his clients.

The remaining count, including a charge that respondent had prevented relator from obtaining an attorney's fee in a case in which it was alleged he was co-counsel with relator, was found by the referee not to be supported by sufficient evidence to justify a recommendation for disbarment.

We have read the report of the referee and transcript of the testimony with care; and, while we give due regard to his findings and conclusions, both because of his office and his very high standing and recognized ability as a lawyer, we are unable to agree with his findings or approve his conclusions.

The referee in a disbarment proceeding is an officer of the court, and the court has full authority to supervise and control his report by setting it aside, or confirming or modifying it as the facts and the law require. 23 R. C. L. 300; Krapp v. Aderholt, 42 Kan. 247, 21 Pac. 1063. The rule to be applied in considering the report was stated in Grove v. Haskell, 31 Okla. 77-79, 116 Pac. 806, as follows: "The report of the referee appointed to take the evidence and report the same to this court with his findings of fact and conclusions of law would not be conclusive on either. It should and would be accorded every reasonable presumption of being correct, with the burden on the party attacking it, but to be freely set aside by the court if found to be incorrect."

The serious consequences of disbarment should follow only where there is a clear preponderance of evidence against the respondent. In such proceeding the attorney sought to be disbarred is presumed to be innocent of the charges preferred, and to have performed his duty as an officer of the court in accordance with his oath, and the evidence in support of the charges must satisfy the court to a reasonable certainty that the charges are true and warrant a judgment of disbarment. Re Sitton, — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 555; Re Parsons, 35 Mont. 478, 90 Pac. 163; People ex rel. Healy v. Thornton, 228 Ill. 42, 81 N. E. 798; Re Newby, 82 Neb. 235, 117 N. W. 691. In the case of People ex rel. Shufeldt v. Barker, 56 Ill. 299, it was said: "A charge so grave in its character, and so fatal in its consequences, ought certainly to be proved by what the law denominates a clear preponderance of the evidence."

This language was quoted with approval in the case of State Bar Commission ex rel. Williams v. Sullivan, 35 Okla. 745, L.R.A.1915D, 1218, 131 Pac. 703.

The law does not demand that —technical every technical infractions of law. fraction of the law by an attorney shall require his disbarment, although an attorney should endeavor to observe literally the law; but it is those infractions of duty by an attorney that involve moral turpitude and evince a depraved character, rendering such attorney untrustworthy and a reflection upon the bar and the court, as an officer thereof, that demand his disbarment. The evidence in this case, as we view it, fails to prove by sufficient Evidence—sufficiency. preponderance that respondent has been guilty of such conduct. Therefore the findings and conclusions of the referee will be set aside and the proceeding dismissed.

ANNOTATION.

Presumption of innocence in disbarment proceeding.

In a proceeding for the disbarment or suspension of an attorney, the attorney is presumed to be innocent. Re Haymond (1898) 121 Cal. 385, 53 Pac. 899; Re Parsons (1907) 35 Mont. 478, 90 Pac. 163; Re Newby (1908) 82 Neb. 235, 117 N. W. 691; Re ——— (1916) 175 App. Div. 653, 161 N. Y. Supp. 504; and see the reported case (RE REILY, ante, 89).

Thus, in the case of Re Haymond (1898) 121 Cal. 385, 53 Pac. 899, an attorney was accused of having violated his oath of office and duty as an attorney, in that he failed to maintain the respect due the courts, and had not discharged his duties to the best of his ability. It was alleged that the accused offered to sell a confession of a man about to be tried for a felony, and agreed that it would be attested by the district attorney and judge of the superior court. Dismissing the accusation, the court held that all intendments were in favor of the accused. The court said: "This accusation is in the nature of a criminal charge, and all intendments are in favor of the accused. The accusation is not sufficient if, all its statements being true, the accused could be innocent."

In the case of Re Parsons (1907) 35 Mont. 478, 90 Pac. 163, a petition for the disbarment of two attorneys at law recited that the accused had been guilty of subornation of perjury, attempted subornation of perjury, and conspiracy. The record disclosed that someone had attempted to defraud the accuser, but it did not appear that the accused had any knowledge of the transaction until after it took place, nor did it appear that the parties at fault communicated to the accused, who were their attorneys, any guilty knowledge they might have had. The courts held that in disbarment proceedings the accused were presumed to be innocent of the charges preferred, and to have performed their duties as officers of the court in accordance with their oaths, saying: "There is but one allegation of the petition that is substantiated, and that is that some person or persons attempted to defraud the W. H. Smead Company of its money by inducing Mrs. Vandervoort to compel the mortgage of record. There is no evidence whatsoever that the accused had any knowledge of the transaction until after this act was done. Thereafter they appeared as counsel for the Paynes and Kennedy, but there is no proof that any guilty knowledge these persons may have had was ever communicated to their attorneys. They are presumed to be innocent of the charges preferred, and presumed to have properly performed their duties as officers of the court in accordance with their oaths."

In the case of Re Newby (1908) 82 Neb. 235, 117 N. W. 691, a proceeding for disbarment, an attorney was charged with impersonating a deceased person, forging the name of the deceased person, and assuming to appear for him. The court said: "While the proceedings in this matter are not criminal in their nature, in view of the momentous consequences to the person charged, involving his means of obtaining a livelihood from his profession, and his reputation as an honest and honorable man, the presumption of innocence applies, and his culpability must be established by at least a clear-preponderance of the evidence. The court should be satisfied to a reasonable certainty that the charges are true. . . . We cannot say that we are satisfied from the evidence that he is innocent of the charges made against him, nor can we say that we are satisfied to a reasonable certainty of his guilt. The mind of the court being in this condition, it is our duty to give Mr. Newby the benefit of the doubt, and to hold that the charges have not been sustained by the evidence to such an extent as to warrant the infliction of the severe penalty that must inevitably have followed had we been fully satisfied of his guilt."

In Re — (1916) 175 App. Div. 653, 161 N. Y. Supp. 504, an attorney was accused of having conspired to defraud a railroad, in that he purchased a ticket from the company, feigned sickness, and on the refusal of the agent to redeem the ticket, instituted an action to recover the statutory penalty from the company. He was also accused of having committed perjury in that trial. The court held that the accused in disbarment proceedings was presumed to be innocent, especially when the charges, if true, would constitute a crime. It was said: "The evidence to sustain charges such as have been here made, and in a proceeding of this kind, should be clear and satisfactory and convincing. The respondent is presumed to be innocent, and proof of his guilt should be clearly established. This is especially true where, as in this case, the charges, if true, constitute violations of the criminal law."

In Ex parte Gadsden (1911) 89 S. C. 352, 71 S. E. 952, it appeared that an appeal of an action to set aside an assignment because of fraudulent misrepresentations of an attorney, record and decision in which reflected disastrously on the professional character of the attorney, was abandoned. Whereupon the attorney petitioned the court that it retain and examine the record on appeal, and give him such protection as in the opinion of the court was proper. The court held that an attorney's integrity was presumed, saying: "In considering the conclusion to be drawn from these conditions, it is to be borne in mind that the law forbids that any person should participate officially as an attorney in the administration of justice until he has furnished satisfactory proof of good character. The presumption is therefore in favor of the integrity of the bar; and on the great issue of the honesty or depravity of an attorney the rule of authority and reason is that the court should require the charge of depravity to be estab-

In the case of Re Wellcome (1899) 23 Mont. 450, 59 Pac. 445, a proceeding to disbar an attorney, the accused was charged with having committed bribery to obtain the election of a certain person to the United States Senate. On the trial the accused failed to testify in his own defense. The court held that while the accused was presumed to be innocent of the charge preferred against him, the presumption remained only until it appeared with reasonable certainty that he was guilty. When this was made to appear, then it was incumbent on him to speak. It was said: "Certainly the accused is presumed to be innocent until the contrary appears, but in this kind of proceeding this presumption remains with him only until it appears to the court with reasonable certainty that he is guilty. When this is made to appear, then it is incumbent upon him to speak."

In Colorado, however, the contrary rule has been declared in People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Webster (1901) 28 Colo. 223, 64 Pac. 207. In that case an attorney at law was charged with collecting money and failing to pay it over on demand, and with receiving money from a client with instructions to bring suit to establish a lien on certain land, to pay a docket fee, to pay delinquent taxes and redeem the land from a tax sale, and a failure to follow such instructions. The accused interposed an answer which alleged that prior to the institution of the disbarment proceedings he paid over to the clients the full amount collected less necessary fees and charges. He also alleged that on being informed that a tax deed had been issued on the land, a suit was brought to foreclose the deed of trust and annul the tax deed, that the accused held part of the money to pay the taxes if it should be decided that the client should pay them, and if not he was ready to pay the money to the client. Holding that the answer was evasive and insufficient, the court said: "In cases of this character there is no presumption that the respondent is innocent; and unless respondent fairly and in detail explains to the court his entire connection with the transaction wherein he is charged with improper conduct, it will be presumed that he is unable to do so."

Corporation — creditor's suit on stock subscription.

1. An unsecured creditor of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain an action at law for his own benefit to recover his claim from one who has not paid his subscription to the stock of the corporation.

Judgment — conformity to pleadings.

2. A petition by an individual creditor of a corporation for judgment in a certain sum against a stockholder who has not paid his subscription, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable, will not support a judgment in favor of the creditors generally of the corporation, with the appointment of a receiver to collect the subscription and distribute the proceeds.

Action — distinction between law and equity.

3. Even where the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity has been abolished, courts must nevertheless, of necessity, recognize certain inherent distinctions between them.

[See 10 R. C. L. 264.]

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County (Irwin, J.) in an action to recover a claim against a corporation from a defaulting subscriber to stock, defendant appealing from the judgment against him in favor of the creditors of the insolvent corporation, with the appointment of a receiver to enforce payment of the judgment by execution and to distribute the proceeds; and the city appealing from the judgment in favor of the creditors instead of in its favor for its exclusive use and benefit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Morgan & Brewer and Gordon & Easterday, for defendant:

The proceeds of an unpaid stock subscription is a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors of a corporation.

Burch v. Taylor, 1 Wash. 245, 24 Pac. 438; Wilson v. Book, 13 Wash. 676, 43 Pac. 939; Watterson v. Master-son, 15 Wash. 514, 46 Pac. 1041; Mitchell v. Jordan, 36 Wash. 649, 79 Pac. 311; New York Nat. Exch. Bank v. Metropolitan Sav. Bank, 28 Wash. 558, 68 Pac. 905.

A stockholder is not liable on his subscription to capital stock of a corporation unless the whole of the capital stock has been subscribed.

Elderkin v. Peterson, 8 Wash. 674, 36 Pac. 1089; Denny Hotel Co. v. Schram, 6 Wash. 134, 36 Am. St. Rep. 130, 32 Pac. 1002; Denny Hotel Co. v. Gilmore, 6 Wash. 152, 32 Pac. 1004.

Mr. O. M. Nelson for plaintiff.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As we proceed, we think it will appear that this cause was commenced and prosecuted to final judgment in the superior court by the plaintiff city as a pure action at law, seeking only recovery for its own exclusive use and benefit of a personal money judgment against the defendant, Carr. The city seeks recovery of such judgment against Carr upon the ground that it is a creditor of the Montesano Planing Mill Company, an insolvent corporation, and that Carr is indebted to that company in the sum of $1,000 for an unpaid stock subscription made by him to its capital stock. After trial before the court without a jury, a personal money judgment was rendered by the court against Carr, not in favor of the city for its own use and benefit, but in favor of the creditors of the Montesano Planing Mill Company, including the appointment of a receiver for that company to enforce payment of the judgment by execution, if not voluntarily paid by Carr, and distribute the proceeds thereof among the creditors of the Montesano Planing Mill Company. Carr has appealed from the judgment, seeking reversal thereof upon the ground, among others, that the trial court erred in permitting the city to maintain an action for its own benefit, and in rendering the judgment, in view of the fact that the cause was commenced, and at all times prosecuted by the city, as a law action for its exclusive use and benefit. The record before us plainly shows that Carr is entitled to here urge reversal of the judgment upon these grounds. The city has also appealed from the judgment, seeking reversal thereof and the rendering of a judgment in its favor against Carr for its exclusive use and benefit.

The facts determinative of the city's right to maintain this action we may regard as not in dispute. It is of no material consequence here whether we regard the question as being presented by the claim of error made by counsel for Carr on the trial court's overruling of his demurrer to the city's third amended complaint, or by the claim of error made by counsel for Carr in the rendering of the judgment by the court upon the evidence presented at the trial. The controlling facts touching this question may be summarized as follows: The Montesano Planing Mill Company is a domestic corporation of this state. In December, 1909, it became insolvent, and passed into the hands of a receiver appointed by the superior court of Chehalis county for the purpose of winding up its affairs, reducing its assets into money, and distributing the same to its creditors. The receiver proceeded accordingly, administered his trust to completion, as he and the court evidently then thought, resulting in the payment of a dividend of 8 per cent to the creditors, and the discharge of the receiver by the court in January, 1911. The city became a creditor of the Montesano Planing Mill Company by reason of being compelled to pay for certain lumber used in a public improvement which had been constructed by the Montesano Planing Mill Company for the city, because of the failure of that company to pay for the lumber; the city having previously paid that company for the construction of the improvement. Just when the city thus became a creditor of the Montesano Planing Mill Company is not rendered certain by the record before us, though we assume, for argument's sake, as counsel insist, that the city became such creditor after the discharge of the receiver. The city has not reduced its claim against the Montesano Planing Mill Company to judgment. This action constitutes its first effort to secure payment of its claim. Thereafter, in November, 1910, the city commenced this action against Carr, as sole defendant, resting its claim upon the facts we have summarized and assumed as true, as claimed by counsel for the city, and also upon the alleged fact that Carr is indebted to the Montesano Planing Mill Company in the sum of $1,000, and interest thereon, upon an unpaid subscription made by him to the capital stock of that company. The entire prayer of the city's third amended complaint, the one upon which the trial proceeded after the overruling of Carr's demurrer thereto, reads as follows: "Wherefore plaintiff prays for judgment in the sum of $1,687.44, with interest thereon at 6 per cent, against the said F. L. Carr, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable."

So far as our law recognizes a distinction between an action at law and a suit in equity, it is manifest that counsel for the city has, at all times up to the moment of rendering judgment in this action, prosecuted the same upon the theory that this is a pure law action. Indeed, his very appeal to this court but emphasizes this fact, wherein he is still seeking a personal money judgment against Carr, and insisting that the trial court erred in not awarding the city such a judgment upon the trial for the exclusive use and benefit of the city. At no time has counsel for the city waged the action in the interest of the other creditors of the insolvent Montesano Planing Mill Company, nor is there anything in the record suggesting that the action would assume this form until after the trial and submission of the cause to the court for final decision, when the court, of its own motion, rendered the judgment against Carr and in favor of the creditors generally of the Montesano Planing Mill Company, appointing a receiver to enforce payment of the judgment, and distribute the proceeds thereof among such creditors. Carr has not been called upon at any time from the beginning to the end of this action to defend against the rendition of a judgment of the nature here entered against him by the court of its own motion.

conformity to pleadings.

While the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity as to the mere form no longer exists in this state, the courts nevertheless are, of necessity, compelled to recognize certain inherent distinctions between them. Thompson v. Caton,

3 Wash. Terr. 31, 13 Pac. 185;

distinction between law and equity. Distler v. Dabney,
7 Wash. 431, 35 Pac.
138, 1119; Barto v.
Seattle & I. R. Co.

28 Wash. 179, 182, 68 Pac. 442;
Overlock v. Shinn, 28 Wash. 205, 210, 68 Pac. 436.

It is often necessary to recognize this distinction as an aid to the determination of the question of the right of a party to prosecute an action for his exclusive benefit, and this, we think, is the real question here involved.

In the early case of Burch v. Taylor, 1 Wash. 245, 24 Pac. 438, this court had occasion to consider the question of the right of a creditor of an insolvent corporation to sue for and recover the debt due him from the corporation by an action at law against a stockholder of the corporation to the extent of his unpaid stock subscription. The action was so commenced and prosecuted to a personal money judgment rendered against the stock subscriber in a justice court. The defendant appealed to the territorial district court, where the judgment of the justice court was reversed. On appeal from the decision of the district court to this court, the decision of the district court was affirmed upon the theory that an action at law could not be maintained by a creditor of an insolvent corporation against one of its stockholders upon an unpaid stock subscription for the exclusive use and benefit of such creditor. Justice Stiles, speaking for the court, said: "The main question involved in this case is: Does § 2434 of the Code of Washington authorize an action at law by a creditor of a corporation against a stock subscriber? This inquiry, if determined in the negative, would oust the justice's court of jurisdiction. The second clause of § 2434 is as follows: 'Each and every stockholder shall be personally liable to the creditors of the company to the amount of what remains unpaid upon his subscription to the capital stock, and not otherwise,' which is simply a declaration of the American doctrine of the common law of corporations as held, almost without exception, in the decisions of the courts. Thomp. Liability of Stockholders, §§ 25-37; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 199, and note 1; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 731."

And, after holding that unpaid stock subscriptions are a trust fund for the payment of creditors, he continued: "To enforce a right to participate in a trust fund requires proceedings in equity, unless there be peculiar and explicit statutory provisions to the contrary. So in this class of cases the action must be in equity where the creditor desires himself to be the actor in the proceedings to collect and apply subscriptions. Therefore, in the case at bar, the justice had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the judgment must be affirmed."

We note that the exact language of the early statute quoted in that decision is preserved as a part of our present law in § 3698, Rem. & Bal. Code, which is, in substance, the same as that found in § 4, article 12, of our state Constitution.

Wilson v. Book, 13 Wash. 676, 43 Pac. 939, was also a law action by a creditor of an insolvent bank, seeking recovery for his own benefit from a stockholder of the bank upon the stockholder's secondary liability; that is, the liability imposed upon the stockholder by § 11, article 12, of the state Constitution, beyond what he might owe upon his stock subscription. The question was there again examined by the court and the former holding adhered to, the trust theory being applied, as where the recovery was sought upon an implied stock subscription. Chief Justice Hoyt, speaking for the court, said: "A method which would allow a single creditor to maintain an action at law against one or more of the stockholders for his own benefit would be so unjust to other creditors, and might result in such annoyance to the stockholders, that only the most positive language would justify the courts in holding that the liability might be thus enforced. So to hold would enable one creditor to obtain more than his share of the fund which should be derived from this liability. Not only would such a holding allow a creditor to do this, but under it a stockholder could be subjected to a separate suit at the instance of each one of the creditors of the corporation."

The question was again examined by this court in Watterson v. Masterson, 15 Wash. 511, 46 Pac. 1041, and the former decision adhered to, after earnest argument by learned counsel to induce the court to depart from its former holdings.

• Our attention is called to the decisions in Adamant Mfg. Co. v. Wallace, 16 Wash. 614, 48 Pac. 415; New York Nat. Exch. Bank v. Metropolitan Sav. Bank, 28 Wash. 553, 68 Pac. 905; Chilberg v. Siebenbaum, 41 Wash. 663, 84 Pac. 598. These decisions are not in the least inconsistent with the conclusions reached by the court in the above-noticed cases. These decisions simply recognize the right of a creditor to maintain a suit in equity, in the interest of himself and all other creditors of an insolvent corporation, against a stockholder of such corporation, to compel payment of his unpaid stock subscriptions, or payment of the additional liability which the Constitution imposed upon him as a stockholder, quite a different matter from the claimed right of a creditor to maintain an action at law for his own exclusive benefit against a stockholder upon his liability to the corporation as such. In the last-cited case (41 Wash., at page 669) it is said: "An action of this kind is in the nature of a creditor's bill." While speaking generally, this is a correct statement. We think the real nature of the action is that of a creditor's bill where the plaintiff prosecutes for himself and all other creditors, in view of the fact that he is seeking payment of his claim from a trust fund against which his rights are not preferred, but are the same as other creditors.

We do not overlook the holding of this court in Dunlap v. Rauch, 24 Wash. 620, 64 Pac. 807. In that case the action, it is true, was originally commenced by the creditor against the stockholder upon his unpaid stock subscription, for the exclusive use and benefit of the creditor; but, while the case was pending, the plaintiff creditor gave notice to the defendants and filed a written offer, requesting that an order be entered in the cause, substituting one Beach, the receiver of the corporation, as plaintiff; Beach having been appointed receiver of the corporation pending the action, in another action, and offering to assign any judgment recovered in the action to the receiver, to the end that the proceeds thereof might be equitably distributed among the creditors. This was a voluntary conversion of the law action into an equitable one for the benefit of all creditors before the rendition of judgment in that action. Thereafter the cause proceeded, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The city, plaintiff and appellant in this action, has at no time ever assumed such an attitude. It not only prosecuted this action for its own benefit as a pure law action up to the very moment of the rendition of the judgment, but continues in that attitude by appealing from the judgment rendered, and claiming error on the part of the learned trial court in not rendering judgment in its favor for its own exclusive use and benefit. We are of the opinion that the city has no legal right to maintain this action. The decisions of this court in Elderkin v. Peterson, 8 Wash. 674, 36 Pac. 1086; Mitchell v. Jordan, 36 Wash. 645, 79 Pac. 311, and Cox v. Dickie, 48 Wash. 264, 93 Pac. 523, holding that a receiver for an insolvent corporation may maintain an action either at law or in equity to recover from a stockholder upon his liability as such, are not inconsistent with the conclusion we here reach. Whatever the nature of the action may be, when prosecuted by a receiver, it is, of course, for the benefit of all creditors of the insolvent corporation.

We have not lost sight of the fact that the city's prayer for a personal money judgment against Carr concludes with the words, "and such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable." Whatever construction might be placed upon this language of the prayer, under different circumstances, it seems to us quite plain that it does not result in converting this action into an equitable action for the benefit of the city and the other creditors of the insolvent Montesano Planing Mill Company, in view of the manifest theory upon which counsel for the city has waged this action. Indeed, his attitude constitutes, in substance, an assertion that his general prayer for relief had no such meaning. He is still consistently insisting here that the judgment of the trial court was erroneous in so far as it was rendered in favor of the creditors, instead of in favor of the city for its exclusive use and benefit.

As to the appeal taken by the city in this cause, little need be said; it being practically disposed of by our discussion above made, which necessarily leads to the conclusion that the city cannot recover from Carr in the manner here sought upon his unpaid stock subscription if, in fact, he is indebted to the Corporation—creditor's suit on stock subscription.

 Montesano Planing Mill Company upon that subscription. Other contentions made by counsel for the city upon its appeal, we think, are wholly without merit, and do not call for discussion.

If it be suggested that the judgment of the learned trial court was, in any event, a correct disposition of the cause upon the merits, which theory counsel for the city is combating even at this time, we think such suggestion may be answered in the negative by the fact that Carr, as defendant, was not called upon to defend, and was not defending, an action calling for any such judgment.

We conclude that the judgment must be reversed and the action dismissed.

It is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Right of creditor of insolvent corporation to sue stockholder at law upon unpaid subscription.

I. In general, 100.

II. Under statutes, 102.

I. In general.

The general theory of the cases is that, in the absence of statute expressly authorizing such an action, the liability of a stockholder in an insolvent corporation upon his unpaid subscription is to the corporation or its representative; and it is held that a creditor cannot maintain an action at law against the stockholder upon this unpaid subscription. Patterson v. Lynde (1883) 106 U. S. 519, 27 L. ed. 265, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432; Re Glen Iron Works (1878) 13 Phila. 479, Fed. Cas. No. 17,636; Brown v. Fisk (1885) 23 Fed.

228; Jones v. Jarman (1879) 34 Ark. 323; German Nat. Bank v. Farmers & M. Bank (1898) 54 Neb. 593, 74 N. W. 1086; Van Pelt v. Gardner (1898) 54 Neb. 701, 74 N. W. 1083, 75 N. W. 874; Reed v. Burg (1901) 2 Neb. (Unof.) 117, 96 N. W. 414; Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Murray (1897) 60 N. J. L. 20, 37 Atl. 443; Wellington v. Continental Constr. & Improv. Co. (1889) 52 Hun, 408, 5 N. Y. Supp. 587; Ladd v. Cartwright (1879) 7 Or. 329, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 607; MONTESANO v. CARR (reported herewith) ante, 95.

An action at law cannot be maintained by the creditor of the corporation against a stockholder to recover on his unpaid subscription under a statute making each and every stockholder "personally liable to the creditors of the company to the amount of what remains unpaid on his subscription to the capital stock and not otherwise." Burch v. Taylor (1890) 1 Wash. 245, 24 Pac. 438. The court makes a distinction between what is known as the statutory liability of the stockholders, which is the liability created by statute in addition to unpaid subscriptions, and the liability created by statute such as that cited above, it being stated that stock subscriptions are a trust fund for the payment of creditors, and the action must be in equity where the creditor desires himself to be the actor in the proceedings to collect and apply subscriptions. A similar decision under a similar statute appears in Graeber v. Ehr Gott (1918) 182 App. Div. 377, 169 N. Y. Supp. 82.

In fact, the right of a single creditor to sue in equity to collect unpaid subscriptions and thus secure payment of his own debt to the exclusion of other creditors has been denied. George W. Signor Tie Co. v. Monett & S. W. Constr. Co. (1912) 198 Fed. 412, approved in J. A. Roebbling's Sons Co. v. Kinnicut (1917) 248 Fed. 596. Upon the theory that the amount due the corporation upon an unpaid subscription after default in answering a call can be reached by the ordinary course of law against the subscribers as debtors of the corporation, the right of creditors to proceed in equity to reach unpaid subscriptions has been denied. Allen v. Montgomery R. Co. (1847) 11 Ala. 487. The right to proceed in equity, however, has not been generally considered herein. Nor has the right to garnish the stockholder in a suit against the corporation been considered.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Patterson v. Lynde (1883) 106 U. S. 519, 27 L. ed. 265, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432, was dealing with a case which arose under a constitutional provision that "the stockholders of all corporations and joint stock companies shall be liable for the indebtedness of such corporation to the amount of their stock subscribed and unpaid, and no more." A subsequent provision relating to the sales of stock made the seller liable "to existing creditors for the amount of such balance [the amount unpaid on the stock] unless the same be duly paid by such purchaser." The court states that the liability under this provision is "not to the creditors, but for the indebtedness. That is no more than the liability created by the subscription. The subscription is part of the assets of the corporation, at least so far as creditors are concerned. The liability of the stockholder to the creditor is through the corporation, not direct. There is no privity of contract between them, and the creditor has not been given, either by the Constitution or the statute, any new remedy for the enforcement of his rights. The stockholder is liable to the extent that the subscription represented by his stock requires him to contribute to the corporate funds, and when sued for the money he owes, it must be in a way to put what he pays directly or indirectly into the treasury of the corporation for distribution according to law. No one creditor can assume that he alone is entitled to what any stockholder owes, and sue at law so as to appropriate it exclusively to himself."

Whatever may be the liability to creditors, where a receiver has been appointed, a creditor is not entitled to maintain an action against the stockholder. New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Bennett (1851) 6 La. Ann. 456; Gaslight & Bkg. Co. v. Haynes (1852) 7 La. Ann. 114; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. (1892) 48 Minn. 361, 51 N. W. 119 (action under a statute against a number of stockholders). The right of creditors to sue the stockholders of a corporation under receivership is denied also in Big Creek Stone Co. v. Seward (1895) 144 Ind. 205, 42 N. E. 464. The suit in this case was brought by judgment creditors of the corporation against the corporation and certain named subscribers to the capital stock. The complaint alleged the failure of the subscribers to pay more than a small proportion of their subscription; that assessments and calls had been made and remained unpaid; that the corporation held no property subject to execution, but was wholly insolvent and in the hands of a receiver; that there were subscribers who had unpaid assessments and calls. Discovery as to additional subscribers, the amount subscribed, and the amount unpaid upon subscriptions, assessments, and calls was prayed for, and a decree was sought requiring the stock subscribers to pay into court sums sufficient to discharge the indebtedness of the corporation. The Indiana court states: "As we have seen the obligation is owing to the corporation, it is as assets of the corporation, to be gathered in by the receiver, and, when added to other available assets, applied, not upon the debt of some creditor or creditors whom he may prefer, but pro rata among all of the creditors, unless there is some legal or equitable preference by reason of existing liens. It is not the policy of the law that creditors, singly or collectively, may ignore the receiver's possession of corporate assets and his right and duty to protect and preserve them for disposition as the court appointing may direct. If such were the policy, the property might easily be dissipated, some creditors gain advantage over others, the objects for which the receiver is appointed would be frustrated and the authority of the court defeated." In Franklin v. Menown (1882) 11 Mo. App. 592, it is held that a creditor of a corporation cannot proceed against a stockholder by motion after the corporation has assigned its assets including unpaid stock subscriptions for the benefit of its creditors.

It is the theory of some cases that an action in equity may be maintained by a creditor to recover unpaid subscriptions, although no account is asked to be taken of the other indebtedness of the corporation. Crawford v. Rohrer (1883) 59 Md. 605. And that an action at law may be maintained is recognized in Pittsburg Steel Co. v. Baltimore Equitable Soc. (1910) 113 Md. 77, 77 Atl. 255, but it is held in this case, and the decision is affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (1913) 226 U. S. 455, 57 L. ed. 297, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 167, that this right may be taken away and a bill in equity substituted as an exclusive remedy for the enforcement by creditors of the liability to them of stockholders for any unpaid balances on their stock without depriving such creditors of any constitutional rights. Speaking of the right of a creditor to sue a stockholder at law the supreme court of Maryland states that "it was a mere right held by him in common with all other creditors of the corporation to whom the stockholder was liable, and one which the stockholder could satisfy and destroy by payment to any other or others of such creditors. The right, therefore, of the creditor under such circumstances to bring a separate suit at law for an obligation which the debtor might satisfy by payment to a stranger to the suit was not a very valuable right." A similar decision appears in Bettendorf Axle Co. v. Field (1911) 114 Md. 487, 79 Atl. 724, and in this case also the right of a creditor prior to the enactment of the statute in question to sue a stockholder at law upon his unpaid subscription is recognized.

In Jessamine County v. Swigert (1887) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 692, 8 S. W. 13, it is stated that "where a creditor of an insolvent corporation simply seeks payment of his debt out of an unpaid stock subscription, it is the duty of the defendants, if there are other creditors or debtors, to ask for a settlement and an equitable distribution of the assets, and if they fail to do so, the only inquiry is as to the liability of the defendant stockholder to the plaintiff for the payment of their debts."

II. Under statutes.

The following cases sustaining an action at law to recover on the unpaid subscription were decided under statutes expressly authorizing an action at law by a corporate creditor against a stockholder to recover any sums due the corporation by the stockholder: National Park Bank v. Peavey (1894) 64 Fed. 912 (decision under Iowa statute); First Nat. Bank v. Peavey (1895) 69 Fed. 455 (decision under Iowa statute); Atlantic Trust Co. v. Osgood (1902) 116 Fed. 1019 (decision under Iowa statute); Bagnell v. Ives (1911) 184 Fed. 466 (obiter as to Missouri statute); Tama Water-Power Co. v. Hopkins (1890) 79 Iowa, 653, 44 N. W. 797; Calumet Paper Co. v. Stotts Invest. Co. (1895) 96 Iowa, 147, 59 Am. St. Rep. 362, 64 N. W. 782; White v. Blum (1876) 4 Neb. 555. In Rood v. Crocus Hill Min. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 405, 139 S. W. 222, it is stated that the creditor of a corporation who seeks to reach an unpaid subscription may proceed under the statute by motion for execution or bring an action at law under the statute. The Delaware Corporation Law (22 Del. Laws, chap. 394, § 20) provides for a creditor's action at law or a bill in chancery, but these remedies were held not exclusive in Dupont v. Ball (Del.) post, 955.

Some statutes provide that, upon the dissolution of a company leaving debts unpaid, suits may be brought against any person or persons who were stockholders at the time of such dissolution, without joining the company in such suit. Under such a statute a judgment creditor of an insolvent and dissolved corporation has been held empowered to maintain an action at law against a stockholder in the corporation to determine the true value of property conveyed by him to the corporation in payment of his stock, and to obtain judgment against the stockholder to the extent of plaintiff's claim, and to make the judgment payable by the stockholder from the amount due on the unpaid subscription as thus determined. Farmers Bank v. Gallaher (1890) 43 Mo. App. 482.

Other statutes expressly provide that whenever any action is brought to recover any indebtedness against a corporation, it shall be competent to proceed against any one or more stockholders at the same time to the extent of the balance unpaid by such stockholders upon the stock owned by them respectively, whether called in or not as in cases of garnishment. It has been stated that under this statute a stockholder is directly liable to the creditor whether the assets of the corporation are sufficient to pay its debts or not; that the creditor can collect either from the corporation or from the stockholders as he sees fit, that it is not necessary to obtain a judgment and have an execution returned "no property found" before instituting the garnishment proceeding, but that both may be set on foot at the same time. Parmelee v. Price (1904) 208 Ill. 544, 70 N. E. 725 (obiter,—action in this case was a creditor's bill in equity) approved in Cohen v. Toy Gun Mfg. Co. (1912) 172 Ill. App. 330 (action in equity which invited other creditors to join). This statute proceeds upon the theory of garnishment actions. As stated above, the right to garnish the stockholder in a suit against the corporation has not been considered herein.

Not all statutes which impose a liability to creditors, upon stockholders, have been held to authorize an action at law by the creditors. Thus, under a statute providing that "when the whole capital of a corporation shall not be paid in, and the capital paid shall not be sufficient to satisfy the claims of its creditors, each stockholder shall be bound to pay on each share held by him the sum necessary to complete the amount of such share as fixed by the charter of the company, or such proportion of that sum as shall be required to satisfy the debts of the company," an action at law cannot be maintained by a creditor of the corporation against one of the stockholders, it being held that an action to charge a stockholder under such statute is one in equity bringing in the other stockholders who have not paid. Griffith v. Mangam (1878) 73 N. Y. 611. W. A. E.

1. A guardian ad litem for an infant has no authority to contract with attorneys employed to bring suit on its behalf as to the compensation to be received by them.

— repudiation of contract — making new one.

2. A minor avoids his contract employing attorneys to prosecute a claim for personal injuries, by applying for the appointment of a general guardian and making an independent settlement with the one responsible for the injuries.

— right as to repudiation of contract.

3. Attorneys can enforce no rights under a contract by which an infant employed them to bring an action for him to recover for personal injuries, after it has been repudiated by the infant, although the action might be regarded as a necessary.

Attorney and client — settlement of action by minor — effect on attorneys' claim.

4. Attorneys who have contracted to bring a suit for a minor for a share of the recovery can enforce no claim against defendant, who settles with the minor without their consent after the minor has repudiated his contract with them.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County (Kennan, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due, under a settlement entered into between defendant and a minor, by virtue of a contract of employment with him. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Plummer & Lavin, for appellants:

The contract made between the minor and plaintiffs for the prosecution of the damage case was a valid, subsisting, legal, and binding contract, and was not void because of the minority of Lester Walsh.

22 Cyc. 594; Crafts v. Carr, 24 R. I. 397, 60 L.R.A. 128, 96 Am. St. Rep. 721, 53 Atl. 275; Sutton v. Heinzle, 84 Kan. 756, 84 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 115 Pac. 560.

The validity of such contract could only be questioned by the minor, and such objection was not available to the defendant, who was not a party to it.

Chapman v. Duffy, 20 Colo. App. 471, 79 Pac. 746.

The agreement of the minor for the payment of a contingent fee acted as an assignment to plaintiffs of a part of his claim, and an interest in the amount subsequently agreed to be paid to him.

The guardian ad litem appointed by the court had exclusive charge, control, and jurisdiction over the claim of the minor in connection with which he was appointed, and no other guardian could acquire any right to represent the minor in such proceeding or in connection with such claim or action, so long as the order appointing such guardian remained effective.

Defendant's agreement to pay the minor a certain amount and to assume the burden of settling with plaintiffs, his attorneys in the damage case, with whom he made the contract, obligated defendant to pay to them a sum equal to that paid to the minor.

ANNOTATION.

Power of guardian ad litem or next friend to bind infant by his contract with attorney fixing compensation.

- I. Introductory, 108.
- II. View of want of power, 108.
- III. Power to make reasonable contracts, 109.
- IV. Where contract is unreasonable, 110.
- V. Rights of attorneys, 110.
- VI. Miscellaneous, 111.

I. Introductory.

The preliminary question whether a guardian ad litem or next friend has power to hire attorneys whose compensation is to be paid by the infant does not admit of a general answer. It depends upon the nature of the case. For example, where the guardian ad litem is himself a lawyer, it is usual for him to act without other counsel, except in cases of importance.

As to the power to bind the infant by contracts fixing the amount of compensation, there is some variety in judicial expressions. Some courts say there is no such power, others that there is no power to contract for an unreasonable fee, and still others that a contract for a reasonable fee is good. All agree that the infant will not be liable for an unreasonable fee.

II. View of want of power.

Some of the cases assert the broad rule that a guardian ad litem may not make a contract for compensation which shall bind the infant or his estate. Cole v. Superior Ct. (1883) 63 Cal. 86, 49 Am. Rep. 78; Houck v. Bridwell (1888) 28 Mo. App. 644; Re Stone (1918) 176 N. C. 336, 97 S. E. 216; PLUMMER v. NORTHERN P. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 104.

A contract by the mother of an infant, who employs an attorney for her infant son, to prosecute an action for personal injuries, agreeing to pay him 40 per cent of the recovery, is not binding on the mother as guardian ad litem for the son in such a suit, but in granting an order substituting another attorney, the court provided that in the event of recovery in the action an opportunity be awarded to the discharged attorney to have the amount of his compensation fixed for services rendered. Bryant v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1901) 64 App. Div. 542, 72 N. Y. Supp. 308.

Some of the cases state that the guardian has no power to make such a contract without the approval of the court. Ryan v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1911) 189 Fed. 253; Re Hart (1909) 131 App. Div. 661, 116 N. Y. Supp. 193.

In Ryan v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (Fed.) supra, the court approved the making by the guardian ad litem for an infant plaintiff of a contract to pay her attorney 50 per cent compensation, upon the basis of a contingent fee, for his services in the case, no written retainer or contract having been signed until after the case had been substantially settled and the lack of such a contract noticed. The court said: "This court is bound to hold that a guardian ad litem, being an officer of the court, even though appointed in the state court before removal of the action, cannot enter into a contract with any attorney, who is necessarily an officer of the court, which shall bind the ward of the court, unless that agreement meet with the court's approval. The guardian ad litem is not a party who is independent, in the ordinary sense. He is rather a party capable of entering into legal relations, who thus supplies the lack of capacity on the part of the infant. But the very fact that he is appointed to represent a ward of the court, and that his appointment is by the court, leaves his actions and the actions of all who are responsible to the court, subject to the court's scrutiny, before the court can be asked to lend its authority to a determination of the rights of the party whose protection is being attempted. For this reason the guardian ad litem has the right to call into question the action of the attorney in obtaining from her the signature of a contract for a 50 per cent attorney fee, upon such terms as might have been asked before bringing the action, and at a time when the possibility of recovery or the obtaining of evidence was entirely undetermined. Such a charge would be unconscionable and entirely out of proportion, no matter what the hazard of recovery might previously have been, if this charge were made for nothing but the actual settlement of a case already on trial, and in which an amount in settlement had been offered. . . . A fee of this amount even in settlement also does not seem to be out of proportion or unconscionable in this case, from the standpoint of fair compensation to the attorney, including the payment of counsel fees. Especially is this true where the plaintiff will be reimbursed for disbursements or witness fees."

In Re Hart (N. Y.) supra, where an attorney was disbarred, Ingraham, J., said of an agreement by a guardian ad litem with an attorney by which he was to receive 50 per cent of any recovery in a civil action for assault on the infant: "The guardian had no power to make any contract or agreement which would dispose of or create a lien upon the infant's cause of action, or any money or property realized therefrom, without the approval of the court. The respondent, however, made a bargain with the guardian which disposed of 50 per cent of the infant's cause of action, and which, if valid, would have made him directly interested in the proceeds of the infant's cause of action realized through the legal proceedings which were contemplated. It seems to me that the making of such an agreement is of itself serious professional misconduct. The fact that it was not binding in any way upon the infant does not mitigate the seriousness of the offense. It was an attempt of an attorney of this court, in violation of his duty and in violation of law, to possess himself of one half of an infant's cause of action by virtue of an agreement made with a person appointed to conduct a litigation, and who was prohibited from receiving the proceeds of such litigation, or any property of the infant, except upon giving a bond approved by a judge."

III. Power to make reasonable contracts.

It has been held that an agreement by a guardian ad litem or next friend with an attorney, fixing the amount of compensation, is good when the amount is reasonable. Hickman v. McDonald (1914) 164 Iowa, 50, 145 N. W. 323; Sanders v. Woodbury (1912) 146 Ky. 153, 142 S. W. 207; Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis (1912) 149 Ky. 449, 149 S. W. 894; Hanlon v. Wheeler (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 821.

An agreement by an infant and her next friend with attorneys for a 50 per cent contingent fee for their services in a case where such services are a necessary is good where the amount is not unreasonable. Hickman v. McDonald (Iowa) supra.

Where there was an agreement by a next friend with an attorney for a 50 per cent contingent fee for his services in a personal injury case, and the attorney was content to accept a sum of about 42 or 43 per cent, the court held it was error for the trial court to reduce this amount, as it was not unreasonable. The court said: "Our conclusion, then, is that the next friend of an infant may employ counsel to represent him and agree on the compensation to be paid, subject, however, to the limitation that the fee agreed upon shall be reasonable, and this is a question for the court. That being true, such a contract will be upheld if it appears that the compensation contracted for is reasonable." Sanders v. Woodbury (1912) 146 Ky. 153, 142 S. W. 207, supra.

In Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis (1912) 149 Ky. 449, 149 S. W. 894, supra, the court followed Sanders v. Woodbury (Ky.) supra, as to 50 per cent in a personal injury case.

In Hanlon v. Wheeler (Tex.) supra, the court approved a charge to the effect that if the jury thought that the infant and his next friend made a contract with attorneys for 50 per cent of the amount that might be recovered in a suit, and that this was a reasonable compensation, then the infant was bound thereby, but that if the figure was more than a reasonable compensation, then the infant was not bound, and the attorneys would be entitled to a reasonable compensation, the court observing that the contract was one for necessities.

And in Haj v. American Bottle Co. (1913) 182 Ill. App. 636, where the contract with an attorney was made by the infant and his next friend in relation to a claim for personal injuries, agreeing that the fee should be one third of the recovery or settlement, it was held that the services were a necessary, and that the infant could make a valid contract to pay an attorney a reasonable compensation, and that his next friend could also do so, and that the compensation in this case was reasonable in the absence of proof to the contrary. [This case was reversed in (1913) 261 Ill. 362, 103 N. E. 1000, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 220, on the ground that notice of the lien had not been given to the defendant in compliance with the statute.]

IV. Where contract is unreasonable.

A guardian ad litem or next friend cannot bind the infant by a contract with an attorney for an unreasonable compensation. Everson v. Hurn (1911) 89 Neb. 716, 131 N. W. 1130; Hanlon v. Wheeler (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 821. See also cases throughout this note, particularly Ryan v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. (1911) 189 Fed. 258, supra, II.

In Everson v. Hurn (Neb.) supra, it was held that an agreement by the mother and grandfather of an infant with an attorney to contest a will for the infant for one third to one half of the recovery "could not bind the minor, or any estate which he might acquire through such contest proceedings, for anything more than reasonable compensation to the attorney so employed; and it is the duty of the court in such a case, where proceedings are instituted to recover for services so performed, even if no such defense is interposed, on its own motion, to limit the recovery of the plaintiff in such a proceeding to a reasonable compensation for the services rendered."

V. Rights of attorneys.

The reader will understand that cases here referred to holding that an attorney is entitled to a reasonable fee do not mean that there may not be cases in which the attorney is not entitled to any fee at all. For example, the question whether in the particular case a next friend or guardian ad litem has any right to employ an attorney at all for whose services the infant would be liable is beyond the scope of this note.

There are a number of cases holding that attorneys employed by a next friend or guardian ad litem are entitled to a reasonable fee. Owens v. Gunther (1905) 75 Ark. 37, 86 S. W. 851, 5 Ann. Cas. 180; Burns v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1914) 190 Ill. App. 191; Connor v. Ashley (1899) 57 S. C. 305, 35 S. E. 546; Ex parte Smithson (1902) 108 Tenn. 442, 67 S. W. 864; Searcy v. Hunter (1891) 81 Tex. 644, 26 Am. St. Rep. 837, 17 S. W. 372; Hanlon v. Wheeler (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 821.

This has been held where an action in equity brought by a guardian ad litem resulted in a recovery for the infant. Connor v. Ashley (1899) 57 S. C. 305, 35 S. E. 546, supra. And where an infant suing by next friend recovered "damages," it was held that the attorneys had a lien on the recovery for their reasonable compensation. Ex parte Smithson (1902) 108 Tenn. 442, 67 S. W. 864, supra.

And where the statutory guardian has an interest so adverse to the infant in a suit in equity brought against him, that the court appoints a guardian ad litem whose attorneys appear and render beneficial and necessary services, they are entitled to a reasonable fee, but not, it was held, to a lien on the infant's property. Owens v. Gunther (Ark.) supra.

In Burns v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1914)

190 Ill. App. 191, supra, it was held that an infant or his next friend may hire attorneys' services, as these are necessities, and the attorneys are entitled to a reasonable compensation.

In Searcy v. Hunter (1891) 81 Tex. 644, 26 Am. St. Rep. 837, 17 S. W. 372, the court said, referring to an action relating to land: "Looking to the condition of affairs in our own state, it seems to us that to refuse to allow an attorney who, at the instance of a next friend, has instituted a suit in behalf of a minor and recovered for him money or property, to claim from the infant a reasonable compensation for his services, would be to establish a rule which would operate to the prejudice of the class it is designed to protect. In such case, where the services have been beneficial to the infant, we are of opinion that reasonable compensation should be allowed."

In Sutton v. Heinze (1911) 84 Kan. 756, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 115 Pac. 560, where the appellant contended that the contract of an attorney with the minor, or with the next friend for the minor, was void, the court, while not discussing the amount of compensation, said: "Whether or not an express contract as to the attorney's compensation was enforceable according to its terms, the services having been rendered and having been beneficial to the minor, a liability exists to pay for them on the ground that they are classed as 'necessaries.'"

Where the father as next friend employed an attorney to prosecute a suit for his infant daughter for assault, and it did not appear that there was any agreement fixing the amount of compensation, the court considered the services as necessities, and said: "The third request of the defendant, which the presiding justice denied, viz., 'If the defendant was an infant under the age of twenty-one years, the father could not bind her estate by any contract with the plaintiff for professional services,'—might be correct as an abstract proposition of law, disconnected from the circumstances of this case, but with its connections, we think it was properly denied. The father's employment of the plaintiff as counsel in the action against Brown was simply for his infant daughter while he was acting as her prochein ami, and in connection with the conduct of his daughter was not the father's promise, but the implied promise of the infant daughter." Crafts v. Carr (1902) 24 R. I. 397; 60 L.R.A. 128, 96 Am. St. Rep. 721, 53 Atl. 275.

Some of the cases assert that the next friend or guardian ad litem may employ an attorney, the amount of compensation to be fixed by the court. Re Stone (1918) 176 N. C. 386, 97 S. E. 216; Plummer v. Northern P. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 104.

While, as heretofore stated, this note does not take up the question as to what cases are proper for the hire of attorneys by next friends and guardians ad litem, it may be noted, for example, that in Grissem v. Beidelman (1912) 35 Okla. 348, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 411, 129 Pac. 853, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 599, it was held that where a next friend contracts for the services of an attorney to prosecute an action to recover the infant's interest in lands, the attorney cannot recover of the infant in an action at law for his services, as the same are not a necessary; and that in Re Johnston (1887) 6 Dem. (N. Y.) 355, the surrogate, while making an allowance to the special guardian of infants, refused an allowance to the special guardian for his counsel, as it had never been the practice of the court to make any such allowance,

VI. Miscellaneous.

In Blake v. Corcoran (1912) 211 Mass. 406, 97 N. E. 1002, where an infant brought an action by his father as next friend, and his attorneys collected a judgment in his favor, it was held that his father as next friend could not thereafter settle with them as to the amount they should retain for their services.

In Colgate v. Colgate (1873) 23 N. J. Eq. 872, when the guardian ad litem was the clerk of the court, appointed pro forma, only for the purpose of placing the infant within the jurisdiction of the court, the court directed that "the guardian ad litem must therefore be directed to employ proper counsel, approved by the court, to represent the infant in this investigation, whose compensation, as well as the expenses necessarily incurred in the investigation, will be directed to be paid by the trustee out of the moneys of the infant in his hands."

In case of an infant defendant, the court observed: "The better practice would seem to be, where the guardian ad litem is appointed and he believes that his ward has rights, for him to apply to the court for leave to employ counsel, and the court should, in granting leave, fix the amount that might, if required, be expended for the purpose of the defense, which, if it, from protracted litigation or otherwise, should prove insufficient, the court, on being satisfied of the fact, might increase the sum." Smith v. Smith (1873) 69 Ill. 308. Quoted and approved in Richardson v. Tyson (1901) 110 Wis. 572, 84 Am. St. Rep. 937, 86 N. W. 250.

In the brief report of the case of Nagel v. Schilling (1884) 14 Mo. App.

576, it is stated to have been there held that the proper defense of a suit against an infant is a necessity, for the cost of which the estate may be liable, and that a request for the defense of such a suit may be presumed from the necessities of the case, taken in connection with the exercise of discretion by the guardian ad litem in engaging for such defense the services of the law firm of which he is a member.

In a case where, when the court spoke, the infant was of age, it was said: "Where, as in the present case, the plaintiff adopts and ratifies a settlement, he is liable for such costs, if any, as he would have been liable for had he been an adult when he began the action. It will, therefore, be open to him to prove, if he can, that the services of the solicitors were to be gratis or on any special terms." Vano v. Canadian Coloured Cotton Mills Co. (1910) 21 Ont. L. Rep. 144.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 218.)

Water — right to place obstruction in channel.

1. The right to erect dikes to protect riparian land will not justify a riparian owner or other person in erecting or placing within the channel or banks of such stream any obstruction or barrier which will interfere with the free flow of the waters therein or cause the same to be backed up and to flood the land or property of a riparian owner along such stream.

—liability for act of God.

2. In the absence of some initial or intervening act of negligence on his part contributing thereto, one is not liable for damages arising from an act of God, such as an unprecedented flood of waters of great force and volume caused by a cloud-burst at the head waters of a creek or river.

—right to natural flow.

3. A riparian proprietor has as a general rule the right to have the waters of a stream or watercourse pass his land in its natural flow unobstructed and to render anyone violating or interfering with such right liable to him in damages sustained thereby.

—right to confine flood to stream.

4. The only limitation on such right of a riparian owner is that any other riparian owner may erect barriers or dikes on his own land on the banks of such watercourse or on the interior of his land for the purpose of confining flood waters within the natural banks of the stream, although such action may result in injury to another riparian owner.

CERTIFICATION by the Circuit Court for Kanawha County for the determination by the Supreme Court of Appeals of questions arising upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. Howard Hundley and Harold W. Houston, for plaintiff:

A party whose wrongful acts cooperate with, augment, or accelerate those forces of nature known as the "act of God," to the injury of another, is liable in damages therefor.

Messrs. Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown, & Davis and C. W. Strickling for defendant.

Miller, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sufficiency of plaintiff's declaration was challenged by defendant's demurrer. The court below sustained the demurrer, and has certified the questions presented with its rulings thereon to us for review.

The substantial averments are that the plaintiff was owner of certain real estate and personal property in the town of Eskdale, situated upon and near the banks of Cabin creek, a non-navigable stream, and about 100 yards above the trestles or bridges of the defendant company crossing said creek; that on or about August 9, 1916, there was a cloud-burst on the head waters of said creek which caused a flood therein of unprecedented volume and violence to sweep down the valley and channel of said creek and through said town of Eskdale and Cane Fork and over and through said trestles or bridges of the defendant company, carrying large quantities of wreckage and debris before it; and that defendant, through its agents, servants, and employees acting within the scope of their employment, and with full knowledge that the said flood was sweeping down the channel of said creek toward its said railroad trestles or bridges, and in disregard of its duty not to divert, impede, or obstruct the natural flow of the waters in said creek so as to cause them to flow back, over and upon the plaintiff's property and damage it, and for the purpose and with the object of protecting its said trestles or bridges from being washed away and destroyed by said flood, wrongfully, negligently, knowingly, and unlawfully ran, or caused to be run and propelled, a large railroad engine, owned and controlled by it, out upon one of said trestles or bridges just below the said town of Eskdale and just below plaintiff's property, and in the course and pathway of the waters of said flood, and there to remain and to obstruct the natural flow of the waters in said creek, and causing the wreckage and debris then being conveyed down said stream, and thereby causing the water to be dammed and backed up stream and over and upon plaintiff's said property, whereby it was damaged and destroyed and whereby he sustained great damage and loss, amounting to $10,000.

It is conceded on both sides that the cloud-burst causing the flood and the waters of unprecedented volume and force to flow down the creek as alleged constituted an act of God for which the defendant without some initial act of negligence on its part could not be ran-dered liable in damages to plaintiff.

Water-liability for

This is a well-settled proposition of law in this state and elsewhere. Williams v. Columbus Producing Co. 80 W. Va. 683, L.R.A.1918B, 179, 93 S. E. 809; Atkinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 74 W. Va. 633, 82 S. E. 502.

But counsel for plaintiff contend that with knowledge on the part of defendant of the oncoming flood waters, the placing of its engine on the trestle or bridge in the middle of the creek and in the way of the stream so as to obstruct the natural flow of the water therein, which, together with the wreckage and debris caught thereby, caused the water to be dammed and backed up upon plaintiff's property as alleged, constituted an original act of negligence and invasion of his rights for which defendant is liable to account to him in damages.

The right of a riparian proprietor to have the waters of a stream or watercourse pass his land in its natural course unobstructed and to hold anyone violating this right liable for damages sustained thereby is not controverted. This proposition is well settled and recognized not only by the decisions of this court but elsewhere. Roberts v. Martin, 72 W. Va. 92, 77 S. E. 535; Williams v. Columbus Producing Co. and Atkinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. supra; Cline v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 69 W. Va. 436, 71 S. E. 705; Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 351, 60 L. ed. 1041, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671.

The only limitation upon this right is that each riparian owner for his own protection may erect

—right to
to stream.

barriers or dikes so as to confine the flood waters within the natural banks of the stream, a right pertaining to all such proprietors, and when exercised no one has the right to complain of another, although the effect of the thing done may have caused some injury to him or his property. Cubbins v. Mis- issippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 364, 60 L. ed. 1047, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671, supra, and cases cited.

The contention of counsel for demurrant is that because of the accidental and extraordinary conditions existing at the time of the alleged injury, the defendant had the right to run its engine upon the trestle or bridge, not for the purpose of restraining the flood waters to the natural banks of the creek and thereby protecting its property, but to hold in place works constructed by it across the stream, though the result of that act was to obstruct the free flow of the waters in the channel, catching the wreckage and debris therein, and to dam up the water and throw it back upon plaintiff. We find no warrant for this position in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Meriwether, 120 Va. 55, 91 S. E. 92, nor in Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, supra, nor in Jackson v. United States, 230 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1363, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1011, cited and relied on by counsel. The only right recognized in these cases is the defensive one accorded owners to protect themselves against damages by defensive works constructed at or upon the borders of rivers or creeks or on the interior of their own lands against such extraordinary conditions. This is the limitation recognized by very ancient authority and in the Federal and other cases cited. But they furnish no precedent for the position of counsel that the defendant might lawfully, in the emergency existing, cast the burden of loss on plaintiff in order to protect its own property. Section

in channel.

50, subd. 6, of chapter 54 (§ 2949) of the Code, gives railroad companies the right to cross with their railroads along or upon any stream or watercourse, but specifically requires them to restore such stream or watercourse to its former state so as not to injure or impair its usefulness.

The case presented by the declaration, in our opinion, comes clearly within the principles of Williams v. Columbus Producing Co. 80 W. Va. 683, L.R.A.1918B, 179, 93 S. E. 809; Atkinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 74 W. Va. 633, 82 S. E. 502, and Neal v. Ohio River R. Co. 47 W. Va. 316, 34 S. E. 914. The first of these cases cited originated or grew out of the same flood conditions on Cabin creek involved in the case at bar. The only material difference in the facts is that in the Williams Case the injury resulted from the building of an oil well derrick and oil tanks within the banks of the creek, while in this case the alleged negligence consisted in placing a railroad engine across the stream in view of the approaching waters to avoid damages to the trestles or bridges of the railroad company. The latter was as much an initial act of negligence as the other.

Counsel for defendant also rely on cases involving the blowing up of buildings to prevent the spread of fire such as Keller v. Corpus Christi, 50 Tex. 614, 32 Am. Rep. 613, and Surocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69, 58 Am. Dec. 385, all involving the exercise of the police power of the state. We think these cases have no application to the case at bar.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment below, to overrule the demurrer to the declaration, and to remand the case to the Circuit Court.

ANNOTATION.

Liability for damages to riparian owner by means adopted to protect bridge or other structure in or across stream at time of flood.

An interesting question is presented in the reported case (TAYLOR v. CHESAPEAKE & O. R. Co. ante, 112) as to the liability for damages to riparian property by means adopted to protect a bridge or other structure in or across a stream during a flood. The court admits the defensive right accorded riparian owners to protect themselves against damages by defensive works constructed at or on the borders of a stream, but holds that a riparian owner has no aggressive right to cast the burden of loss on another riparian owner in order to protect his own property. This question was also presented for adjudication in the case of Higgins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 567, 29 N. Y. Supp. 563, wherein it appeared that during a flood the defendant's servants placed railroad planks and pieces of logs at the ends of an immense piece of timber chained across the stream so as to throw the water off. This turned the water across the premises of the plaintiff. In an action to recover for the damage done to the premises, the court said: "If this evidence is true, it tends to show that much of the damage suffered by the plaintiff on this occasion occurred through the means adopted by the defendant's servants in protecting the bridge, and, if so, there can be no doubt as to the right of the plaintiff to recover."

In Noyes v. Shepherd (1849) 30 Me. 173, 50 Am. Dec. 625, the court said by way of dictum: "Imminent danger expected from fire or flood cannot excuse or exempt one from the use of ordinary care to prevent unnecessary injury to the property of others. What would under such circumstances be ordinary care must be determined by a jury; and it might not be the same care, or an equal degree of caution, which would reasonably be expected when there was little or no cause to apprehend immediate danger. However imminent the danger may be, a person must be held responsible for an injury to the property of another, occasioned by negligence of a less culpable character than such gross carelessness as would reasonably authorize an inference that it was done with an evil intent."

A person causing damage by precautions taken to protect his property from flood is liable if his act is found to be negligent. Hunter v. Pelham Mills (1898) 52 S. C. 279, 68 Am. St. Rep. 904, 29 S. E. 727. In that case the de-defendant offered testimony which tended to show that an unusually heavy rainy season had obtained in the section where his property was located, and that, on the day of the injury to the plaintiff's property, there was a heavy rainstorm, which caused the water to rise to a considerable height in an hour. It appeared that the defendant had five floodgates in his dam across the stream, and when the water overflowed his dam, he opened two of the floodgates to preserve his own property from injury. The water thus released caused the already swollen stream to overflow the lands and destroy the crops of the plaintiff. The defendant further alleged that to have allowed the water to run as it was doing when the two floodgates were raised would not only have flooded the defendant's mills, but would have caused greater danger to the plaintiff's property than could possibly have happened after the raising of the floodgates. The lower court instructed the jury that "negligence is the gist of this action. To find for the plaintiff, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant negligently opened the floodgates of its dam, and that the raising of said floodgates caused the damage complained of." The jury found the defendant negligent, and on appeal the instruction was sustained.

The case of Ross v. Horsey (1840) 3 Harr. (Del.) 60, arose under the Statute of 1819 "for the preservation of mill property" (Dig. 405), providing that when a riparian owner discharged any unusual amount of water through his dam, notice must be given to the owner nearest the dam. It appeared that during a violent storm, the defendant cut his own dam when it was on the point of being broken, and that he gave no notice to the plaintiff residing next below the dam. The court said: "The duty of providing for the safety of his neighbor's mill cannot be paramount to the right of taking care of his own. This would be unreasonable. If the force of tempest and flood was so great on this occasion as to require the presence of Mr. Horsey and all under his command, to preserve his own mill and dam, he could not reasonably be required to detach a part of that force as a messenger to the lower mill, in this state of peril to all mill property, arising from this unusual storm, all persons were bound to be vigilant to provide for its effects; and though the duty of transmitting actual notice of breaches from those above to those below attached the moment it could be done without abandoning their own property, and in fact increasing the danger to all, it is not reasonable, and the law does not require, that it should be given sooner."

A. F. CLARK, Plff. in Err.,

NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 480.)

Search — of train — warrant by justice of peace — validity.

1. A warrant issued by a justice of the peace, commanding search to be made of a certain passenger train, to ascertain if intoxicating liquors are being carried thereon contrary to law, is not proper evidence to be considered by the jury against the plaintiff in the trial of an action by him against the carrier for his unlawful expulsion from the car. Such warrant is void.

Headnotes by WILLIAMS, J.

Carrier — duty to protect passenger from arrest.

2. Although a carrier is obliged to use reasonable diligence to protect its passengers against unlawful assaults by other passengers, its own servants, and third persons, its servants are under no duty to resist or interfere with a known officer in making an arrest of a passenger, unless they know or by reasonable diligence ought to know that the arrest is unlawful; neither are they bound to make inquiry into such known officer's authority.

Master and servant — special agent of railroad company — liability for act.

3. A railroad company is not liable for the act of its special agent in assisting prohibition officers in forcing a passenger off a train, if in that transaction he was acting under special deputation of the officers and not as agent of the railroad company.

[See 4 R. C. L. 1180.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for McDowell County to review a judgment setting aside a verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged unlawful expulsion from defendant's train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Froe & Capehart for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Sale & Tucker, for defendant in error:

The verdict of the jury was not supported by the evidence.

White v. L. Hoster Brewing Co. 51 W. Va. 259, 41 S. E. 180; Lovett v. West Virginia Central Gas Co. 73 W. Va. 40, 79 S. E. 1007.

The action of the officers in removing Clark from the train was legal, and the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant, because there was no duty upon the employees of the railway company to interfere.

The railway company could not be held liable for the failure of its employees to interfere with the action of known officers of the law in the apparent exercise of their official authority, and the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action of trespass on the case plaintiff recovered a verdict against defendant for $500, which, on motion of defendant, the court set aside, and plaintiff brings error, asking that the judgment be reversed, and judgment entered here on the verdict.

Plaintiff purchased a ticket from Ironton, Ohio, to Iaeger, West Virginia, and boarded one of defendant's trains as a passenger on December 16, 1916. He and a number of others had gone to Ironton on the day previous to purchase liquor. It was not then unlawful for a person to carry more than 2 quarts of liquor into the state for personal use, provided the container thereof was properly labeled, showing the kind and quantity thereof. A coach was attached to the rear of the train just behind a Pullman car at Iron-ton for the accommodation of those passengers who were carrying liquor, and plaintiff was told to get in that coach and did so. In fact, that coach seems to have been filled with such passengers. Plaintiff admits he had 16 quarts of whisky and 1 quart of alcohol in a suit case, but swears it was properly labeled, and the jury evidently believed him, which they had a right to do, although his testimony on this point is contradicted by other witnesses for defendant. When the train arrived and stopped at Williamson, West Virginia, which is the end of one of defendant's divisions, where a change of crews is made, and which is a long distance west of Iaeger, the prohibition officer and his deputies, four or five in number, armed with pistols, entered the coach and forced a number of the passengers, including plaintiff, to alight. Three or four of them, but not the plaintiff, were arrested for not having labels on their packages of whisky. Plaintiff did not attempt to reboard the train, but spent the night at a hotel and took another train the next morning for Iaeger. Plaintiff swears the train stopped some distance before it reached the depot at Williamson, and, quoting his language, says: "Some men came in and told us to get off that train, and drew their guns, and some of them unloaded, and I didn't have time to get off until after the train had done started out. I went on into Williamson, and they made us get off."

He was asked:

Who made you get off?

A. Well, there was the brakeman and these here officers.

And, being asked if he was frightened, he replied: "Yes, sir; I was scared not to get off the train, after

I didn't know what they were going to do to me."

He was further asked what the brakeman did to him, and replied: "The brakeman didn't do anything; just asked me to go ahead off."

And, the question being repeated, he added, "To further any more trouble," meaning, of course, to avoid any further trouble. Some of plaintiff's answers are hardly intelligible; but it fairly appears from his testimony that, when the officers entered the car, it caused a great deal of commotion among the passengers, some of whom got off immediately, and others a little later, after the train had pulled up to the depot, and that none of the train crew protested, or did anything to protect plaintiff from being ejected. Plaintiff's counsel rely on the cases of Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 588, 14 L.R.A. 798, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827, 14 S. E. 243, and Anania v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 77 W. Va. 105, L.R.A. 1916C, 439, 87 S. E. 167, 11 N. C. C. A. 1025, in support of their contention that, under the state of facts established by plaintiff's evidence, the defendant is liable; that a carrier is under obligation to protect its passengers from unlawful arrest or ejection from its train.

In the Gillingham Case, the conductor of the train actually caused plaintiff's arrest for an offense committed in his presence, and which, by the exercise of proper diligence, he was bound to know plaintiff was innocent of. After sending for the officer to make the arrest, the conductor pointed out Gillingham to him as the guilty person; whereas the guilty party was shown to be another passenger occupying a seat behind him. The assault for which the arrest was made was committed on the conductor, and he pointed out to the officer the wrong man as the one who had committed it.

In the Anania Case, the officer, who happened to be on the train at the time, arrested Anania and some other passengers for disorderly conduct, which occurred in the presence of the conductor and the officer. Anania had been guilty of no misconduct. The opinion in that case states that the conductor knew, or if reasonably diligent ought to have known, that fact. It was clearly the duty of the conductor in that instance to have protested, at least, against Anania's arrest.

But here the facts are quite different. It is a fact, proven and not disputed, that the conductor and brakemen in charge of the train all knew that the men who forced plaintiff to alight were officers, and in such case the law imposes no

to protect passenger

duty upon the carrier or its servants or agents to inquire into the officer's authority, or substitute their opinions for his, or to protest against his arresting a passenger. A passenger train is not intended as a place of refuge for criminals, and unless a passenger is arrested for an offense of which the carrier's agent knew, or by proper diligence ought to have known, he is not guilty, he is not obliged to interfere or protest against the arrest. The rule, however, is different where the carrier's servants know, or by the exercise of proper diligence ought to know, that the arrest of the passenger is unlawful, as was the case in Anania v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. supra.

In Bowden v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 144 N. C. 28, 56 S. E. 558, 12 Ann. Cas. 783, it appears that plaintiff ran away with a sixteen-year-old girl for the purpose of marrying her. They were passengers on defendant's train. In response to a telegram from a brother of the girl to the chief of police of Jacksonville, North Carolina, notifying him that the parties had eloped, the moment the train arrived at Jacksonville he boarded the train to make the arrest. Apprehending his arrest, plaintiff, without the knowledge of the conductor, took refuge in the water-closet and bolted the door on the inside. The officer demanded the key of the conductor, and he instructed the porter to deliver it to the officer. Finding he could not open the door with the key, the officer presented his pistol through the window of the closet, and compelled plaintiff to unbolt the door and surrender. He then took the couple from the train. The court held the carrier not liable and in its opinion says that plaintiff having concealed himself in the closet without the knowledge of the conductor, the fact that the conductor surrendered the key is no evidence of a purpose to aid and abet the officer, nor is the fact that the train remained at the station a few minutes longer than usual any evidence of the conductor's intent to aid the officer in making the arrest. Says the court: "The most that can be said is that the conductor did not resist the officers in executing their purpose to arrest plaintiff. It is not the duty of a conductor to resist a known officer of the law in making an arrest."

In this case the brakeman's advice to plaintiff to "go ahead off," if he said it, which the brakemen all deny, and plaintiff was not able to identify the person who, he says, told him, is not evidence of any intent to aid the officers. According to plaintiff's testimony, the request was made simply to avoid further trouble. There is no evidence whether or not defendant's servants knew that plaintiff's suit case was properly labeled as containing whisky, or that they knew why the officers ejected him from the car. Knowing that they were officers, the defendant's agents were under no duty to inquire into the legality of their acts. The following authorities are in point, and support the principles announced in this opinion: 4 R. C. L. 1194; 10 C. J. 908; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Crosby, 183 Ala. 237, 62 So. 889; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Byrley, 152 Ky. 35, 158 S. W. 36, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 240; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Ponder, 117 Ga. 63, 60 L.R.A. 713, 97 Am. St. Rep. 152, 43 S. E. 430, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 254, and Thompkins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 52 L.R.A.

Counsel for plaintiff insist that I. W. Clark, although appointed by the governor of the state, was a special agent of the railway company, and assisted the officers in ejecting plaintiff and other passengers from the train. Said Clark was not acting as agent of the railway company on this occasion. He swears he was deputized by Mr. Keadle and Mr. Slater, the prohibition officers, to assist them, and his testimony is servant—special agent of railroad company—

liability for act.

not denied. He was acting outside of his duty to the railway company and as a deputized officer, and his assistance in expelling plaintiff constitutes no ground of liability on defendant.

The justice's warrant, under which the prohibition officers acted in searching the car, was introduced and read as evidence over the objection of plaintiff.

This was error. Search—of train —warrant by justice of peace
—validity.
The law does not authorize a justice of the peace to issue his warrant commanding search to be made of the coaches of a passenger train in transit, to ascertain if liquor is being carried therein in violation of the law. A passenger train in transit is not one of the places mentioned, or contemplated by § 9, chapter 32A, Barnes's Code 1918 (Code 1913, chap. 32A, § 9 [§ 1288]) of which search may be made under the provisions of that section.

Under the state of evidence appearing from the record, defendant's peremptory instruction should have been given, and the court was justified in setting aside the verdict and ordering a new trial, and we therefore affirm the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial.

ANNOTATION.

Power to issue warrant for search of train.

As to constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures as applied to search for, or seizure of, intoxicating liquor, see annotation to People v. Marxhausen, 3 A.L.R. 1514.

By the 4th Amendment to the Federal Constitution it is provided that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

A similar provision is contained in the Constitutions of the several states limiting the power of state officers with respect to the writ.

The power to issue warrants for the search of trains depends, of course, upon the particular phraseology of these provisions.

It will be observed that in the reported case (CLARK v. NORFOLK & W. R. Co. ante, 117) it was decided that a justice of the peace was not authorized to issue a warrant commanding search to be made of the coaches of a passenger train in transit to ascertain if liquor was being carried in violation of law, the court holding that a passenger train was not one of the places contemplated by the West Virginia statute, of which search might be made.

Generally, for the application of constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures to search for or seizure of intoxicating liquor, see annotation in 3 A.L.R. 1514.

This appears to be the only case in which, as yet, there has been occasion to consider this question. It is, therefore, of particular value, especially in view of the national Prohibition Amendment.

CITY OF BLOOMFIELD, Appt.,

v.

JAMES A. ALLEN.

(146 Ky. 34, 141 S. W. 400.)

Dedication — right of way — permissive use.

1. Dedication of a right of way for a footpath along the edge of a lot abutting on a railroad right of way is effected, where it lies between the turnpike and the depot, by the owner's consent to a neighbor's building a sidewalk upon it, followed by use by the public in going to and from the depot for more than twenty-five years, while individuals have bought lots access to which is secured by such way upon the faith of its being public, and the owner has complied with the direction of the town to reconstruct the sidewalk.

—acceptance — sufficiency.

2. Acceptance of a dedication of a footpath between a turnpike and a depot is shown by its use by the public for more than fifteen years, and the town's requiring the construction of a sidewalk thereon.

[See 8 R. C. L. 900.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Nelson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to restrain defendant and its officers from building a sidewalk in front of plaintiff's property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Morgan Yewell, C. F. Atkinson, and John A. Fulton, for appellant:

The evidence shows both a dedication of the footpath and the acceptance of the same by the public use.

Messrs. N. W. Halstead, John D. Wickliffe, and Kelly & Cherry for appellee.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

The town of Bloomfield, a city of the sixth class, through its board of trustees, passed an ordinance directing the building of a sidewalk, according to certain specifications therein named, in front of the property of James A. Allen and others. Instead of complying with the ordinance, appellee, Allen, built a fence across the old sidewalk. Thereupon the town, by its board of trustees, directed that the town marshal remove the fence. This he did. The ordinance provided that, in case any property holder should fail to build the sidewalk as required by the ordinance, the town marshal should proceed to build the same.

Claiming that the ground upon which the town was proceeding to build a sidewalk was his private property, appellee brought this action to restrain the town and its officers from proceeding in the matter. The town defended on the ground that the sidewalk had been dedicated to the public use, and the dedication accepted by the town. A temporary injunction was granted, and, upon final hearing, the injunction was made permanent. From that judgment the town of Bloomfield appeals.

It appears from the record that, in the year 1881, the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad completed a branch road to the town of Bloomfield. This branch road was afterwards acquired by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and is now owned and operated by it. The railroad tracks terminated with the Bloomfield and Fairfield turnpike. The depot is situated about 400 yards from this pike. The railroad company owns a right of way, 66 feet in width, extending from the depot to the pike. The western half of this right of way is used by the road for its tracks and switches. The eastern half is used by the public in going to and from the depot. While there was formerly another route to the depot, which passed over Simpson's creek, a majority of the public no longer use this route, because at certain times in the year it is impassable. The record shows that perhaps 90 per cent of the public travel is along the railroad right of way, extending from the Bloomfield and Fairfield turnpike.

Appellee owns two lots which abut on the right of way. One of these lots has a storehouse on it, and fronts on the pike. Next to this lot is the property of the colored Odd Fellows. Just south of the property of the colored Odd Fellows is the other lot owned by appellee. A portion of these lots and the other lots abutting on the right of way has been used by the traveling public, in going to and from the depot, for twenty-seven or twenty-eight years.

The evidence for appellee is to the effect that he never dedicated that part of his own lot in controversy to the public use. On the contrary, he permitted a man by the name of Huston, who had bought a lot in that vicinity, to build along the lot in question a sidewalk composed of ties and cinders. In doing this, Huston asked his permission, and also stated to his vendee that he had made and used the sidewalk merely by the permission of appellee. Several former marshals and other officers of the town of Bloomfield testified that the town had never exercised any control over either that portion of the right of way used by the traveling public, or that portion of the abutting lots used by pedestrians; on the contrary, they did not claim any control over either.

The evidence for appellant is to the effect that, ever since the railroad opened up its right of way to the traveling public, and the other route to the depot was practically abandoned, the public, in large numbers, have used the sidewalk. This use has continued for more than twenty-five years. Prior to 1890, the Davis and Thomas lots originally extended across the railroad right of way, and the then owners built a fence near the east line of the right of way to inclose their lots. At that time the traveling public passed over the Allen lot at the south end, then over the Odd Fellows' lot, then over the vacant lot in controversy, along the east edge of the right of way to the Thomas lot; thence around the ends of the Thomas and Davis lots to the depot. When Huston bought the Davis lot, in 1890, he moved his west fence back the full width of the sidewalk. At that time the public was crossing the west end of the Davis lot; the fence being down at each side, leaving the sidewalk clear from the pike to the depot grounds. The sidewalk is now located as it existed over the lots of appellee and the colored Odd Fellows' lot for nearly thirty years, and over the lots of Huston (now Gore) and Davis (now Merrifield) for over sixteen years. The two latter have not only dedicated the sidewalks in front of their lots, but have made gravel walks with substantial curbing. In the year 1906, the colored Odd Fellows' lodge built a brick pavement in front of their lot, in obedience to an ordinance of the town council. At the south end of appellee's store was a plank platform, about a foot high and 12 feet in width. There was a pump in this platform, and vehicles were set upon part of it. This platform was also used by the public. Afterwards a gravel walk was substituted for the platform. From this lot to the Huston lot, planks and stepping stones were used in muddy places, until Huston set his fence back and built his sidewalk. When the railroad was completed into Bloomfield, in the year 1881, there was not a house on the east side of the railroad right of way that fronted in the direction of the railroad. There was then but one dwelling house between the pike and the depot, and that house fronted on the east. Since that time there have been built four new residences, one large tobacco warehouse, and the colored lodge building, and the dwelling house then owned by Thomas has been changed so as to front towards the railroad right of way.

There was also evidence to the effect that, about the year 1907, the board of trustees of the town of Bloomfield enacted an ordinance, requiring the property owners abutting on the railroad right of way to construct brick pavements. In response to this ordinance, the colored Odd Fellows had built a brick pavement. Appellee declined to build a brick pavement, but went before the board of trustees and agreed to build a gravel pavement, because that was better suited to the heavy hauling which was necessary in his business. This fact is testified to by a former marshal and one of the board of trustees. Appellee denies that he built the gravel walk in pursuance of any ordinance of the town of Bloomfield, or of any agreement with it, but claims that he built it merely for his own convenience.

For appellee, it is insisted that the judgment of the chancellor was proper, because whatever use the public made of the sidewalk in question was merely permissive, and the facts in the case do not show that, even if there was a dedication, it was ever accepted by the town of Bloomfield. While it is true that appellee permitted Huston to build the sidewalk, it is also true that the public from that time on, without let or hindrance, used the sidewalk which Huston had built, and even before that time they had made a like use of the ground where the sidewalk was built, although the sidewalk then existing was of a very unsubstantial kind. Upon the faith of the right to use the sidewalk in front of the lot in question, the others acquired property and made it front towards the railroad, and built sidewalks in front of their property. They used the sidewalk in question along with the traveling public. This use has continued for more than fifteen years since Huston built the sidewalk. Upon these facts, we think there was a sufficient dedication of the sidewalk in question to the public use.

Dedication—
permissive use.

In the case of Riley v. Buchanan, 116 Ky. 625, 63 L.R.A. 642, 76 S. W. 527, 3 Ann. Cas. 788, this court, in a lengthy discussion of the question of dedication and acceptance of public highways, announced the rule that, where a passway has been used by the public continuously for more than fifteen years, without let or hindrance from the owners of the land over which it runs, both a dedication by the owner of the land and an acceptance by the proper legal authority of the passway as a public highway will be conclusively presumed to have taken place.

In addition to the long-continued use of the public of the sidewalk in question, the weight of the evidence is to the effect that the town of Bloomfield, about the year 1907, enacted an ordinance, directing the property owners along the passway in question to construct brick pavements. In response to this ordinance, appellee appeared before the board of trustees and agreed to construct a gravel sidewalk, which he subsequently did. By enacting the ordinance in question, the town assumed control over the sidewalk in question as a public sidewalk, and appellee, by building the gravel sidewalk in response to the ordinance, plainly dedicated it to the public use. These acts upon the part of the town and of the appellee were, we think, sufficient to show a dedication and an acceptance.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Dedication of footway by permissive use.

This note does not include the question of dedication of footways along the sides of highways, and increasing their width.

It is common learning that there may be a public footway. Thrower's Case (1672) 1 Ventr. 208, 86 Eng. Reprint, 140; Reg. v. Cluworth (1704) 6 Mod. 163, 87 Eng. Reprint, 920; *Reg. v. In a case where the evidence is not reported, the court said: "The evidence introduced at the trial was ample to prove a public footway by dedication across the plaintiff's close." Tyler v. Sturdy (1871) 108 Mass. 196, supra.

But in Boyden v. Achenbach (1878) 79 N. C. 539, it was said: "In our new country the 'highways' alone were of much public importance. . . . We have no other kinds of public roads in this state. The 'footpaths' and 'neighborhood roads' have never had that importance. They are understood to be used by leave, and they are closed when the owners of the lands desire to put them under cultivation or to inclose them. Their use cannot be claimed by prescription, and a grant will not be presumed from any length of user under such circumstances," stating further that the mere user of footpaths and neighborhood roads without the same being worked and kept in order by the public "will raise no such presumption, however long the time."

In Baker v. Barry (1901) 22 R. I. 471, 48 Atl. 795, the court said and held: "Public Laws, chap. 976, passed April 12, 1872, provided that no footway, except claimed in connection with a right to pass with carriages, shall be acquired by prescription or adverse use for any length of time. Since that time, therefore, no right could be acquired by prescription."

It may be noted in this connection that the right to use a place as one of recreation is superior to the right to use it as a mere right of footway. Thus, in Abercromby v. Fermoy Town Comrs. [1900] 1 Ir. R. 302, Holmes, L. J., said: "I am satisfied that the Barnane walk was not used even by the inhabitants of Fermoy for the sake of reaching any definite point or place. The townspeople assembled on it as a place of recreation—to walk, to saunter, to lounge, to chat, to meet their friend. Dedication of a public right of way cannot, I think, be inferred from user of this kind; but our law has always recognized that the people of a district—a town, a parish, or a hamlet—are capable of acquiring by dedication or custom, certain rights over land which cannot be gained by the general public," the court pointing out that the rights aforesaid were more than a mere right of way.

User is evidence from which dedication of a footway may be inferred. Openshaw v. Pickering (1912) 77 J. P. (Eng.) 27, 11 L. G. R. 142.

In Webb v. Baldwin (1911) 75 J. P. (Eng.) 564, Parker, J., said: "Dedication may be established by proof of definite acts of dedication on the part of the owners, or it may be inferred from use and enjoyment on the part of the public. But the use and enjoyment from which it can be inferred must be use and enjoyment as of right, known to the owner and acquiesced in by him. Again, this knowledge and recognition on the part of the owner may itself be inferred from the fact that the use and enjoyment have been so open and so notorious as of right as to give rise to the presumption that the owner must have been aware of it and has acquiesced in it, or during living memory the use and enjoyment has been such that had there been an absolute owner capable of dedicating the way, dedication would have been inferred; and if, at the same time, the circumstances are consistent with such use and enjoyment having been still more ancient, the jury might, I think, properly infer dedication by some owner before living memory."

The dedication of a footway will not be inferred where it is founded on permissive use by the public of open land, where they roam in all directions. Thus, that people have been permitted to go where they liked in an ancient forest does not show a right to a footway. Schwinge v. Dowell (1862) 2 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 845.

In Behrens v. Richards [1905] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 614, the court said: "To those who are conversant with the Cornish coast or with many other parts of the coast in this country, it will be familiar that there are frequently to be found rough tracks or paths which have in fact been used without objection made by the landowner for very many years. . . . In permitting persons to stray along the cliff edge or wander down the cliff face or stroll along the foreshore the owner of the land was permitting that which was no injury to him, and whose refusal would have been a churlish and unreasonable act on his part. From such a user nothing, I think, is to be inferred."

Where there was an interesting old ruin, the court reviewed the case as follows: "First, people from time to time went to the Roundabout as a place of interest, or to admire the view, or to play games, or to sit with their sweethearts, or to pick sticks. They did not go as of right for those purposes; they were allowed to go because it would have been churlish to stop them so long as no damage was done. They could only go or return along the line of the alleged right of way. Secondly, people began to use the two possible approaches to the Roundabout as a thoroughfare when walking to and from Booker from and to High Wycombe. They did so because it was a pleasant and convenient way and no one objected. Thirdly, a certain number of people who so used these two approaches arrived at the bona fide belief that there was a right of way and used the way in such belief. I am of opinion, however, that this user has never been so extensive or so notorious as to give rise to the inference that anyone interested in the High Wycombe estate, and capable of dedicating a right of way across it, must have known of or acquiesced in it." Webb v. Baldwin (Eng.) supra.

It was held that there was no dedication where the public had been allowed for seventy years to cross on foot at will unoccupied land, and for ten years thereafter to cross on foot the same land by means of a laid-out road repaired by the owner. Folkestone Corp. v. Brockman [1914] A. C. (Eng.) 338, 83 L. J. K. B. N. S. 745, 110 L. T. N. S. 834, 78 J. P. 273, 30 Times L. R. 297, 12 L. G. R. 384, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 320.

And where a deed of premises reserved an alley in the rear, and the public, after using divers footpaths in the rear of the premises for a number of years, was confined to the alley because of fences, and for some ten years used the alley as a footway, it was held that there was no acquisition of right by the public, that the reservation was for the convenience of the grantee, and that the use by the public had been merely permissive. Ferdinando v. Scranton (1899) 190 Pa. 321, 42 Atl. 692.

In Sutor v. International & G. N. R. Co. (1910) 59 Tex. Civ. App. 73, 125 S. W. 948, the court considered the passage by pedestrians for a number of years across part of a city lot as merely a permissive use, and nothing more than "cutting across lots." The court said: "It is a use frequently made of vacant lots in cities, where pedestrians going to and from certain points for a matter of convenience will cross the lots without following the streets or sidewalks, and such use could hardly be regarded by the owner as adverse to his rights, unless connected with some other facts indicating that the purpose was to create or establish a way for the benefit or convenience of the public."

It was held in McNeil v. Boston

(1901) 178 Mass. 326, 59 N. E. 810, that the use by the public of a stairway in a city building leading to a polling place was merely permissive, and that the stairway was not a highway or townway within the Massachusetts statute.

Where a strip of land, part of property granted to a city for a market, and bordering thereon, had been used for over twenty years as a sidewalk, it was held that that was no evidence that it had been dedicated by the city as a highway, as the city had no such power. Hamilton v. Morrison (1868) 18 U. C. C. P. 228.

In Harper v. Charlesworth (1825) 4 Barn. & C. 575, 107 Eng. Reprint, 1174, 6 Dowl. & R. 572, 3 L. J. K. B. 265, 28 Revised Rep. 405, where a public footway over Crown land was extinguished by an inclosure act, it was held by Bayley, J., that a dedication was not shown by public use of the footway for twenty years after the inclosure, the land being for the past eight years in possession of the Crown's tenant, and that there was nothing to show consent of the Crown or even of the tenant. The other judges who concurred held that there was no dedication, without expressing their reasons on that question at length.

Coming to cases holding that the footway in question was public, it will be seen that it is held in the reported case (BLOOMFIELD v. ALLEN, ante, 122) that dedication was effected where the building of a walk was permitted, followed by use thereof by the public for twenty-five years, together with the purchase of lots thereon in the faith of the walk being a public way.

Long user was held to be strong evidence of a dedication of a footway over copyhold land, both as to the lord and the copyholder, in Powers v. Bathurst (1880) 42 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 123, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 294, 28 Week. Rep. 390.

In Atty. Gen. v. Chandos Land & Bldg. Soc. (1910) 74 J. P. (Eng.) 401, it was held that an inference of dedication was created where courts which were cul-de-sacs were used by the public as public footways for twenty-four years, and were paved, lighted, and cleaned by the public.

There may be a dedication by a canal company of the use of their towing path by the public as a foot-path, shown by such use for a long period of time. Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Petty (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 273, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 572, 59 L. T. N. S. 767, 36 Week. Rep. 795, 52 J. P. 692.

That a way used by the public passes in part along a sea wall does not interfere with a finding of dedication by evidence of user. Board of Works v. Maudslay (1870) L. R. 5 Q. B. (Eng.) 397, 39 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 205, 23 L. T. N. S. 121, 18 Week. Rep. 948.

In Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Paris (1894) 95 Ky. 627, 27 S. W. 84, a railway company built a bridge across a creek dividing a city, and made a footway under and attached to the bridge, which footway and other better footways substituted for it were used by the public for thirty-five years, and the city lighted these footways, and caused the railroad company to repair and aid in constructing the approaches. After this time the railway company tore down the old bridge and built a new bridge without a footway. It was held that the company must restore the footway, the court observing that this would not have been required if the old bridge had fallen or had been necessarily removed by decay, and observing that the use was not merely permissive, as the owners did not need the footway.

Where there is a public footway, and adjacent land along the same line as the footway, but increasing the width, is laid out by the owner of the soil as a way for carriage traffic, even for private carriage traffic, the presumption of law, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is that the owner has dedicated to public use as a footway all the space that he has devoted to traffic in fact. Atty. Gen. v. Esher Linoleum Co. [1901] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 647, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 808, 50 Week. Rep. 22, 85 L. T. N. S. 414, 66 J. P. 71.

In this connection it may be noted that in Gould v. Boston (1876) 120 Mass. 300, where an ancient footway lying between lands of an individual and a city was widened on each side by an agreement between the parties declaring that the whole space should be used by the parties and their assigns in common as a passageway for foot passengers, it was held that the agreement did not alter the character of the way.

The failure of occupants of property included in a town-site entry and their grantees to object to the designation, on the map filed by the trustee, of a strip along their water front as a public sidewalk, or to the use of the strip so designated, and the acceptance of deeds bounded on the sidewalk, is sufficient to effect a dedication of the strip to public use so as to cut off the riparian rights of the occupants in the water beyond the strip. McCloskey v. Pacific Coast Co. (1909) 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 673, 87 C. C. A. 568, 160 Fed. 794.

It may be noted that in Oliver v. Worcester (1869) 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485, it was held that a city was not responsible for an accident on a path crossing a city common, viz., along a pavement by the city hall, the statute providing that "no way opened and dedicated to the public use, which has not become a public way, shall be chargeable to a city or town as a highway or town way, unless the same is laid out and established by such city or town in the manner prescribed by the statutes of the commonwealth." The court said: "The whole common is in one sense dedicated to the public use, as a place of public resort and recreation, over any part of which persons may pass freely, unless restricted for some public and sufficient reason. But in marking out suitable parts of it for convenient passing on foot, or even in preparing paths with gravel or pavements, we can see no evidence of intention on the part of the city or its officers to make any new dedication of such paths to a new and distinct public use; nor any reason which the public would have to suppose that they were highways or town ways." CITY OF PIQUA
v.
ANNA S. MORRIS et al.

(98 Ohio St. 42, 120 N. E. 300.)

Appeal — instructions — want of definition.

1. Where, from a consideration of the whole charge of the court, it is seen that the jury has been given a comprehensive and intelligent instruction concerning the issues and the application of technical terms used, the fact that a particular term is also used in a special charge, or in other parts of the general charge, without such explanation, should not be held to be erroneous.

Proximate cause — definition.

2. The "proximate cause" of a result is that which in a natural and continued sequence, contributes to produce the result, without which it would not have happened. The fact that some other cause concurred with the negligence of a defendant in producing an injury does not relieve him from liability, unless it is shown such other cause would have produced the injury independently of defendant's negligence.

[See 22 R. C. L. 110.]

Water — storage — injury — liability.

3. In the construction and maintenance of a hydraulic, or similar work, a municipality or other owner is required to use ordinary skill and foresight to prevent injury to others in times of floods to be reasonably anti-pated; and if injury is caused by the negligence of such owner, he is liable in damages, provided his negligence is one of the proximate causes of the injury, although it concurred with other causes, including the act of God.

— act of God.

4. In order to fix liability on an owner in such case, it must be shown that his negligence concurred with the act of God in causing the injury; but if the act of God, such as an extraordinary flood, was so overwhelming and destructive as to produce the injury, whether the defendant had been negligent or not, his negligence cannot be held to be the proximate cause of the injury.

[See 22 R. C. L. 132.]

Headnotes by the COURT.

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Appeals for Miami County for the determination by the Supreme Court of a question arising upon the reversal of a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in defendant's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' farm, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Johnson, J.:

The defendants in error brought a suit in the common pleas of Miami county against the city of Piqua to recover damages for its negligence in flooding and injuring their farm by washing away soil and gravel and destroying a roadway, gates, and fences, by the breaking of a bank of an hydraulic opposite the farm, and from the rush of a large volume of water down and over it. The petition alleges that the city owns what is known as "Piqua Hydraulic," which affords water for its waterworks system within the boundary of the city; that in order to maintain at all times a sufficient supply of water the hydraulic has a series of ponds of many acres in area in which to collect surplus waters, and that one of them, known as

"Swift Run pond," lies adjacent to the plaintiffs' lands and buildings thereon, with an embankment about 30 feet high on the west thereof; that in order to take off the surplus water that accumulates or might accumulate in said Swift Run pond, in times of heavy rains and high waters, there was constructed on the east bank of said pond a spillway containing sixteen openings, 30 inches square, each provided with a gate or wicket; that said openings were of sufficient width and size to carry off through the same at all times all the surplus water that might accumulate in said pond, and to keep and confine the water therein and prevent any overflow; that about five years ago the defendant rebuilt the timber part of the spillway, and neglected to provide wickets for four of said openings; that prior to and on the 25th of March, 1913, defendant had negligently and carelessly permitted all of the remaining twelve openings, and the gates or wickets, to become and remain out of repair; that by reason thereof they would not permit more than one half of the amount of water to pass through as if in proper condition, and that on said day all of said twelve gates were permitted to remain closed, and the water was negligently caused and permitted to rise above the normal stage; that on that day a heavy rain fell, which flooded the pond, so that it overflowed its banks; that the water flowed to and passed over and on the plaintiffs' premises, which were east of and adjoining the embankment, and lower, and injured them by washing away about 6 acres of dirt and gravel to a depth of 5 to 10 feet, and doing the damages above stated; and that the embankment had become weakened because of negligence of the defendant. The plaintiffs further alleged that if the defendant had cut a trench in said embankment at the county line, instead of where it was cut, the damage would not have been caused to the plaintiffs.

In its answer the city denied all the allegations of negligence contained in the petition, denied that the spillway contained sixteen openings, but averred that it contained twelve gates or wickets. For a second defense, the city stated that on March 25, 1913, and prior thereto, there occurred all over the state of Ohio, including Miami county, a heavy and extraordinary rainfall, in excess of and beyond anything occurring in said city and state within the memory of the oldest inhabitant of said city; that the water in the hydraulic, and in all the streams and ponds contributing to its water, rose rapidly to a height theretofore unknown, and flooded all adjacent lands and streams contributing to said hydraulic and pond, and assumed the proportions of an immense and violent flood, breaking away dams and bridges over streams, including defendant's hydraulic and pond, and all streams and rivers contributing to its water supply, causing a great and unprecedented destruction to life and property; that the defendant exercised every caution at its command to protect the property of the plaintiffs and the other inhabitants of Piqua; that in the exercise of due diligence and extraordinary care it was unable to prevent the embankment of the hydraulic canal and run from breaking away; and that it was not possible to cut a trench in the embankment at the county line, nor could it have protected plaintiffs' property by cutting the bank 500 feet north of the point at which it broke through; and it alleged that the damages, if any, were occasioned by an act of God.

The reply denies that the damages were occasioned by the act of God, and reiterates the allegations of the petition that the negligence of the city directly and substantially contributed thereto.

A jury in the common pleas court returned a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment entered on this verdict was, on proceedings in error, reversed by the court of appeals for errors in the charge of the court. In its entry the court of appeals certified that it found that the judgment upon which it had agreed in the case was in conflict with the judgment pronounced upon the same question by the court of appeals of Hamilton county in the case of Standard Extract Company v. H. Belmer Company. It therefore certified the record of the case to this court for review and determination.

Messrs. Lindsey & Berry, for defendant:

Damages, if any, were occasioned by an act of God, and defendant is not liable.

Messrs. D. B. Van Pelt and A. W. De Weese for plaintiffs.

Johnson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The verdict of the jury was general,—all of the issues made by the pleadings were resolved in favor of the defendant. This finding, of course, embraced the issue tendered in the second defense—that, in the exercise of due diligence and extraordinary care, the defendant was unable to prevent the embankment of the hydraulic and "Swift Run" pond from breaking away; that it was not possible to cut a trench in the embankment at the county line, nor could defendant have protected plaintiffs' property by cutting the bank 500 feet north of the point at which it broke; and that the damages to plaintiffs, if any, were occasioned by an act of God, without any fault or neglect of defendant, its officers or servants.

The downfall of water in March, 1913, has passed into the history of the state as its most extraordinary and disastrous flood. The damage and suffering it caused throughout this and adjoining states is a matter of general knowledge. It was so widespread and so devastating that the legislature, less than a month after the flood, passed what is generally known as the "Flood Emergency Act," 103 Ohio Laws, 760, to authorize the duly constituted authorities of the different subdivisions of the state to borrow and expend money for the purpose of the repair, reconstruction, and replacement of public property and ways injured; and this was done as a necessity for the public health, safety, and convenience. The validity of this legislation was upheld in the following June in Assur v. Cincinnati, 88 Ohio St. 181, 102 N. E. 702, in which case the wholly unusual and unprecedented character of the flood was recognized and stated to be a matter of general knowledge.

The court of appeals, in reversing the judgment of the common pleas in the case at bar, held that there was error in the giving of defendant's charges Nos. 1, 2, and 6, hereinafter set forth, which were given before argument to the jury, and in employing in charges Nos. 2 and 6 "the terms 'intervenes,' 'proximate,' and 'proximately,' being terms of technical significance, without explanation as to their application as to the evidence and the facts," and in ignoring in charge 6 the possibility of contributing causes. It also found error in the general charge. Before the giving of the charges requested by defendant, the court had given a number of special charges requested by the plaintiffs, the first of which is as follows: "The term 'act of God,' in its legal significance, means any irresistible disaster, the result of natural causes, such as earthquakes, violent storms, lightning, and unprecedented floods. It is such a disaster, arising from such causes, and which could not have been reasonably anticipated, guarded against or resisted. It must be due directly and exclusively to such a natural cause, without human intervention. It must proceed from the violence of nature or the force of the elements alone, and with which the agency of man had nothing to do. If the injury is caused by the agency of man, co-operating with the violence of nature or the force of the elements, it is not the 'act of God.' If there be the action of such a natural cause or force, yet if the resulting injury is directly contributed to by the hand of man, it is not in law the 'act of God.' If the injury is in part occasioned by the wrongful act or the negligent act of any person concurring therein and contributing thereto, such person will be liable therefor, and this applies to a municipal corporation as well as to a natural person."

In addition to the above, the court had also given, at the request of the plaintiffs, five other special charges, in which the nature of the reservoirs involved in the case and their character as dangerous agencies in case of overflow or bursting of embankments are described. The duty of the city in such circumstances, and its liability for damages occurring by reason of failure to perform the duty, or for its negligent performance, are also specifically and fully stated and explained. Plaintiffs' charge No. 1, as above set out, is a correct and comprehensive statement of the law on the subject. The propositions it contains have substantially been ap-

It is equally well settled that, if the vis major is so unusual and overwhelming as to do the damage by its own power, without reference <sup>Water-act of God.</sup> to and independently of any negligence by defendant, there is no liability. In 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 6th ed. § 39, it is said: "It is also agreed that, if the negligence of the defendant concurs with the other cause of the injury in point of time and place, <sup>-storage-injury-liability.</sup> or otherwise so directly contributes to the plaintiff's damage that it is reasonably certain that the other cause alone would not have sufficed to produce it, the defendant is liable, notwithstanding he may not have anticipated, or been bound to anticipate, the interference of the superior force which, concurring with his own negligence, produced the damage. But if the superior force <sup>Proximate cause-definition.</sup> would have produced the same damage, whether the defendant had been negligent or not, his negligence is not deemed the cause of the injury."

In Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (C. C.) 57 Fed. 441, 448, the general rule as to the duty of the owners of dams and embankments to use care and skill in their construction and maintenance, so as to not injure others in times of usual, ordinary, and expected floods, is stated, and it is there said: "But his liability extends no further, and he is not held responsible for inevitable accidents, nor for injuries occasioned by extraordinary floods, which could not be anticipated or guarded against by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable foresight, care, and skill."

These general principles are also declared in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Sulphur Spring Independent School Dist. 96 Pa. 65, 70, 42 Am. Rep. 529, and Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 279, 7 N. E. 429. They are in keeping with the clear and plain dictates of justice. They hold a property owner to the performance of every proper duty to his neighbor, but they do not offend conscience by requiring the impossible.

It will be observed that the issues presented by the pleadings in the case we have here were evidently made in view of this state of the law. In substance, the charges of negligence against the city are that it failed to provide adequate outlets for the outflow of water in times of heavy rains, that it failed to keep existing outlets open, as it should have done under the circumstances, which involved probable danger, and that it unnecessarily cut the bank at or near plaintiffs' premises, and thereby permitted the water to rush over plaintiffs' land. The answer of the city denies all allegations of negligence and fault on its part, and in evident recognition of its duty in connection with the reservoir and banks contains the allegations above referred to, which, if true, relieved the city of any liability in the case, under the principles of law above stated.

Considerable testimony was adduced by the parties touching the issues thus made, and the contest from the first has been waged chiefly concerning the facts. The court of appeals, in the performance of its duty to consider the weight of the evidence, did not find that the verdict in favor of defendant was not sustained by sufficient evidence. The special charges given by the trial court and held to be erroneous by the court of appeals are as follows:

"(1) Defendant before argument requests the court to charge the jury that if they believe from the testimony that an unprecedented rainfall and flood, which could not have been reasonably anticipated by an ordinarily cautious person, was the efficient cause, the one cause that necessarily set in operation said causes contributing to plaintiffs' injury, that plaintiff cannot recover.

"(2) Where an act of God intervenes between the wrongful conduct of the defendant and the injury complained of, this will relieve the defendant from liability, if the act of God appears to be the proximate cause of the loss or injury."

"(6) Where the injury was proximately caused by the act of God, the law does not concern itself with duties, the observance or breach of which had nothing to do with the damage."

With reference to the use of the words "proximate" and "proximately," the court in its general charge, after fully and clearly stating the issues made by the pleadings, and defining the term "act of God" substantially as it had been defined in the charge given at the request of plaintiffs before argument, explained to the jury the nature of instances in which acts of negligence of the nature of those alleged to have occurred in this case would or would not be the proximate cause of injury, and charged that the burden of sustaining its defense that the "act of God" was the direct and proximate cause of the injury rested on the defendant.

Where, from a view of the whole charge, it is seen that the jury has been given a comprehensive and intelligent instruction concerning the issues and the meaning of technical terms used, the fact that a particular legal or technical word is also used in a portion of a special charge, or in the general charge, without such explanation or definition, should not be held to be erroneous. Now in this case we think it clear that the only possible meaning which the jury could have given to charge No. 1 was that if they found an unprecedented rainfall and flood, which could not have been reasonably anticipated, was the sole cause of plaintiffs' injury, plaintiffs could not recover. As to Nos. 2 and 6, when considered by the jury in the light of the general charge, we cannot conceive that they could fail to understand fully the meaning of the terms "proximate" and "proximately," which were used in those charges, or that any prejudice could have resulted to the plaintiffs therefrom. Each case must be determined by its peculiar facts, and the question as to what was the proximate cause of injury in a case such as this is one of fact for the determination of the jury. Adams v. Young, 44 Ohio St. 80, 58 Am. Rep. 789, 4 N. E. 599.

The court of appeals also held that the court erred in the following portion of its general charge, namely: "It is not material for you to determine whether defendant could have prevented the break in the bank at the place where it occurred after its dangerous situation was discovered. There is no charge in the petition that the city could have prevented the same from breaking after its dangerous situation was discovered, and you may omit, therefore, that as a factor in determining the question of negligence."

Immediately following this portion of the general charge is the following: "On the other hand, if the city officials did cut the bank, and as a result thereof the water flowed upon plaintiffs' lands which otherwise would not have gone there, it would be no defense that the cut was made to save lives or property, or for any other reason, because the answer does not attempt to justify the cutting of the bank, or give an excuse for doing so,—simply denies that the city cut the bank."

The court proceeded to state that, if the jury found that the city cut the bank, the city was bound to use ordinary care to preserve the property of others in releasing the waters, and, if it was possible by the use of ordinary care to have cut the bank at either of the other places, and thus to have saved the plaintiffs' property, it was its duty to have done so, and, further, that if the jury should find that the bank was cut by the defendant's agents, "and by the authority of the city, as I have heretofore defined it to you, then you must determine whether the bank, if left alone and not cut, would have gone out, and, if it had gone out, whether the result would have been the same."

From a careful consideration of this record, in connection with the general knowledge concerning this extraordinary flood, we think that the jury were convinced that the flood itself was the sole cause of the injury complained of, and that it could not have been prevented by the doing of any of the things suggested.

An apt illustration which has been suggested is that if a river levee had been maintained at the height of 10 feet, and the custodians of the levee had been warned that flood waters might require a levee 16 feet in height, and they neglected to so increase the height of the levee, and an unprecedented flood should ensue, during which it should appear that a levee 26 feet in height would not have held the flood waters, the parties responsible for the levee would not be liable for negligence in failing to maintain a 16-foot levee, when a 26-foot levee would have been unavailing. The answer in this case in effect tendered the clear issue that the damages to the plaintiffs' property were caused solely by the "act of God." We think the finding of the jury amply justified by the record.

We have not been able to see that the supposed infirmities in the charge of the trial court, which have been pointed out by the learned Court of Appeals and by counsel, could have been prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals will be reversed, and that of the Common Pleas will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Necessity of repeating definition of legal or technical term in different parts of instructions in which it is employed.

This note is confined strictly to a discussion of the comparatively few cases wherein an instruction has been complained of because, having defined a technical or legal word or phrase, the court thereafter used that term without definition. The cases involving the refusal of a specific request for the definition of a term which was defined in the general charge are excluded.

It is uniformly held that where the jury has been once informed as to the meaning of a legal or technical word or phrase, it is not necessary to repeat the definition or explanation in the same or other instructions. Where a term has been once intelligently and comprehensively defined, repetition is not only unnecessary, but undesirable, since it unduly impresses the jury with the idea of the importance of the point of law with which the word is connected. Castner v. MORRIS, ante, 129).

In Hinton v. Muhleman (1916) 201 Ill. App. 177, the court, in instructing the jury as to the measure of damages in an action for assault and battery, did not define the term "unlawful assault." It was held that since the term had been previously defined, repetition was not necessary.

In Sells v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. (1918) 206 Ill. App. 45, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured while in the employ of the defendant, and brought his action under the provisions of the Federal Safety Appliance Act. The court said as to the charge: "Objection is made to it on the ground that it does not define the term 'contributory negligence,' but it appears that this term is fully defined in another instruction. It is not necessary, of course, to repeat such a definition in each instruction."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Logsdon (1903) 114 Ky. 746, 71 S. W. 905, the court instructed the jury that the word "negligence" meant the failure to use ordinary care, and later in the paragraph charged that if the jury believed that the defendants "negligently" pushed a car into the one on which plaintiff was working, they should find a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants criticized the instruction because the word "negligently" was not defined. The court, in holding that it was not necessary to repeat the definition, said: "The court defined the word 'negligence' as meaning the failure to use ordinary care, and with this definition we see no objection to the use of the word 'negligently' in this instruction."

In W. M. Ritter Lumber Co. v. Jordan (1910) 138 Ky. 522, 128 S. W. 596, it appeared that the plaintiff had been injured while in the employ of the defendant. The court charged the jury that if the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the defendant, they should find for the plaintiff. In a later instruction the word "negligence" was defined. Defendant insisted that the first part of the charge did not restrict defendant's negligence to that alleged in the petition, but included any negligence. It was held that the definition of negligence as given applied to the word as used in the entire charge.

589, 20 S. W. 299, it was held that there was no error in the failure of the trial judge to define the words "malice," "premeditation," and "deliberation." The court said: "These words were properly defined in connection with the instructions predicated upon the evidence bearing upon the intentional killing of deceased; and there was no need to redefine them in connection with these instructions. The meaning as used in all the instructions was the same."

In State v. Diple (1912) 242 Mo. 461, 147 S. W. 111, an instruction was attacked on the ground that it did not define the terms "feloniously," "wilfully," and "deliberately." It appeared that the words were properly defined in a previous instruction, and it was held that it was not necessary to define them in each instruction in which they were used.

In the reported case (PIQUA v. MORRIS, ante, 129) the trial court in its general charge defined the word "proximate" and explained its meaning. Subsequently the word was used in a special charge at the defendant's request, but the word was not defined. It was held that the using of the word in the special charge without defining or explaining it was not error.

In Holt v. State (1907) 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 15, 100 S. W. 156, the court, in its charge on manslaughter and justifiable homicide, gave the statutory definitions of provocation, passion, and adequate cause. The defendant complained that in using the terms subsequently no definition was given. It was held that since the terms were previously defined, repetition was unnecessary.

In Wheeler v. State (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 547, 121 S. W. 166, the defendant had been indicted for murder, and on the trial the judge charged the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, with deadly weapons, as same have hereinbefore been defined to you, in a sudden transport of passion, aroused without adequate cause, with the intent to kill, did shoot and thereby kill Sam Thomas, as charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty of murder in the second degree." It was urged by the defendant that this charge was erroneous, as it failed to repeat the definition of deadly weapons. The court said: "In regard to the first proposition, that deadly weapons are not defined, we think in a preceding part of the charge deadly weapons are sufficiently defined, if it was necessary in this character of case to define them, wherein the court instructed the jury in regard to murder in the first degree, to wit: that if appellant selected and used the weapon or instrument reasonably sufficient to accomplish the death by the mode and manner of its use," etc.

In Haynes v. State (1913) 71 Tex. Crim. Rep. 31, 159 S. W. 1059, a prosecution for wilfully disturbing a religious meeting, it was held that, the court having defined the term "wilfully," it was not necessary "to carry the definition forward in each paragraph of the charge wherein the word was used."

In Glover v. Houston Belt & Terminal R. Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. Rep. —, 163 S. W. 1063, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured while in the employ of the defendant, and brought an action to recover damages resulting from such personal injuries. A verdict being rendered for the plaintiff, the defendant appealed, and among the errors assigned was one that the court, in charging the jury as to contributory negligence, had failed to define contributory negligence. The court said: "The seventh assignment attacks the sufficiency and correctness of the thirteenth paragraph of the general charge. It is first objected thereto that it failed to define contributory negligence. There was no necessity that it should have been defined in this particular paragraph, and, since it is elsewhere defined, this criticism is wholly without merit."

v.
LIBERTY NATIONAL BANK.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — August 13, 1913.

Usury — act of bank president.

1. Where the president of a bank, having full power to make loans for the bank, takes more than the legal rate of interest, the bank is liable for usury, although the president charges the excess over the legal rate as commission, and retains it as his individual property.

Bank — liability of successor.

2. Where a state bank is reincorporated as a national bank under a new name, but the personnel, officers, management, and business remain the same, the new bank is liable for usury charged and collected by the old bank.

[See 3 R. C. L. 658.]

ERROR to the District Court for Tulsa County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover usury charged and collected by the state bank before its reincorporation as the defendant bank. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. H. B. Martin, L. M. Lane, and A. F. Moss, for plaintiff in error:

The demand for the return of the usury is an accurate, definite, and literal compliance with the statute upon the subject.

Under the Federal law and Federal decisions it is not permissible to recover an attorney's fee.

First Nat. Bank v. Howard, — Okla. —, 158 Pac. 438.

Pope, C., filed the following opinion:

John S. McCarthy, plaintiff in this action in the court below, desiring a loan of $6,000, went to the Tulsa State Bank and negotiated the loan through the medium of its president. The transaction assumed in outward form the guise of a loan of $8,000 for one year. This amount was placed to the credit of McCarthy in said bank, who immediately, as a part of the agreed transaction, paid the president of the bank, from said sum, the sum of $2,000, of which $800 was to be the interest on the loan and $1,200 commission to the president of the bank for making the loan—a consideration of 25 per cent paid by McCarthy for the use of the money.

McCarthy paid the note in full, and thereafter demanded the payment to him of $4,000; his claim being that the said sum was double the amount of the usury paid.

In the verified petition in the record, one of the allegations, which are nowhere denied under oath, is that, after the giving of the notice above mentioned, McCarthy was inveigled into the private room of the bank, which had by that time changed its name to the Liberty National Bank, was locked in said room, forced by threats of being killed to sign an instrument renouncing all claim for usury, and after the delivery of said instrument was violently assaulted by one A. E. Lewis, who honors the bank by acting as its president.

Thereafter McCarthy brought this action against the Liberty National Bank to recover $4,000 usury. On the trial it was shown by uncontradicted evidence that the Tulsa State Bank had reincorporated as the Liberty National Bank; the latter bank being organized by the officers and stockholders of the former, taking over its assets, continuing its business, and being conducted by the same officers. Judgment was rendered for the bank, and McCarthy brings error. The bank sought to avoid liability under two theories. The one was that the $2,000 consideration received for the loan of $6,000 for a year was not interest; the contention being that only $800 was interest, and the remaining $1,200 a commission charged by the president in his individual capacity, and retained by him as a commission for making the loan. The other theory was that the Liberty National Bank, as distinguished from the Tulsa State Bank, was not liable by reason of the change of incorporation and name.

These contentions will be considered in their order.

We cannot agree with the contention of the bank that a part of the 25 per cent charged the plaintiff for this loan was a commission going to the president of the bank, and not interest. The man Lewis, president of both of the banks, or rather the one bank under both names and both corporations, had full charge of making loans for the bank. "I loan the bank's money to whom I want to," he says, and that he kept the $1,200 as his commission, without the knowledge or consent of the stockholders or the directors. "Certainly, I make a commission on loans every now and then; I reserve that right."

The uncontroverted testimony shows that Lewis had and exercised the right of making loans for the bank; he was clearly a general agent for that purpose. The funds of the bank were in his possession to be loaned. His official position was such that his knowledge would be the knowledge of the corporation. The authorities amply sustain the position that compensation received for a loan under such conditions cannot be called a commission, and the pains of usury thus avoided. Bean v. Rumrill, — Okla. —, 172 Pac. 453; notes in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1157, and 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391.

It may be that the man Lewis was guilty of a fraud on his bank, and was secretly appropriating part of the compensation which he received for loans, without the knowledge of the stockholders and directors. If so, the bank has its remedy against Lewis; but it cannot deny that his knowledge was its knowledge, or escape liability to third persons for the acts of Lewis within the scope of his authority in doing that which it had put into his power to do. If the bank suffers a loss by reason of unauthorized charge of usury by Lewis, the bank may have a remedy against Lewis; but certainly this does not purge the transaction of usury.

Nor can the bank escape liability because it changed its name from Tulsa State Bank to the Liberty National Bank, and abandoned its state charter and continued business under a Federal charter. The uncontradicted evidence is that it was composed of the same individuals, same officers, the same management, and continuing the same business at the same place. The law seems to be well settled that, where a corporation is the mere incarnation of a prior corporation, the new corporation must answer for all of the obligations of the old. Note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1119; Montgomery-Web Co. v. Die-nelt, 133 Pa. 585, 19 L.R.A. 665, 19 Atl. 428; Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co. (C. C.) 4 McCrary, 432, 13 Fed. 516; Camden Interstate R. Co. v. Lee, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 75, 84 S. W. 332.

There seems to be little or no controversy about the facts in this case. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the case should be reversed and remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff below for the $4,000 usury paid, $300 attorney's fee, and for costs.

Per Curiam:

Adopted in whole.

Petition for rehearing denied, November 26, 1918.

ANNOTATION.

Acceptance of secret compensation by bank officer or employee in making a loan by the bank as charging the bank with usury.

There are many cases on the general question whether a bonus or other compensation paid to an agent of the lender by the borrower will charge the lender with usury; but the specific question whether a bank is affected with usury because of a bonus to an officer has been rarely presented.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (MCCARTHY v. LIBERTY NAT. BANK, ante, 137), that an exaction of a secret usurious commission by the president of a bank in making a loan for the bank charges the bank with usury.

But the only other two bank cases of this kind which have been found were decided in favor of the bank, and it was therein held that the fact that the president of a bank exacts a personal bonus as a condition of making a loan by the bank does not charge the bank with usury, when the bank gets none of the bonus. Chicago Fire Proofing Co. v. Park Nat. Bank (1892) 145 Ill. 481, 32 N. E. 534; Chicago Fire

liability of successor.

Proofing Co. v. Park Nat. Bank (1892) 145 Ill. 487, note, 32 N. E. 536.

In Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. (1891) 141 U. S. 384, 35 L. ed. 786, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, it was held that a loan made by the Illinois agent of a trust company of another state, by which the borrower was to pay such agent a certain sum for his commission in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, was usurious, where there was a previous agreement between the lender and his agent that the latter would act as his agent without compensation from the former, but would obtain compensation for his services as such agent by way of commissions exacted from the borrower.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA et al.

(— Okla. —, P.U.R.1920A, 605, 184 Pac. 442.)

Carrier — duty to furnish tank car.

1. Where articles of an extraordinary character are offered, a carrier is not bound to accept them, or provide facilities of a different kind from those usually furnished for transportation; hence, a railroad company was not required, under § 18, art. 9, of the Constitution, to furnish tank cars to carry the oils of a refinery.

— duty to receive and carry.

2. The general rule is that it is the duty of every common carrier to receive for carriage and to carry goods of any person tendered to it for transportation, provided the goods are such as it holds itself out as willing to carry; and it is ordinarily the duty of the common carrier to furnish vehicles suitable in every respect for the safe transportation of the various kinds of property which are usually carried by it, and any failure to observe its duty in this regard will render it liable for loss or injury caused thereby.

[See 4 R. C. L. 658.]

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Corporation Commission in favor of complainants in a suit to enjoin defendant from withdrawing certain tank cars from the use of the complainant company, and requiring it to furnish additional tank cars. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. F. Evans, and R. A. Kleinschmidt, for appellant:

The order of the Commission is invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce.

Southern R. Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 444, 56 L. ed. 263, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 31 Okla. 767, 123 Pac. 1065.

The Corporation Commission is without jurisdiction or authority to direct a carrier to acquire or furnish tank car equipment, and the order is unreasonable and unjust.

Owen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The refining company, a corporation doing business at Lawton, Oklahoma, buying, selling, and shipping crude and refined oils, complained that the railroad company heretofore had furnished four tank cars for the use of the refining company in transporting its merchandise, both crude and refined oils, but had given notice that such cars would be withdrawn from its use, and the volume of business would require the use, not only of these four cars, but additional tank cars, and prayed the railroad company be restrained and enjoined from taking the four cars out of its use, and be required to furnish additional tank cars. The Corporation Commission made an order requiring the railroad company to furnish the refining company the tank cars as requested.

The railroad company contends the Corporation Commission was without jurisdiction or authority to make the order, or to make any order respecting the subject-matter of the complaint. The question necessary for determination is whether it was the duty of the railroad company, under § 18, art. 9, of the Constitution, to furnish tank cars to be used by the refining company in the transportation of its products over the railroad company's tracks.

The general rule is well settled that it is the duty of every common carrier to receive the goods of any person tendered to it for transportation, provided the goods are such that it holds itself out as willing to carry. 10 C. J. 65; Covington Stock Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 73, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461; Elliott, Railroads, § 1465. Subject to some exceptions, it is also the duty of the common carrier to furnish cars suitable in every respect for the safe transportation of the various kinds of property which are usually carried by it. Special cars must be furnished in some instances for transportation of perishable products, refrigerator cars for vegetables and meats, and other cars particularly adapted for the goods transported, as stock cars for cattle, and any failure to observe its duty in this regard will render the carrier liable for loss or injury caused by such failure. 10 C. J. 85; Hutchinson, Carr. § 505; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Geraty, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 310, 91 C. C. A. 602, 166 Fed. 10. This general rule, however, is not without exception and qualification. Elliott, Railroads, § 1474; United States v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 242 U. S. 209, 61 L. ed. 252, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lawton Ref. Co. 165 C. C. A. 299, 253 Fed. 705. In the case of United States v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra, tank cars were held to be an exception to the general rule. It was also held the Interstate Commerce Commission was without authority or power to require the common carrier to furnish such cars, and that case was followed by the circuit court of appeals in the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lawton Ref. Co. supra, where it was said: "Where articles of an extraordinary character are offered, a carrier is not bound to accept them, or to provide facilities of a different kind from those usually furnished for transportation; hence a railroad company was not required to furnish tank cars to carry the oils of a refinery."

In Re Private Cars, 50 Inters. Com. Rep. 652, the Interstate Commerce Commission found there are fifty-nine varieties of liquids regularly transported in tank cars, and that cars used for transportation of one kind of liquid ordinarily cannot be used for transportation of another of the varieties, many of these liquids requiring especially constructed cars, with special fittings. In that case, among other things, it was said: "It is more economical and more efficient for the refiner to furnish a tank car, either owning it or leasing it from some concern, than for the railroad company to own it. A refiner producing two kinds of oil, gasoline and residuum, requires two kinds of cars. Another refiner, producing all grades of oil, from the lighter oils down to coke, will require several kinds of cars."

Counsel rely upon the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Geraty, supra, where the railroad company was held liable in damages for a failure to furnish refrigerator cars for transportation of vegetables; but the facts of that case easily distinguish it from the instant case. There the railroad company had induced plaintiff, and other vegetable growers in that region, to plant certain crops, expecting that if they raised vegetables refrigerator cars necessary for such vegetables would be obtained, and under these facts it was held the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages sustained by the carrier's refusal to furnish refrigerator cars on reasonable demand for transportation of plaintiff's cabbages. It was said: "Where plaintiff, owning a farm in a truck region, was induced to plant a large quantity of cabbages by assurance of defendant railroad company that refrigerator cars would be furnished to transport the cabbage to market, which it refused to do on reasonable demand, plaintiff was entitled to recover for unharvested cabbage which spoiled because of defendant's refusal to furnish refrigerator cars."

In the instant case, the action is not for damages, but one to compel the common carrier to furnish tank cars under an alleged duty resting upon the common carrier, and not by virtue of any contract. Counsel also rely upon the case of State ex rel. Kohler v. Cincinnati, W. & B. R. Co. 47 Ohio St. 130, 7 L.R.A. 319, 23 N. E. 928, but the question involved there was a discrimination in the rates charged. No such question is presented in this case. The Corporation Commission was without authority to make the order.

The case is therefore reversed, with directions to dismiss the complaint.

ANNOTATION.

Duty of carrier to furnish tank cars.

The cases passing directly on the question have held that a railroad company owes no duty to the shipper to furnish tank cars. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. STATE (reported herewith) ante, 140; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lawton Ref. Co. (1918) 165 C. C. A. 299, 253 Fed. 705.

It has been held also that under the Interstate Commerce Act the Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to require railroad companies to furnish tank cars to shippers, the duty to furnish such cars, if it exists, being enforceable in the courts, and not by the Commission. United States v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1916) 242 U. S. 208, 61 L. ed. 251, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95; Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1888) 2 I. C. C. Rep. (Fed.) 90, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 67.

It was held, however, in Empire Ref. Co. v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (1910) 10 Can. Ry. Cas. 158, that, where a railway company agreed with a refining company before the latter built its refinery that the railroad company would furnish all the tank cars that might be needed, the railway company could be compelled to carry out its agreement by an order of the Board of Railroad Commissioners, under a statute providing that on complaint by a corporation that a railway company has violated an agreement between the complainant and the company for providing any equipment in connection with the railway, the Board shall hear all matters and make such orders as to it may seem reasonable.

The position that carriers should not be obliged to furnish tank cars derives much support from the report of the Commission in Re Private Cars (1918) 50 Inters. Com. Rep. (Fed.) 652, where, in connection with findings and conclusions as to rates and practices of carriers with respect to private cars, it was said: "There are at least thirty-one different liquids regularly transported in tank cars, not including the different kinds and grades of acids and oils. There are seven acids and twenty-one grades and kinds of petroleum oils, making an aggregate of fifty-nine varieties of liquids. Cars used to transport the different liquids cannot be interchanged readily, that is to say, a tank car loaded with fuel oil with an asphalt base cannot be reloaded with refined oils, such as gasoline or kerosene, nor with edible oils, such as cottonseed or coconut, without thorough cleaning, at an expense of from $5 to $35 per car. A car in which has been transported any of the petroleum oils cannot be used for molasses or other edible liquids, without thorough cleaning to remove every vestige of oil and odor. Some acids require peculiarly constructed cars. A car for tannic acid must be coated on the inside with acid-resisting material, and all fittings must be of brass. Muriatic acid requires a wooden lined tank. Wine cars are mounted with a steel tank, lined on the inside with special enamel, surrounded on the outside with a wooden tank, with insulating material between it and the steel, to preserve the contents from deterioration during transportation; and casing-head gasoline cars are insulated so as to preserve a uniform temperature, and are fitted with special dome-head arrangements and safety appliances. A tank car for transportation of asphalt and other heavy oils requires heater coils in order to liquefy the contents for unloading. Some tank cars are constructed with compartments so that two or more grades of oil may be transported at a time. Special loading and unloading facilities are necessary for oil shipments. It is necessary to force some oils out of the cars by steam pressure, others by the use of pumps, and from still others the liquid flows out by gravity.

Practically all carriers have refused to furnish tank cars for transportation of oil and other liquids.

Refiners of petroleum oils, with substantial unanimity, state that as a practical matter carriers could not furnish tank cars in a manner to insure their efficient use.

The carriers of the country could not as effectively handle the entire refrigerator and tank-car equipment as is now done by the intervention of private owners.

The oil refiner produces certain kinds of oil and desires to reach certain customers. No carrier could inform itself as to his needs, and insure that he would have the kind and number of cars to enable him to conduct his business economically and efficiently. These tank-car owners prefer to furnish their own cars, and they assert it would be impracticable for carriers to do so. Preserving a car for the character of oil handled on its previous trip enables the refiner of oil to eliminate delays in cleaning and transferring cars around from one railroad to another,—delays that would be expensive to the carrier, and which it could not in actual practice prevent. It is more economical and more efficient for the refiner to furnish a tank car, either owning it or leasing it from some concern, than for the railroad company to own it. A refiner producing two kinds of oil, gasoline and residuum, requires two kinds of cars. Another refiner producing all grades of oil, from the lighter oils down to coke, will require several kinds of cars. The cost of cleaning a car which has been used for fuel oil, in order to make it fit for handling gasoline, is very great. These and other reasons which are given in detail and might be here repeated, if necessary, have led to the system of private ownership of tank cars throughout the country generally. . . . Doubtless in the beginning demands were made by these shippers that carriers should supply tank and meat cars, but it was quickly demonstrated that business could not be done in the most effective manner were carriers to own or control cars of that kind. As a rule carriers have never furnished these cars, and it has come to be mutually understood that they should not do so."

That the railroad company had held itself out specifically to carry oil in tank cars was contended in United States v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1916) 242 U. S. 208, 61 L. ed. 251, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95, and it was also contended that the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission to this effect was one of fact, and not reviewable. This contention, however, was not sustained, the finding being held to be one of law, reviewable in the courts, where it appeared that it was based on a rule in the official classification providing rates for articles in tank cars, which stated that the carriers whose tariffs were covered by such classification assumed no obligation to furnish tank cars.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lawton Ref. Co. (1918) 165 C. C. A. 299, 253 Fed. 705, it was held that a railway company, which for three months prior to the suit had supplied a refinery with tank cars, leased by the railway company from private owners, but which, during a drought, had found it necessary to divert these cars for the purpose of hauling water for use of its engines and roundhouses, should not be enjoined from failing to furnish the cars to the refining company. The decision is placed on the ground that tank cars were a special kind of equipment which the carrier had not held itself out to furnish, and that because of the extraordinary character of the service it was not obliged to furnish them; also, that the duty of the railway company to the public to keep its trains in operation was superior to the demand of the refining company for the cars.

Assuming that the general rule is that a carrier must furnish proper and suitable cars for every kind of goods which it holds itself out as ready to transport, the question whether a carrier owes a duty to the shipper to furnish tank cars would seem to depend, in the absence of contract, on custom and the question whether the carrier had held itself out as ready to transport goods in tank cars. That carriers do not generally own tank cars in sufficient numbers to supply anything like the demand appears from Re Private Cars (1918) 50 Inters. Com. Rep. (Fed.) 652, where, in a tabulated statement, based on reports from a large number of railroads, the number of carrier-owned tank cars for 1917 is given at over 9,000, as compared with over 44,000 privately owned tank cars. The reverse proportion obtains as regards refrigerator cars, it being shown in the same tabulation that, as regards refrigerator cars, the proportion is over 60,000 carrier-owned cars to over 36,000 privately owned. These facts are of importance in view of the statement in United States v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1916) 242 U. S. 208, 61 L. ed. 251, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95, that, in the view of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as expressed in Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1888) 2 I. C. C. Rep. (Fed.) 90, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 67, and Re Transportation & Refrigeration of Fruit (1904) 10 Inters. Com. Rep. (Fed.) 360, carriers should provide equipment for the transportation of commodities, and that this duty may expand with time and conditions, the special car becoming the common car, and the shipper's right to demand it receiving the sanction of law; that, while at one time the carriers might have declined to provide special equipment in the way of refrigerator cars for the transportation of fruit, the trade had so grown that the carriers now might as well decline to furnish stock cars for the transportation of live stock. It will be noted also that in Re Private Cars (Fed.) supra, it is stated that carriers throughout the country generally have provisions in their tariffs, which name rates on petroleum oil and other liquids in tank cars, that they are not under obligation to furnish such cars. JAMES W. BOOTHE, Respt.,

H. F. BASSETT and Wife, Appts.

1. Specific performance will not be granted to one who, in uniting with another for the purchase of real estate on joint account, has the title placed in the name of the latter to place it out of the reach of his own creditors, upon the understanding that the parties were to share equally in the profits of the transaction.

Appeal — statement of facts — sufficiency.

2. A statement of facts on appeal will not be stricken for failure to contain all the evidence, if the trial court certifies that all evidence is contained, and respondent proposes no amendment to the statement.

[See 2 R. C. L. 158.]

Pleading — failure to plead defense — right to consider.

3. Failure to plead intent to defraud creditors as a defense to an action to compel specific performance of a contract to convey an interest in real estate, title to which was placed in the name of defendant in a joint undertaking for its purchase under agreement to share profits, for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of plaintiff's creditors, will not prevent the consideration of such defense if the fact is brought out by plaintiff in his evidence in chief.

[See 25 R. C. L. 334.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Adams County (Holcomb, J.) in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel specific performance of an oral contract for the conveyance of an interest in certain real estate, and for a money judgment. Reversed.

Harvey v. Varney, 98 Mass. 118; Brooks v. Martin, 2 Wall. 70, 17 L. ed. 732.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this action was to compel the specific performance of an oral contract for the conveyance of an interest in real estate, and in addition thereto a money judgment. The cause was tried to the court sitting without a jury. Judgment was rendered directing specific performance. The defendants appeal.

The facts are as follows: On the 1st day of October, 1912, and for some time prior thereto, James W. Boothe and H. F. Bassett were engaged in the real estate business at Spokane, Washington. Each was operating independently of the other. On the date mentioned, Bassett had a client who owned an equity in a house and lot in the city of Spokane, which could be purchased for $750. Boothe had a client who owned certain farm land located in Adams county, which he was willing to exchange for city property. Boothe and Bassett entered into an oral agreement, whereby Boothe was to furnish $750 for the purpose of acquiring the equity in the city property, and, after this was purchased, an exchange was to be made for the Adams county land. Boothe borrowed the money, the equity was purchased, and the exchange of the properties made; the owners of the respective properties exchanging titles. After these conveyances had been made, the title to the farm land was, by the previous owner of the city property, in turn conveyed to Bassett. Thereupon Boothe and Bassett arranged for a loan in the sum of $1,300, and gave a mortgage upon the farm land signed by Bassett and his wife. The money realized from this loan was used to repay Boothe the $750 which he had previously borrowed to pay for the equity in the city property, and the expenses incident to that loan. The balance of the money was to be used for the purpose of putting the land under cultivation. The date of the loan upon the farm land was October 14, 1912. Some time after the transactions took place, as above indicated, Boothe demanded that Bassett convey to him an undivided one-half interest in the farm land, and also pay over one half of the money realized from the mortgage which had not been expended. Under the agreement entered into, the parties were to share equally in the profits of the transaction. The present action was instituted on or about the 5th day of March, 1913. After the issues were formed, the cause in due time came on for trial. The plaintiff was the only witness who testified upon the trial. The plaintiff on direct examination testified that "this property came to be in Mr. Bassett's name, because I had signed as surety on a bond on an appeal to the supreme court. The judgment was affirmed, and that made it so I was bound to pay the judgment. They were bothering me about that, and I was afraid if the title stood in my name that it would make trouble."

On cross-examination he further testified: "The reason I had this title put in Mr. Bassett's name was because I knew if it showed in my name this creditor might learn of it and try to take it on that judgment; because of that and because it was more convenient. It would not be necessary for so many of us to sign papers. All of us were living at Spokane. It was less trouble to have it in his name alone. I did not have any property in my name at that time."

The bond upon which the judgment referred to was rendered was a supersedeas bond, the amount of which is not stated. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendants moved that the action be dismissed. This motion was denied. Thereupon the defendants elected to stand upon the record as then made, and offered no testimony. Judgment was entered as above indicated. The defendants have appealed.

The respondent opens his brief in this court with a motion to strike the statement of facts and affirm the judgment. This motion appears to be based upon the contention that the statement of facts does not contain all the evidence. In the certificate of the trial judge to the statement of facts, it is said "that the above and foregoing statement of facts contains all the material facts, matters, and proceedings heretofore occurring in said cause and not already a part of the record therein, contains all the evidence, oral and in writing, therein, and that the above and foregoing statement of facts was duly and regularly filed with the clerk of the said court, and thereafter duly and regularly served within the time authorized by law, and that no amendments were proposed to said statement of facts."

It thus appears that the trial judge certified that the statement of facts contained not only all the material facts, but all the evidence, both oral and in writing. It also appears that the respondent proposed no amendment to the statement of facts. We think the motion to strike not well founded.

Upon the merits it will be necessary to notice but one assignment of error. From the facts stated, it appears that the primary reason for placing the entire title in the name of Bassett was to put the property beyond the reach of Boothe's judgment creditor. Where a conveyance of property is made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, as between parties, it is good, and a court of equity will not interfere, at the instance of a fraudulent grantor, to aid him in a recovery of the property. Such a conveyance is illegal as to creditors only. This rule is founded upon public policy. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 274; 20 Cyc. 615; 2 Moore, Fraud. Conv. 630; Kitts v. Wilson, 130 Ind. 492, 29 N. E. 401; Chantler v. Hubbell, 34 Wash. 211, 75 Pac. 802. In the case last cited it was said: "While there are certain admitted exceptions to the general rule that courts will refuse to aid either party to a fraudulent transaction, this case does not fall within them. The courts refuse to aid in fraudulent transactions, because of public policy, and the rule operates, of course, only in cases where the refusal of the courts to aid either party frustrates the object of the transaction, and takes away the temptation to enter into them—that is to say, when it tends to promote good morals not to aid either party, aid is refused by the courts; but whenever public policy is considered advanced by giving relief to either party, then such relief will be given. Cases, however, where public policy will be best subserved by aiding or enforcing a fraudulent transaction are very rare, and instances where the rule has been put in force are not many; but a frequently cited instance is found in the case of Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Bl. 363, 96 Eng. Reprint, 203, where one brother gave to another a note in order to enable the latter to make a wealthy marriage. This note was enforced because such contracts would best be discouraged by enforcing them. But it is evident that the case at bar does not fall within any such rule. If the mortgage is to be held free of fraud, then there is no question of public policy involved. If, on the other hand, it was intended to defraud the appellant's creditors, the appellant cannot, by any proceeding in the courts, compel the respondent to share with him, or turn over to him, the profit the respondent may have made by reason of the fraud. Such

The rule applies not only when there has been a conveyance from the previous holder of title for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, but also where title to property, at the time it is acquired, is placed in the name of a third party for the purpose of interfering with the rights of creditors. Coleman v. Coleman, 147 Ky. 383, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193, 144 S. W. 1; Kirkpatrick v. Clark, 132 Ill. 342, 8 L.R.A. 511, 22 Am. St. Rep. 531, 24 N. E. 71; Hill v. Scott, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 877, 15 S. W. 667. In the Kirkpatrick Case it is said: "If it be true, as the evidence offered would tend to show, that the defendant purchased the lot in question of Ashelby with her own money, but, for the purpose of hindering and defrauding her creditors, entered into a fraudulent arrangement or conspiracy with the plaintiff to have said lot conveyed to him, said transaction was illegal, and within the condemnation of the 4th section of our present Statute of Frauds. The transaction being consummated by the execution of the conveyance to the plaintiff, leaving the defendant in the possession which she had previously obtained under a demise from Ashelby, the law should leave them both where it finds them. The defendant clearly could not be permitted to go into a court of equity to compel an execution by the plaintiff of his trust, and it would seem that, upon the same principle, the plaintiff should be debarred from coming into a court of law to use his ill-gotten title for the purpose of recovering of the defendant the possession."

In the present case, however, it is claimed that the rule does not apply because it does not appear that the parties were in pari delicto. So far as the record shows, the purpose of Bassett, in receiving title in his own name, was not to aid in hindering, delaying, or defrauding the creditors of Boothe. If Bassett were the actor in this action, it doubtless would be true that, the parties not being in pari delicto, the rule would not be operative against him, but the actor in the present action is the party who sought to defraud his judgment creditor by keeping his name free from the title. In such a case the party guilty of the attempted fraud is within the rule.

Specific performance—contract for interest in real estate—attempt to defraud creditors—parties not in pari delicto.

In Allstead v. Laumeister, 16 Cal. App. 59, 116 Pac. 296, it was said: "It may be true that, although Van Allstead stood in pari delicto to the fraud, the defendant would not sustain that relation thereto unless she accepted the trust with notice or knowledge of its fraudulent character or that its purpose was to defraud third parties; still, nevertheless, the transaction between plaintiff and his son was so tainted with corruption that its nature, as thus characterized, could not be changed, however many times the property might be transferred, except where conveyed to an innocent purchaser for value and without notice or knowledge of the fraud. In other words, it is obviously immaterial, so far as the plaintiff—the actor in this suit—is concerned, whether the defendant stood or did not stand in pari delicto to the fraudulent creation of the trust which she accepted from Van Allstead and promised to execute. The question whether she stood in pari delicto to the fraudulent contract or as a particeps criminis in the fraud giving rise to it could be material only where she was also seeking affirmative relief as to the property, in which case, should she be found, equally with plaintiff, to be a party to the fraud, a court of equity would refuse to interfere in behalf of either."

The respondent cites the case of Harvey v. Varney, 98 Mass. 118, as sustaining his right to maintain the action, notwithstanding the fact that the title was placed in the name of Bassett for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding a creditor of Boothe. Without detailing the facts in that case, it may be said that to have applied the rule there forbidding recovery would have worked a great hardship. It is doubtful whether that case can be distinguished in principle from the present case, but, if it cannot be so distinguished, it is not in harmony with the doctrine of this court in Chantler v. Hubbell, supra. To permit the contract in this case to be enforced notwithstanding the fraud would encourage fraudulent transactions. This being true, under the rule of the Chantler Case the question should be resolved in a way to discourage such transactions.

The respondent, however, claims that, since the fraudulent nature of the transaction was not pleaded as an affirmative defense, it is not available to the appellant. The complaint pleaded an oral contract. This the answer denied, but did not affirmatively plead that the title was taken in Bassett's name for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding a creditor of Boothe's. The record shows that the fraudulent nature of the transaction appeared in the answer of the respondent upon direct examination to a question propounded to him by his counsel. It is further elaborated upon cross-examination without objection. The matter, having been brought out on direct examination and pursued upon cross-examination without objection, is available to the appellants without their having pleaded it affirmatively. Geroso v. DeMaio, 75 N. J. Eq. 410, 72 Atl. 432; Harvey v. Varney, supra. Had the fraudulent nature of the transaction not have been brought out by the respondent as a part of his case in chief, and the defendant had gone into the matter on cross-examination over objection, or had sought to show it as a part of his defense without pleading it, a different question would be presented.

Pleading—
plead defense—right to consider.

There being no cross appeal, the correctness of the court's judgment in declining to award a money judgment is not open to review.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the Superior Court to dismiss the action for specific performance.

ANNOTATION.

The fact that the parties to a conveyance in fraud of creditors are not in pari delicto as affecting the right of the party guilty of fraud to relief.

Courts of equity, in refusing aid to one who has made a conveyance to hinder or defraud creditors, have frequently assigned as a reason for their decision the well-known maxim "In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis." It seems clear, however, both on reason and authority, that the fact that the parties are not in pari delicto, or that one of them is innocent of any fraudulent design, will not avail the one who is guilty of the fraud to obtain equitable relief. And in a few cases it has been held that the fact that the grantee or transferee, where there has been a conveyance or transfer in fraud of creditors, is innocent of the fraud, or at least is not in pari delicto with the grantor or transferrer, will not aid the latter where he is the one seeking affirmative equitable relief. BOOTHE v. BASSETT (reported herewith) ante, 145; Allstead v. Laumeister (1911) 16 Cal. App. 59, 116 Pac. 296; Weir v. Day (1881) 57 Iowa, 84, 10 N. W. 304; Moore v. Jordan (1887) 65 Miss. 229, 7 Am. St. Rep. 641, 3 So. 737; Robertson v. Sayre (1892) 134 N. Y. 97, 30 Am. St. Rep. 627, 31 N. E. 250; O'Brien v. O'Brien (1919) 188 App. Div. 309, 177 N. Y. Supp. 25.

In Allstead v. Laumeister (1911) 16 Cal. App. 59, 116 Pac. 296, from which the court quotes in the opinion in the reported case (BOOTHE v. BASSETT, ante, 145), a conveyance was made by a debtor to his son for the purpose of defrauding creditors, and the son conveyed to the defendant under an agreement by the latter similar to that in the conveyance to the son, that the property should be reconveyed to the father on demand. In an action by the latter to compel a reconveyance, it was held to be immaterial whether the defendant was in pari delicto to the fraudulent contract, since this would be material only in case the defendant were seeking affirmative relief, the plaintiff being, in any event, by his own fraud, precluded from obtaining relief in a court of equity.

Where a purchaser of land, for the purpose of hindering and delaying his creditors, procured a deed to be made out in the name of a third party, without the latter's knowledge or authority, and had it recorded, it was held that the grantor or his heirs were not entitled to equitable relief against the grantee or one to whom the latter had conveyed the property. Robertson v. Sayre (1892) 134 N. Y. 97, 30 Am. St. Rep. 627, 31 N. E. 250. The action was by the heirs against one claiming under the grantee. The court said that since the grantor had the conveyance of these lots made to a third party for the purpose of defrauding creditors, he had no legal estate in them which could be reached by execution or which on his death descended to his heirs; that this rule was a penalty imposed by law for the prevention of fraud and for the protection of subsequent purchasers; and that the reason for its application was not weakened by the fact that the grantee, as in the case before the court, was not a participant in the fraud; that it was clear that neither the grantor in his lifetime, nor his heirs since his death, could have recovered the land or its proceeds from the grantee or from the latter's grantee by any legal or equitable remedy.

In O'Brien v. O'Brien (1919) 188 App. Div. 309, 177 N. Y. Supp. 25, it was held that a grantor could not obtain cancellation of a deed made to his son for the purpose of defeating a creditor, although the court stated that there were no charges of fraud or of procurement on the part of the grantee.

In Moore v. Jordan (1887) 65 Miss. 229, 7 Am. St. Rep. 641, 3 So. 737, equitable relief was refused to the grantor in a conveyance in fraud of creditors, against one who, the court said, took no part in the scheme other than to receive the conveyance, and was only subject to the imputation of fraud in that she declined to reconvey the property, the conveyance having been made at the instigation of a confidential adviser, who promised a reconveyance, but received no consideration and practised no fraud on the grantor.

In holding that one who had conveyed property for the purpose of defrauding creditors could not obtain relief in equity against an innocent grantee, the court, in Weir v. Day (1881) 57 Iowa, 84, 10 N. W. 304, said: "It appears that the court below was of opinion that, as it was not shown that . . . [the defendant] had knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the plaintiff, the conveyance was not fraudulent; that a fraudulent purpose on the part of the grantor alone is not sufficient; that there must be a like intent, or, at least, a knowledge of the fraudulent intent, traced to the grantee. This is undoubtedly the rule where creditors seek to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent. But the ground upon which a fraudulent grantor is precluded from gainsaying the transaction is that he comes into a court of justice with unclean hands, and seeking to take advantage of his own wrong. In Holliday v. Holliday (1859) 10 Iowa, 200, the plaintiff purchased real estate, paid for it, and took the title in the name of his wife. After her death he sought to compel the children of the wife to convey to him. It appeared that he procured the conveyance to be made to his wife to place the property beyond the reach of legal process, if he should be prosecuted upon a certain demand which he regarded as unjust. It does not appear that the wife participated in or had any knowledge of the fraudulent intent of her husband."

There are doubtless many cases like Holliday v. Holliday (Iowa) supra, where the grantee may have been innocent of any fraud, but relief was denied the grantor because of his fraud in conveying the property, without consideration of the point of the grantee's nonparticipation in the fraud.

McConaughy v. Farney (1902) 2 Neb. (Unof.) 638, 89 N. W. 812, is to the effect that if the vendee has participated in the fraud, where the conveyance is in fraud of creditors, he may set this up as a complete defense in an action by the vendor or his assignee for creditors on notes given for the purchase price, under the maxim "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis;" or if the property has been taken away from him without his fault in a suit by creditors, the vendee may, if innocent of the fraud, plead a breach of the warranty of title. It does not clearly appear, however, that the court meant to hold that the vendee must in the former event have participated in the fraud in order for the vendor's fraud to defeat the action.

CHARLES B. SEARS et al., Respts.

Chattel mortgage — of records of title — right to photograph.

1. Although a mortgage of records containing abstracts of title of property in a county carries a mere lien, the mortgagor cannot photograph the records for use in a competing business to the destruction of the security of the mortgage, where the statutes give a mortgagee a right immediately to foreclose if he has reasonable cause to believe that the mortgaged property will be destroyed, and make destruction by the mortgagor a misdemeanor.

— effect on title.

2. A mortgage of personal property does not convey the title, but creates a lien only, leaving the title in the mortgagor.

— foreclosure — what passes by sale.

3. A purchaser at foreclosure sale under a mortgage of title abstract books does not secure title to photographic copies which have been made of the books, where the description in the foreclosure decree and the sheriff's bill of sale do not include such copies.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Clarke County (Reynolds, J.) dismissing an action brought to recover photographic reproductions of certain mortgaged abstract books and records, and to recover damages. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

(— Wash. —, 184 Pac. 309.)

Messrs. Crass & Hardin for appellant.

Messrs. McMaster, Hall, & Drowley, for respondents:

The mortgage of the index books would not give any lien on the literary property in the compilation; for the literary property is the right to reproduce and publish, and is a thing apart from the manuscript itself. It no more passes by a mortgage or sale of the manuscript than would patent rights pass with the sale of one of the patented articles or a copyright pass with the sale of a book.

Irrespective of what was mortgaged, a mortgage in this state is nothing more than a lien without any of the qualities of ownership or title, and leaves undisturbed in the owner the fullest rights to the use thereof.

The photographs and damages were not recoverable in any event.

Bridges, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the photographic reproductions of certain mortgaged abstract books and records and to recover damages. The trial court nonsuited the plaintiff, and this appeal is from the judgment dismissing the action.

The facts are substantially as follows: In the year 1912, the Clarke County Abstract & Loan Company was the owner and in possession of certain real estate and certain records, books, plats, maps, instruments, machines, furniture, and fixtures, constituting a complete plant used in the conduct of its business as a maker and seller of abstracts of title to real property. On August 10, 1912, the abstract and loan company, in order to secure a note of $24,000, executed and delivered to Jessie M. Wintler, as trustee, a mortgage upon its real estate and upon the above-mentioned personal property. One clause of the mortgage is as follows: "And the said mortgagor mortgages also to the mortgagee, as additional security for the said note, all of its plant, used in the conduct of its business as engaged in the compilation and sale of abstracts of title to real property and in making loans and other like business, and consisting of all its records, books, plats, maps, instruments, machines, furniture, and fixtures, and all other of its equipment as the same now exists and is located at No. 607 Eleventh street, Vancouver, Washington, or as the same may hereafter be renewed, added to, or enlarged."

After giving the mortgage, the abstract and loan company continued in possession of the mortgaged property and continued the abstract business. It failed to make the payments required by the terms of the note and mortgage, and on October 26, 1915, the trustee commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage. While this action was pending, the abstract and loan company made photographic copies of all of the books and records of the abstract plant and sold them to Charles B. Sears and C. W. Knowles to be used in the same county. Afterwards the mortgage was duly foreclosed, and on April 22, 1916, the property was sold by the sheriff, and the mortgagee became the purchaser at the sale. Thereafter the mortgagee and the persons for whom she was acting as trustee, together with one or two others, organized the appellant corporation, and the property obtained by purchase at the sheriff's sale was conveyed to it. After the photographic reproductions were sold to Sears and Knowles, they formed the Sears Abstract & Loan Company, which continued to use the photographic copies and to make therefrom abstracts of title to real estate, up to the time of the beginning of this action. On December 26, 1916, the Sears Abstract & Loan Company executed and delivered to the Vancouver National Bank a chattel mortgage covering the photographic copies, together with other personal property. This mortgage was given to secure a bona fide indebtedness owing to the bank. It appears that all of the respondents had actual knowledge of the existence of the mortgage to Jessie M. Wintler and the taking and sale of the photographic copies.

The chief legal question involved is: May a mortgagor of a set of abstract books and records lawfully, and without violating any of the rights of the mortgagee, make photographic copies of such books and records for the purpose of using the same after the mortgage is foreclosed, in the business of making abstracts of title to property, or selling the same to be used for a like purpose. In discussing this question it must always be kept in mind that in this state a mortgage does not serve to convey the title, but creates a lien only, leaving the title in the mortgagor. Silsby v. Aldridge, 1 Wash. 117, 23 Pac. 836; Binnian v. Baker, 6 Wash. 50, 32 Pac. 1008; Richter v. Buchanan, 48 Wash. 32, 92 Pac. 782; Nettleton v. Evans, 67 Wash. 227, 121 Pac. 54.

Apparently, the question involved here is one of first impression; for no cases in point are cited in the briefs, and the somewhat extended search which we have made fails to reveal any. There is a line of cases cited by appellant which holds that an author, at common law, has a property in his manuscript, and may obtain redress against one who deprives him of it, or, by improperly obtaining a copy, endeavors to realize a profit by its publication. The case of Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, 51 L.R.A. 353, 19 C. A. 429, 38 U. S. App. 410, 78 Fed. 196, is illustrative of this principle; but those cases cannot help us here, because there the owner was the complaining party, while here the one who complains holds only a mortgage lien. Nor—and for nearly the same reason—can we get any light from that line of cases where a photographer, employed to take certain photographs of the employer, uses his negatives or plates to take additional pictures, to be sold to others or to be put to some other use. Klug v. Sheriffs, 129 Wis. 468, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 362, 116 Am. St. Rep. 967, 109 N. W. 656, 9 Ann. Cas. 1013; Levy v. Clements, 175 Mass. 376, 50 L.R.A. 397, 56 N. E. 735; Douglas v. Stokes, 149 Ky. 506, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 386, 149 S. W. 849, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 374; Corliss v. F. W. Walker Co. (C. C.) 31 L.R.A. 283, 64 Fed. 280.

The respondents contend that the mortgagor, being the owner of the property, had a right to take these photographs and dispose of them, provided he did thereby no unnecessary damage to the mortgaged property; that the mortgage did not cover the photographs, and therefore could not be foreclosed as to them. The lower court seems to have also taken this view of the case. We cannot believe that the only right which a mortgagee has is to foreclose his mortgage. The mortgagor's ownership is not unqualified; he may not do with the property as he may fit; he may use it in the usual and customary way, doing no unnecessary damage; but he may not, over the objections of the mortgagee, use the property in any unusual, unc customary, or unexpected way, and particularly so if such use greatly injures the property or depreciates its value. The mortgagee has, and in the very nature of the relation must have, the right at all times to protect the property, which gives him security against any unusual or unnecessary damage. These principles are laid down by Jones on Chattel Mortgages. At § 451, 5th ed. he says: "A mortgagee, in case of apprehended danger of loss of the mortgaged property, may have a receiver appointed, even before his right to foreclose has accrued. It is sufficient to authorize the appointment of a receiver that the mortgagor is insolvent, that the property is not sufficient in value to secure the debt, and that there is still danger of its removal beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The power of a court of equity to preserve the mortgaged property from destruction, so that it may answer the purpose of the mortgage, is undoubted. A bill for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver may be sustained, where it is shown that these remedies are proper for the mortgagee's protection, although the time of payment set in the mortgage has not arrived."

And at § 490: "A purchaser of property upon which there is a valid mortgage who consumes or sells the property or any part of it is liable to the mortgagee for the damages so occasioned him; and it makes no difference that the purchaser took the property in hostility to the mortgage, and denying that it was an existing lien."

The same general principle has been recognized by our legislature and enacted as a part of the laws of this state. Section 1111, Rem. Code, provides that where a debt secured by mortgage is not due and the mortgagee has reasonable cause to believe that the mortgaged property will be destroyed, lost, or removed, he may maintain an immediate action for foreclosure of his mortgage. Section 3669 of the same volume provides that any mortgagor of personal property who, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagee, shall injure or destroy such property or any part thereof, or shall conceal the same or remove it from the county without the consent in writing of the mortgagee, or who shall sell or dispose of the same or any interest therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

In the instant case the chief value of the security was not in the abstract books themselves, but in the information contained in them.

Any act which would make either the books and records, or the information contained in them, less valuable, would to that extent lessen the value of the security. The mortgage not only covered the books themselves, but the information contained in them; and the making public of that secret information must be considered an unlawful destruction of the security. If one set of photographs may be lawfully taken and sold for use, so may a dozen sets of photographs be taken and sold; and thus what was ample security has become almost valueless. It would be small comfort to the mortgagee to tell him that he must be satisfied if the books themselves have not been injured and if they still contain the original information. That doctrine would take the kernel and leave the shell. If one mortgage a house, used only as a dwelling, he would not subsequently be permitted to convert that mortgaged property into a stable; or if one mortgaged a high-priced pleasure automobile he would not thereafter be permitted to use it as a common truck, although he might not make any physical changes in the conveyance. We have no doubt that if this mortgagee had undertaken to enjoin the taking and selling of these photographs, or had sought to have a receiver appointed to take charge of the property because of such taking and sale, or had commenced suit to foreclose her mortgage because of the depreciation of the security resulting from such taking and sale, she must have prevailed. Any other rule of law would deprive abstract books of nearly all their commercial value; for who would hereafter lend money upon abstract books as security, knowing that one or more sets of photographic copies may afterwards be lawfully taken and sold, to be used in opposition to the mortgaged property? The same rule of law which would permit a mortgagee to enjoin any act which would wholly or partially destroy the mortgaged property should also permit him to enjoin any act which would wholly or partially destroy the value of that property. We therefore hold that in this case the mortgagor did not have the right, over the objections of records of title—right to photograph. of the mortgagee, to take and sell these photographic copies. But it does not necessarily follow that the appellant can maintain this suit.

This action is maintained upon the principle that the mortgage covered the photographic copies, and that it was foreclosed as to those copies, and that when the original mortgagee became the purchaser at the sheriff's sale she purchased these copies along with the rest of the personal property, and that she thereafter conveyed the same to the appellant. If it be conceded that under any circumstances the purchaser at the sale might maintain a possessory action such as this, yet we are forced to the conclusion that the appellant is not in position to maintain this action. The decree of foreclosure gives a particular description of the personal property which was ordered sold. These photographic copies are not included in this description. The sheriff's bill of sale to the purchaser gives an itemized statement of the property sold, and these photographic copies are not included. It follows that the appellant cannot be the owner or entitled to the possession of these photographic copies, and cannot, therefore, maintain this suit.

While we decide that a mortgagor of abstract books and records has no right, as against the mortgagee, to take and sell photographic copies thereof, and that the mortgagee would have his action to enjoin such taking and sale, yet, where the reproductions have been taken and sold, we expressly do not decide whether such copies would be included within the mortgage, nor do we decide whether the mortgagee's action would be a possessory one such as the one we are dealing with, or one to enjoin the use of such copies, or for their destruction, or a straight action for money damages. Having decided that the appellant is not in position to maintain this action, it is not necessary to determine the form of the proper action or the exact nature of the remedy.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Rights, as regards copying or reproduction, of parties to sale, mortgage, or other contract in relation to records or abstracts.

The reported case (WINTLER ABSTRACT & LOAN Co. v. SEARS, ante, 152) holding that a mortgagor of abstracts of title cannot, over the objection of the mortgagee, make and sell photographic copies, thereby diminishing the security of the mortgage debt, seems to be one of first impression. In the state of Washington a mortgage creates a lien only, and leaves the title to the property in the mortgagor. The court, therefore, was not concerned with any question of the mortgagee's title. Its decision was based on the ground that, though the title is in the mortgagor, he may do no act that will have the effect of diminishing the value of the security. This seems to be in accord with the general doctrine that a mortgagor must do no act to impair the sufficiency of the mortgagee's security. In 19 R. C. L. p. 319, it is said: "Broadly speaking, a mortgagor in possession, whether by permission of the mortgagee in jurisdictions wherein the latter is entitled to possession or by virtue of his own inherent right in jurisdictions wherein he is regarded as both the legal and equitable owner of the property with the right of possession, is the absolute and beneficial owner of the property, and may enjoy the ordinary privileges and benefits of ownership so long as he does not unreasonably prejudice the rights or security of the mortgagee." A. S. M.

C. A. CONLEY et al.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 290.)

Evidence — damages — eminent domain — profits of business.

1. In a proceeding to condemn private property for public use, evidence of past annual profits derived from a business conducted on the property, in the form of net income arising from such business, offered as an index to the market value of the property, is ordinarily inadmissible, because the extent to which such income arises out of the property used is uncertain; it being dependent upon the capital invested, business conditions obtaining, and the trading skill and business capacity of the owner, as well as adaptability of the property to the business.

—disadvantage of new location of business.

2. If, in such case, the business is to be continued at another location and on property different from that involved in the proceeding, evidence of the relative inconvenience and disadvantages of the new location is inadmissible, because the constitutional guaranty of indemnity does not extend to the business conducted upon the property taken.

Damages — eminent domain — cost of new building.

3. Nor, in the event of the erection of a new building on a different piece of land, in which such business is to be continued, can the cost thereof be included in the compensation or damages awarded, or proved as tending to show the value of the old building, in the absence of disclosure of like or closely similar construction and conditions in all respects.

4. In such case, the admission of evidence of damages to a lot not involved in the proceeding, nor used in connection with the property proceeded against, though contiguous to it, is erroneous.

Evidence — eminent domain — offer of compensation — authority of agent.

5. It is also erroneous, in such case, to permit the landowner to prove an inquiry to him by an agent and attorney of the condemnor, as to whether he would accept a named sum of money, in payment of compensation for the property to be taken and damages to the residue, without proof of the agent's authority to fix and determine the amount of such compensation and damages. Evidence of such an inquiry is also inadmissible, because it does not fairly tend to prove an admission as to the value of the property.

Damages — eminent domain — taking of part or all of lot.

6. Ordinarily, when only a part of a lot or parcel of land is taken under the power of eminent domain, the proof of value should be limited to the part actually taken, and, as to the residue, the evidence should be limited to damages; but, when virtually all the property is taken and the remnants are relatively worthless, the value of the entire tract or lot may be established and an allowance made for the value of the remnants.

Evidence — eminent domain — availability of other property.

7. After the right to take the property has been adjudicated and acquiesced in, it is inadmissible to prove, upon the inquiry as to compensation and damages, that the condemnor could have obtained other property equally as well suited to its purposes. — availability of other locations.

8. Upon such a trial, a witness cannot base his opinion as to the value of the property upon "the possibility or impossibility of securing other locations" for the business conducted upon it.

— assessment for taxation.

9. To be admissible, by virtue of § 115, chap. 29 (§ 1000), of the Code, as evidence of the value of property proceeded against under the power of eminent domain, the assessment thereof for purposes of taxation, last certified before the beginning of the proceeding, must be limited to the property so proceeded against, and must not include it and other property as a single or combined piece, unless the property is of uniform value and appears to have been assessed by the acre or by the lot.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. N. King, Leroy Allebach, and Dillon & Nuckolls, for plaintiff in error:

In condemnation proceedings it is proper to show how the property is used as an element of value, but it is incompetent to go into the question of profits derived from the business carried on upon it.

Messrs. Magee McClung and C. R. Summerfield for defendants in error.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The verdict and judgment in this condemnation proceeding by a railway company to take, for its purposes, a portion of each of two small lots, on one of which there was a horse and mule barn, and on the other a department store building, both in use at the time, are for $14,000, and the applicant complains of them.

The dimensions of the barn lot were, substantially, 40 by 80 feet, and of the other lot 40 by 54 feet. The railroad right of way line cut into both lots to a depth of about 30 feet and ran through the building on each. Each of the structures was a two-story frame building; the former about 54 by 37 feet, and the latter about 36 by 50 feet. On account of the unfavorable topography of the ground, the building sites had to be prepared at considerable expense, by the blasting out and hauling away of rock and the construction of retaining walls. The barn seems to have been built in 1911, and the storehouse in 1914. Up to a date prior to August, 1917, the time of the institution of this proceeding, the two defendants, C. A. Conley and E. D. Kincaid, were partners trading in horses and mules, and conducted their business in the barn just described. At the latter date, Conley, having bought out Kincaid, was conducting the horse and mule business alone. They, however, were owners in common of the two lots, and Conley, was paying Kincaid $25 per month as rental for his interest in the lot on which the barn stood, and the store building paid a rental of $60 per month.

The commissioners appointed in the usual way ascertained the compensation and damages respecting the lot on which the barn was at $4,800 and the lot on which the store building was at $5,500, making a total of $10,300. The railway company paid this amount into court and obtained an order authorizing it to take possession of the property. The owners excepted to the report of the commissioners and demanded a trial by jury, solely on the question of the amount of compensation and damages; they having acquiesced in the court's decision affirming the right of the applicant to take the property for its railroad purposes, on payment of proper compensation and damages.

All of the numerous assignments of error, except two, are based upon rulings admitting evidence over objections of the plaintiff in error. One of the others denies the propriety of an instruction, because it is based upon evidence alleged to be inadmissible; and the overruling of a motion to set aside the verdict, for insufficiency of the evidence, and as being contrary to the clear and decided preponderance of the evidence, is the subject-matter of the last one.

In the beginning of the trial, the court refused to permit the owners of the property to prove the net income and profits of the horse and mule business conducted in the barn on one of the lots, for the year immediately preceding the month of August, 1917, the date of the institution of this proceeding; but, later, such evidence was admitted over an objection interposed by the applicant. In the argument submitted here in support of the court's final ruling upon the question, it is frankly admitted that such profits cannot be included in the verdict as an element or item of compensation or damages; but it is earnestly insisted that profits actually derived from business conducted on the property may be proved as one of the circumstances tending to show its market value. The distinction between the two offices of proof is obvious, but it does not overcome the objection to the evidence in question. There is a clear distinction, but it is not co-extensive with the difference. The rental value is always admissible, because it is almost as fixed and certain as the market value of the property. The profits derived from a business conducted upon the property are uncertain and speculative in character, because the question of profit and loss, or the amount of profit, in the event of any, depends more upon the capital invested, general business conditions, and the trading skill and business capacity of the person conducting it, than it does upon the location of the place of business. Profits already derived from a business may not be speculative, in the true sense of the term; but they would, nevertheless, constitute an uncertain measure of the value of the property upon which the business was carried on.

Evidence—
damages—
eminent domain —profits of

The argument submitted in support of the admissibility of this evidence is plausible; but it is not in harmony with our decisions, nor with the weight of authority throughout the country. Buckhannon & N. R. Co. v. Great Scott Coal & Coke Co. 75 W. Va. 423, 83 S. E. 1031; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Shepherd, 26 W. Va. 672; Richmond, P. & C. R. Co. v. Chamblin, 100 Va. 401, 41 S. E. 750; Braun v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. 166 Ill. 434, 46 N. E. 974; Dupuis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 115 Ill. 97, 3 N. E. 720; Sauer v. New York, 44 App. Div. 305, 60 N. Y. Supp. 648; Re Gilroy, 26 App. Div. 314, 49 N. Y. Supp. 798; Newton v. Armstrong, 63 Hun, 628, 45 N. Y. S. R. 18, 19 N. Y. Supp. 573; Edmands v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535; Cobb v. Boston, 109 Mass. 438; Becker v. Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co. 177 Pa. 252, 35 L.R.A. 583, 35 Atl. 617; Kossler v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 208 Pa. 50, 57 Atl. 66. Several of these cases specifically deny the admissibility of evidence of past profits derived from the land taken. Others rule out proof of future profits. No authority explicitly holding that, under ordinary circumstances, such evidence can be received to prove market value, has been cited or found.

In some jurisdictions, the peculiar character of the property to be condemned or the circumstances of the owner are permitted to vary the rule and to constitute an exception thereto. Thus, in Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407, in which the subject of condemnation was a toll bridge, the court recognized the exception and permitted the introduction of proof of past annual net profits as tending to show the market value of the bridge. Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The principle is well enough, but it has no application to the facts of this case. The property taken was of a peculiar character, and can hardly be said to have a market value."

In Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Patterson, 107 Pa. 461, the same court denied the right of a jury to take in consideration, in its estimate of compensation and damages, any supposed loss of profits, saying: "Such an assessment would be purely speculative, and a rule which justified it would lead to most ruinous results."

In Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. v. Siegel, 161 Ill. 638, 44 N. E. 276, the owners were allowed the cost of removal of their personal property from the real estate taken and damages for interruption of their business; but it was carefully noted that the allowances were made under an exception to the general rule. These cases are referred to merely to show that such exceptions are recognized in some jurisdictions. They are not applicable here, for there is nothing of an anomalous character in this case, justifying an inquiry as to the existence of such exceptions here.

All of the evidence tending to prove that the new barn is not as conveniently or advantageously located as the old one was improperly admitted. As in the case of profits, it pertains, not to the value of the property taken or damage to the residue, but to the business of one of the defendants. For injury or detriment to that the law does not require the condemnor to compensate. Buckhannon & N. R. Co. v. Great Scott Coal & Coke Co. 75 W. Va. 423, 83 S. E. 1031; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Shepherd, 26 W. Va. 672. Such damages are said to be common to the owners of other like business enterprises of the community. The true reason may be that presumptively the world affords the trader just as good opportunities in other places, and the inconvenience and expense of finding another location are incidents of the business, and not elements of damage to the property condemned; the constitutional guaranty being limited by its terms to compensation for property taken and indemnity for injury to property not taken. If an established business is to be continued on the residue of property only partially taken, an allowance for interruption to the business may possibly be justifiable, on the theory of temporary loss of use of the residue of the property; but as to this we decide nothing, since the question does not arise, the business having been removed to another piece of land.

Evidence of the cost of construction of a new barn on another site was improperly admitted also. The applicant pays the value of the old

Damages—
eminent domain
—cost of new

barn, and, out of that compensation or otherwise, the defendant should provide himself with a new one, if he needs or desires it. As the applicant takes a good portion of each building, and the lots are too small to afford room for them on what remains of each lot, they are in legal contemplation wholly taken. In other words, they are to be treated, upon the inquiry as to compensation, as if they were wholly taken. Ohio River R. Co. v. Gibbens, 35 W. Va. 57, 12 S. E. 1093; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 180, 20 L. ed. 557; Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147. They are parts of the property taken, and are therefore to be paid for. The condemnor is not required, in addition to such payment, to provide new buildings. The case is entirely different from one in which a building can be moved over onto the untaken residue of a tract of land and its uses continued. In the latter case, cost of removal might be evidence bearing on the question of damages to the residue; but we do not have this question. The evidence of the cost of erection of the new barn is too uncertain as an element of proof of the value of the old one. It was put up on different ground, and the cost of preparation of the new site may have been considerably more or less than that incident to the construction of the old one, which included expensive excavation and retaining walls. If identity or close similarity of conditions in all respects would make this evidence admissible, as tending to prove the value of the old barn, it is not disclosed, and the record does not indicate that it can be.

Between the two lots in question there was another small one owned by Conley alone, and a part of which was taken. Kincaid alone owned another lot adjoining all three of those involved in the proceeding, and on it he resided in a house worth probably $3,000; but no part of that lot was taken. Defendants were allowed, over objections, to prove damages to his residence lot, resulting from the construction of the railroad in front of it. No direct effort is made in the brief for defendant in error to sustain this ruling, but it is treated as part of the evidence relating to an assessment for taxation, in an effort to apportion the assessment between the residence lot and the store lot; they having been assessed together. This effort at apportionment, however, did not necessarily involve proof of damage to the residence lot, which was not involved in the proceeding.

contiguous lot.

Admission of such proof was a palpable error. On this subject, the rule is strict. Lewis, Em. Dom. 697, citing numerous cases sustaining the text.

Evidence of an inquiry made by an agent and attorney of the condemnor as to whether one of the defendants would accept a certain amount of money by way of compensation and damages, if he were sole owner of the property, was admitted over objection. As there

Evidence—
eminent domain
—offer of compensation—authority of agent.

was no proof of any authority in the agent and attorney to bind his principal by an agreement as to the compensation and damages, this evidence was improperly admitted. One dealing with an agent must know the extent of his authority. Uniontown Grocery Co. v. Dawson, 68 W. Va. 332, 69 S. E. 845, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 148. The inquiry, if made, was no evidence of the value of the property and rights sought. It was an effort to ascertain the attitude of the defendants, and did not import purpose or willingness to pay the amount suggested. Besides, there is no proof of intent on the part of the principal to make the agent a witness either for or against it in the condemnation proceeding. It was bad for want of proof of authority in the agent, and also for lack of tendency to prove value.

Ordinarily it would be highly improper to permit the owner to prove the value of the entire property, when only a portion of it is taken. But in

Damages—
eminent domain
—taking of part or all of lot.

this case the remnants are so small and unfavorably located, lying between the railroad track and a rock cliff, that their relative values practically amount to almost nothing, and render the ordinary rule difficult of application. It is much more convenient and intelligible to state the entire values and then make allowances for the remnants. In point of utility, though not of law or fact, the entire lots, according to the evidence, were substantially taken, for the portions not taken were rendered almost useless. The buildings were, in a legal sense, wholly taken, because they had to be moved or destroyed. The assignment of error respecting proof of entire values is, for these reasons, held to be untenable.

As the right of the railroad company to take the land had been previously adjudicated and acquiesced in by the defendants, it was too late for them to set up the defense of lack of necessity for condemnation of

eminent domain
—availability of other property.

these lots on the ground of existence of another way occasioning less damage. Introduction of evidence at this stage of the case to prove such a way could subserve no useful or legitimate purpose. It pertains neither to the value of the land taken nor damages to the residue. It might become a fallacious basis of an inference of wantonness on the part of the railway company, in seeking unnecessarily to take improved or actually used property, when vacant property would answer its purposes equally well. If effective at all, such an inference could result only in prejudice against the railway company in the trial. The witness did say the ground on the other side of the road was very steep and rocky; but he had previously stated the condemnor could have gone that way and obtained cheaper property. The court should have sustained the motion to strike that evidence out.

A witness was improperly allowed to give his opinion as to the value of the property, "taking into consideration . . . the possibility or impossibility of securing other locations." It was competent for the defendants to prove the location, the adaptation of the property to any use of which it was susceptible, and the use to which it had been devoted, as bearing on the question of market value; but, for reasons already stated, they could not have the jury take into consideration facts tending to prove detriment to their trading business conducted on the property. This involves no mere interruption to business to be continued on the residue of a tract of land, which may fall within an exception to the general rule. The taking of the land terminates the business on that tract, and the constitutional guaranty does not require reimbursement for loss of business.

The argument submitted in support of the admission of the tax assessment of the Kincaid residence lot and the store building lot, treated as a single piece of property, at the sum of $17,280, fallaciously assumes that the assessor put the same values on the two pieces of property as the witnesses accorded to them—$5,000 on the residence lot and $12,280 on the other. The unreliability of assessments as indices to the market values of property is shown by the fact that the assessment of these two pieces of property for the preceding year was only $2,000. Assessments are so fearfully and wonderfully made that it would be unsafe to hazard a guess as to the method adopted in any particular case. The statute (Code 1913, chap. 29, § 115 [§ 1000]) makes them admissible on questions of value; but, ordinarily, the assessment offered should be limited to the particular property involved in the proceeding; for, when two or more pieces are combined, there is no certain means of knowledge affording ground for a just and fair apportionment, unless the land is all of the same quality and appears to have been valued by the <sup>assessment</sup> <sub>for taxation.</sub> acre or the lot. The court should have excluded the assessment and refused the instruction based upon it.

As the evidence on the new trial will be different in material respects from what it was on this trial, it is deemed unnecessary, and might be improper, to enter upon any inquiry as to whether, as it stands now, it is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

For the errors noted, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

I. Introductory.

This note does not include a discussion of the right to recover for the loss of the profits of a business or for an injury thereto where the property on which the business is conducted is taken by virtue of the power of eminent domain, but is confined strictly to the question whether profits derived from a business conducted on property are evidence of its market value in condemnation proceedings.

II. Rule in United States.a. Rule stated.

With remarkable unanimity the American jurisdictions hold that evidence of profits derived from a business conducted on property is too speculative, uncertain, and remote to be considered as a basis for computing or ascertaining the market value of the property in condemnation proceedings.

In Braun v. West Side Elev. R. Co. (Ill.) supra, the court stated the general rule as follows: "The general rule is, that just compensation to the owner of private property taken or damaged for public use is to be measured by its fair cash market value.

. . . This rule excludes all evidence as to the amount of business done or which could be done in the property, or the probate profits arising therefrom." In that case, however, evidence of the profits derived from the business conducted on the condemned property was not offered as an element determining the market value, but as a loss constituting a separate item of damage.

b. Application of rule.

1. Condemnation for use of railroad.

Thus in Buckhannon & N. R. Co. v. Great Scott Coal & Coke Co. (1914) 75 W. Va. 423, 83 S. E. 1031, it was held improper to go into the question of profits derived from a business conducted on property taken for the use of a railroad, in order to show its market value, although it was proper to show how the property was used as bearing on its value.

In Hamilton v. Pittsburg, B. & L. E. R. Co. (1899) 190 Pa. 51, 51 L.R.A. 319, 42 Atl. 369, a proceeding to determine the amount of compensation due the plaintiff for the taking of part of his land for railroad purposes, he offered in evidence testimony as to the future profits he expected to derive from a business conducted in the property, by reason of a proposed increase in his plant. The court held that it was error to admit this evidence; for it was unreliable, speculative, and remote, and did not constitute evidence of the market value of the property taken.

See to the same effect Booker v. Venice & C. R. Co. (1882) 101 Ill. 333; Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Patterson (1885) 107 Pa. 461; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Davis (1906) 58 W. Va. 620, 52 S. E. 724.

Where, in an action to condemn a strip of land, including the appellant's premises, for railroad purposes, the landowner attempted to show the market value of his property by introducing evidence of the profits derived from his wine cellar, the court held that the profits were too remote, and did not tend to throw any light on the market value of the property. De Buol v. Freeport & M. River R. Co. (1884) 111 Ill. 499.

And in Kossler v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1904) 208 Pa. 50, 57 Atl. 66, wherein it appeared that in part of the plaintiff's lot, taken for railroad purposes, was situated a salt well, and the complainant offered to prove as an element in fixing the market value of the same the profits derived from selling the product of the well after the same had been treated and prepared in a manufacturing plant, the court held that the evidence was improper and inadmissible for the purpose of showing the market value of the property condemned, saying: "In so far as the salt-water well constituted an element of value, it was merely as contributing a certain volume of salt water. Whether or not this product, as such, had any market value, does not appear from the evidence. No use had been made of it for a period of some nine years, and there was nothing to show what its value was, except in connection with the erection of an evaporating plant, and its operation subject to the contingencies of business. It is suggested in the argument of appellee, that the proof of the value of the salt-water well in this case is to be likened to that of an oil well. Be it so: The market value of an oil well is not determined by evidence of the profits which can be made from the product of the well, by means of a refinery erected upon the spot, operated with successful business skill. Its market value is its selling value as a well. In the present case, the market value of the salt-water well, if it were shown to have had any, at the time of the taking, would be one of the elements entering into the value of the property as a whole. If the well was destroyed, its value would also be one of the elements of depreciation, to be considered in ascertaining the loss in the selling value of the whole property caused by the entry of the defendant company."

In Stockton & C. R. Co. v. Galgiani (1874) 49 Cal. 139, an action to determine the value of lands taken for railroad purposes, it appeared that the land of the respondent and his cotenants was planted with vines and cultivated as a vineyard. In the court below evidence was allowed showing the annual net profits per acre derived from the land taken as an element of its market value. The court held that the evidence was inadmissible, saying: "The fact to be ascertained was the value of the land at the time of the taking. It is not allowed to arrive at this fact by proof of the annual net profits derived from a particular use. The profit for any year would depend upon many and varying circumstances, such as the nature of the season, the price of labor, the condition of the market as to supply and demand in respect to the particular product, etc. A valuation derived from such evidence would be conjectural and speculative, and would not form a proper basis for an estimate of damages."

In King v. Minneapolis Union R. Co. (1884) 32 Minn. 224, 20 N. W. 135, wherein it appeared that manufacturing business had been carried on for a number of years on property sought to be condemned for railroad purposes, the court held that it was proper to consider the business conducted on the premises as an element in ascertaining its market value, but recourse could not be had to evidence showing the profits derived from the business.

So, in Ranlet v. Concord R. Corp. (1883) 62 N. H. 561, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's lands, on which he conducted a coal and wood business, were taken for railroad purposes, evidence was offered showing the annual profits and income derived from the business. The court held that the evidence was immaterial and was properly excluded; for the true measure of damages for the taking of the lands was the market value thereof, and the evidence excluded could furnish no aid in the determination of that question.

In the reported case (GAULEY & E. R. Co. v. CONLEY, ante, 157), it appears that two lots were condemned for the use of a railroad, upon one of which was a horse and mule barn. The owners were permitted over objection to prove in evidence the net income and profits of the horse and mule business conducted by them on the property, as an index to its market value. The court holds that the evidence was inadmissible; for the profits derived from a business conducted upon the property was uncertain and speculative in character, depending on the capital invested, the skill and management of the owners, and other elements extrinsic to the property itself, and therefore it did not afford a true basis for the ascertainment of the market value of the property.

But compare Laffin v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. (1887) 33 Fed. 415, wherein the plaintiff sought the ascertainment of damages sustained by the construction of the defendant's railroad across a tract of land owned by him. It appeared that the plaintiff conducted a summer hotel on part of the property, and that the remainder of the land he proposed to plot and sell in the form of village lots. For the purpose of showing the depreciation in the market value of the hotel property and the lots, the plaintiff offered evidence showing loss of patronage and profits to the hotel by reason of the operation of the defendant's railroad, and the expected prices and profits to be derived from the sale of the lots. The court instructed the jury, firstly, to disregard the evidence showing the expected profits from the sale of the lands by lots, as a measure of their value; for any supposed profits that might be made in the future were too remote, uncertain, and speculative; but, secondly, they could take with consideration the probable effects upon the hotel business and the loss or profits therefrom, not for the purpose of assessing damages for such items individually, but in order to determine how much the property was diminished in value by these remote injuries. The court said: "You will therefore bear clearly in mind that you are not to allow the plaintiff, as damages, any loss of profits in the business of the hotel, or loss of business or patronage, either presently or prospectively; nor are you to allow him damages on account of inconvenience or danger in the use of the drives on or around the premises, or on account of annoyances arising from smoke from the engines or noise of the engine whistles, or increased exposure to fire, or on account of any inconveniences in the use of the hotel property. The true question is, How much was the salable value of the lands of the plaintiff, and the improvements thereon, from which the strip for right of way was severed, diminished by the taking of that strip for railroad purposes? While, therefore, it is your duty, in computing the damages in this case, to exclude the items before mentioned, and any others of a similar nature, from your consideration, as independent items of damage, you will at the same time understand that you have the right, and that it is entirely proper, to consider this testimony of alleged inconveniences, annoyances, and dangers, and any probable effects upon the business of the hotel, as accounting in some measure for the valuations stated by the witnesses; also to enable you to estimate the value of the opinions of witnesses as to the alleged depreciation in the value of the property; and, determining from the testimony how much, if at all, the property is diminished in value by exposure to those remote injuries, in that manner to aid you in measuring the actual or real loss, if any, to the plaintiff by the severance from his lands of the strip taken for right of way, and its appropriation for railroad purposes."

Compare also Hunter v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Fitzhugh v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co.) (1907) 107 Va. 158, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124, 59 S. E. 415, where in a condemnation proceeding, it appeared that a certain parcel of real estate was taken for railroad purposes, and upon this property a large and profitable business had been conducted. The court held that, while loss of profits or damage to business was not an element for consideration in determining the market value of the property because a matter of speculation and conjecture, nevertheless, the profits earned in a business conducted on the property taken were proper to be considered in ascertaining and fixing the market value of the property. However, in the instant case profits derived from the business conducted on the property were not offered as evidence of the market value, but the plaintiff claimed damages for the loss of profits as an independent item.

2. Condemnation for other purposes.

In Chicago v. Farwell (1919) 286 Ill. 415, 121 N. E. 795, wherein evidence was offered of the profits derived from a soap manufactory conducted on the property, part of which was condemned by the defendant city for a municipal purpose, as an element showing the market value of the property, the court held that where property had a market value evidence of profits derived from it was inadmissible as a basis for fixing compensation.

In Re Simmons (1908) 58 Misc. 581, 109 N. Y. Supp. 1036, affirmed in (1909) 130 App. Div. 356, 114 N. Y. Supp. 575, it was held that the commissioners, appointed solely to ascertain the market value of lands condemned for the purpose of constructing thereon a city reservoir, properly rejected evidence of the gross receipts and net profits derived from a business conducted on the land; for the testimony offered was no evidence of the market value of the property.

See to the same effect San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Neale (1891) 88 Cal. 50, 11 L.R.A. 604, 25 Pac. 977.

In Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Chicago (1886) 26 Fed. 415, in determining the depreciation in the market value of the plaintiff's premises by reason of the construction of a viaduct, the court instructed the jury not to consider the past or future profits of the business there carried on, for they were too speculative and uncertain, and therefore not a proper basis upon which to ascertain the market value of the property. See to the same effect Robbins v. Scranton (1907) 217 Pa. 577, 66 Atl. 977; Sauer v. New York (1899) 44 App. Div. 305, 60 N. Y. Supp. 648.

In Newton v. Armstrong (1892) 63 Hun, 628, 45 N. Y. S. R. 18, 19 N. Y. Supp. 573, a proceeding to condemn certain lands for aqueduct purposes, the owner of the lands sought to prove, as showing the value of the property, the amount of business done by him in a mill conducted on the land, and the profits derived therefrom. The court held that this evidence was properly excluded, for it did not tend to prove the market value of the property, holding that "the size and capacity of the mill, and the extent of the water, of course, were relevant. But an inquiry into the owner's business involved other elements—the owner's business skill, the price of labor, the absence of presence of competition—which did not affect the value of the property."

And in Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Thoburn (1821) 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 411, an action to ascertain the amount of damage suffered by a landowner by the inundation of his property caused by the waters of a stream dammed for a public use, the court held that the market value of the property could not be shown by evidence of the profits derived from a business conducted thereon, saying: "It is evident that the profit, in any branch of manufactures, must mainly depend on the amount of capital invested, the number of workmen employed, and the extent of the business carried on; but it would be plainly unjust to put in the power of the plaintiff by an increase of all these, to an amount beyond what the demand for the manufactured article would justify, to charge the defendant in the same proportion for the injuries sustained by the impeding of his works in his business thus extended, as for a loss in his ordinary mode of carrying it on; that would make the defendant an insurer of ordinary profits, in a new state of the business, pushed to a morbid extent, and would put in the power of the plaintiff to increase the damages to any extent he might think proper. I mention this to show the danger of taking into consideration circumstances posterior to time when the privilege is fully entered on, and its consequences to the individual to be compensated are ascertained. The jury are to consider the matter just as if they were called on to value the injury at the moment when compensation could be first demanded; they are to value the injury to the property, without reference to the person of the owner, or the actual state of his business; and in doing that, the only safe rule is to inquire, What would the property, unaffected by the obstruction, have sold for, at the time the injury was committed? What would it have sold for, as affected by the injury? The difference is the true measure of compensation."

In Syracuse v. Stacey (1899) 45 App. Div. 249, 61 N. Y. Supp. 165, affirmed on other grounds in (1901) 169 N. Y. 231, 62 N. E. 354, wherein it appeared that certain land and water rights were taken for the purposes of erecting and maintaining a reservoir for a city, evidence was excluded of profits earned in a business conducted on the property taken, which was offered in determining the market value of the premises. The court held that the evidence was inadmissible.

And in Kafka v. Davidson (1917) 135 Minn. 389, 160 N. W. 1021, wherein it appeared that a strip of property was condemned for the purpose of widening a city street, the court held that it was competent to prove that the market value of the premises taken was enhanced by the fact that a cigar business had been maintained for a number of years on the property, but evidence as to the amount of profits derived from the business was not admissible as an element showing the market value of the property or the injury thereto.

In Tide Water Canal Co. v. Archer (1838) 9 Gill & J. (Md.) 479, wherein testimony was offered to show what profits might reasonably or probably be made from a business carried on by tenants on property sought to be condemned, the court held that such evidence was too uncertain and variable to be admissible in order to determine the value of the tenants' lease rights.

In an action to determine the value of a leasehold estate taken by the city of Boston under the Statute of 1867, chap. 308, evidence was offered as to the annual profits derived from a business conducted on the premises taken. The court held that an exclusion of the evidence was proper; for profits of a business did not constitute, and could not be considered in determining, the market value of the estate condemned. Cobb v. Boston (1872) 109 Mass. 438.

In Boston Belting Co. v. Boston (1903) 183 Mass. 254, 67 N. E. 428, it was held that loss of business could not be considered as an element showing the depreciation in market value of the property on which the business was conducted, caused by the taking of the waters of a brook flowing through the property and used in the operation of the business conducted thereon.

In West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Boal (1908) 232 Ill. 248, 83 N. E. 824, a proceeding to ascertain the compensation to be paid for certain lots to be devoted to public use as a park, it appeared that the defendant was the owner of a number of the lots, on one of which was conducted a saloon. Evidence was received of the profits and net income from the saloon as an element showing the market value of the leasehold. The court held that the admission of this evidence was erroneous, for the amount of business transacted in the saloon or the profits thereof were not elements to be considered in fixing the market value.

Where, in a proceeding to appraise the value of certain property taken for the use of a city, the owners of the property sought to show the profits derived from a business conducted by them on the premises as evidence of its market value, the court held that an exclusion of such evidence was proper, saying: "It is doubtless competent for the landowner to prove the value of the land taken from him for any purpose for which it may properly be used, and he is entitled to that value, even though he may put the property to a different use. It was of course competent to show that the property was used for business purposes and was suitable for such purposes, for as a rule business property demands a higher price than property used merely for the purpose of residence. It was also competent to show the general character of the business, for property desirable or available for business of a certain character commands higher prices than property only suitable for business of another character; but the profits the occupants had realized from the business carried on upon the property do not tend to show the value of the property itself." Re Gilroy (1898) 26 App. Div. 314, 49 N. Y. Supp. 798.

In Re Buffalo (1886) 1 N. Y. S. R. 742, the court held that, in estimating the market value of property taken for municipal purposes, loss of profits from a business conducted on the property should not be considered, for the same was no evidence of the market value of the property.

In Brainerd v. State (1911) 74 Misc. 100, 181 N. Y. Supp. 221, wherein it was contended by the claimants that the market value of property taken for the use of the state should be fixed by reference to the profits realized from a business conducted on the property, the court held that as a general rule profits could not be taken as the basis for estimating the market value of property taken under the right of eminent domain, saying: "The claimant may have done a profitable business upon the premises in question, but other parties may prove a failure in the same business on the same premises; and even the claimants may not continue to make the same profits in the future that they have made in the past, if left undisturbed. No one can foresee changes that may reduce a profitable business to an unprofitable one."

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Lostant (1897) 167 Ill. 85, 47 N. E. 62, the court held that evidence showing the amount of freight shipped over the defendant's railroad by certain grain elevators whose approaches to the railroad would be blocked by the taking of certain land in the defendant's right of way, was inadmissible as an element in determining the compensation to be paid for the land taken. It was said: "The position attempted to be maintained is, opening the supposed streets will destroy the approaches to the elevator, thereby injuring their business, and so deprive the company of profits which it would otherwise receive for shipping grain and coal; and the extraordinary claim is made that such prospective profits may properly be taken into account in determining the just compensation to be paid for the land taken. It is not pretended that the railroad company has any property rights in the approaches. The ground on which they stand was not leased to the owners of the elevators, nor is it pretended that they, by the terms of their leases, were required to put these approaches where they are or maintain them there. The owners of the elevators make no complaint in this proceeding. The alleged loss to the defendant is manifestly incapable of an intelligent estimate. It is remote, uncertain, and purely speculative. That the evidence was incompetent is too clear for argument."

In Tacoma v. Nisqually Power Co. (1910) 57 Wash. 420, 107 Pac. 199, a proceeding to condemn certain land and water rights for the purpose of generating electric power for a city, evidence was offered showing the possible profits which might be derived from a power plant upon the land taken. The court held that the evidence was inadmissible in determining the market value of the property.

In Cole v. Ellwood Power Co. (1907) 216 Pa. 283, 65 Atl. 678, wherein it appeared that a stone quarry was condemned for a public use, the court held that the value of the stone after it had been manufactured into curbstone and sold in the market, less the cost of production and transportation, in other words, the profit derived from its sale, was not the true measure of the property taken, but the true measure of damages was the value of the stone in place.

And in Miller v. Windsor Water Co. (1892) 148 Pa. 429, 23 Atl. 1132, a proceeding to determine the compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled for property taken by the defendant water company, the court upheld the following charge to the jury: "The jury must consider the question of damages without reference to the person of the owner or the actual state of profits of his business. The test is not what he makes, but what is the market value of the land. As to the market value of the land, the jury will disregard any estimate founded wholly upon those considerations, and they will disregard all estimate in so far as they may have entered into them. But the jury may consider the use to which a property may be put, and if that property, by reason of its location or use to which it is put, may be worth more for that particular use than any other, its market value would be governed accordingly."

In Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Freedley (1841) 6 Whart. (Pa.) 109, a proceeding to ascertain the damage caused the plaintiff's mill by the erection of a dam above it in the stream which provided its motive power, the com-plaintant offered to show his loss in profits as evidence of the depreciated market value of the property. The court held that the evidence was improper and inadmissible, as the profits alleged to have been lost were too speculative and conjectural to afford a true measure of damage.

But the rule that profits derived from a business conducted on property are no evidence of its market value in condemnation proceedings was strictly confined by the court in Dupuis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1885) 115 Ill. 97, 8 N. E. 720, wherein it was held that an instruction to the jury informing them that profits, or supposed profits, arising from the defendant's business were not proper elements to be considered, nor should they take into consideration the character of the business transacted on the property, was misleading, the court saying: "It may be true that the profit or supposed profits arising from the business was not a proper element of damages, as declared in the instruction, but it will be observed that the instruction does not stop with profits or supposed profits, but goes further, and informs the jury that they should not take into consideration the character of the business transacted on the property. As said before, the main inquiry was the fair market value of the property to be taken, but in arriving at a solution of this question, it was proper for the jury to consider the purposes for which the lands were used,—whether they were adapted to that particular use, whether the lands were profitable and valuable for that use; and in so far as the particular use to which the lands were or had been appropriated, added to their market value, that might be considered by the jury. If the lands were valuable, as located, bordering on or near the river, as it is contended they were, for a sawmill, planing mill, or factory of any description, or for any other purpose, the testimony tending to prove such purpose was proper for the consideration of the jury, in passing upon the fair market value of the property taken or damaged."

See also Kansas City v. Bacon

(1900) 157 Mo. 450, 57 S. W. 1045, wherein the court sustained an instruction to the jury in the following form: "In passing upon the value of lots . . . containing the spring of water known as Willow spring, the jury are authorized, in connection with all the other evidence in the case, to take into consideration the special value of said spring, if any, together with all the lawful uses, such as sale of water or piping to supply families, to which the owner may put such spring and water as a source of profit." It was held that this charge did not authorize the jury to indulge in speculation as to profits that might be made by the sale of water in determining the market value of the property taken.

But compare Pause v. Atlanta (1895) 98 Ga. 92, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290, 26 S. E. 489, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff suffered damages by reason of the building of a bridge near her property whereby her business of keeping a restaurant and bar was broken up and destroyed. The court held that recovery could not be had for the profits of the business by way of damages, but evidence that the business was profitable was "admissible to illustrate and throw light upon the value of the premises for rent."

c. Limitation of rule.

1. Value dependent wholly on profits.

Where it appears that the property condemned is of such a nature that the profits derived from its use are the entire or chief source of its value, evidence of the amount of the profits is to be considered in determining the market value.

State v. Suffield & T. Bridge Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 460, 74 Atl. 775; Columbia Delaware Bridge Co. v. Geisse (1875) 38 N. J. L. 39, affirmed in (1876) 38 N. J. Thus in Re State Reservation (1884) 16 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 159, a proceeding to ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid for the taking by the state of New York of property in the vicinity of Niagara Falls, including Prospect Park and Goat Island, two revenue producing scenic spots, evidence was received of the annual net income derived from these resorts by the charging of admission. The court held that while as a general rule evidence of the profits of a business transacted upon property taken by eminent domain is not legitimate evidence of its market value, yet that in view of the peculiar nature of the property in question, and the absence of other means of ascertaining its market value, the annual profits derived could not be omitted as an element in fixing the value of the properties. But it was held further that, before the annual net income could be made a measure of value, it must satisfactorily appear that it had the element of permanency, and that such income was derivable from the property itself, and not from the skill of the management of the property.

And in Columbia Delaware Bridge Co. v. Geisse (1875) 38 N. J. L. 39, affirmed in (1876) 38 N. J. L. 580, it appeared that the defendant bridge company constructed a toll bridge over a river at a point where the plaintiffs had maintained a ferry pursuant to a franchise granted them by the state. In determining the value of the franchise destroyed by the erection and operation of the bridge, the court held that evidence showing the income and profits derived by the plaintiffs from the ferry was competent and proper, saying: "This testimony was clearly competent. The jury was required by the defendant's charter to compensate the plaintiffs for the damages they sustained by the erection of the bridge. The injury they suffered was in being deprived of the tolls they might have received from the ferry, in case the bridge had not been built. In no other way would the jury have been able to estimate the extent of the injury, except by proof of the earnings previously realized from the ferry."

In State v. Suffield & T. Bridge Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 460, 74 Atl. 775, an action to determine the amount of compensation which should be paid to the defendant for the taking of its toll bridge, the court held that evidence bearing upon the net income and profit of the structure should have been admitted and considered as a factor in determining its market value, saying: "Where the property taken has earning capacity, and the market value is just compensation, while evidence of the net income of the property is always competent evidence, it is not necessarily controlling. A purchaser in the market for it will not only look to the present and past income from it, but will inquire as to its future prospects. In the case of a toll bridge, the prospective increase of the population in the contiguous territory, and consequent increase of traffic across the bridge, would tend to increase the market value. The fact, if such should be a fact, that free bridges across the same stream in close proximity to such toll bridge were about to be opened, would have a contrary effect. So, too, the cost of replacing the bridge by a new structure, in case it should be carried away by a freshet or otherwise destroyed, would be likely to be considered by a prospective customer. Evidence of all these facts, and of others of like nature, as well as of the net income received from the property, the par value of the stock of a corporation owning it, and the dividends paid upon such stock, is admissible upon the question of just compensation for taking such a bridge, and when received can be and should be considered and weighed together in arriving at the sum which will constitute such compensation."

See to the same effect Chestnut Hill & S. H. Turnp. Road Co. v. Montgomery County (1910) 228 Pa. 1, 76 Atl. 726; Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. (1885) 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407.

So, in Avondale v. Cincinnati & A. Turnp. Co. (1884) 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 82, the court instructed the jury that in determining the compensation to be paid a turnpike company for the taking of its toll road within the corporate limits of a village recourse could be had to the past profits and income derived from the tolls collected, saying: "Before the village of Avondale can take possession of that portion of the turnpike the law requires that it shall compensate the Turnpike Company in money for the damage it will sustain by reason of the taking or appropriation as such portion of its turnpike; and you are called here to assess the amount of what that compensation should be; in other words, to determine the amount which, in justice, will fairly and justly compensate the Turnpike Company, for being deprived of the right to collect toll in the future upon so much of its road as lies within the corporate limits of Avondale. And if such deprivation will have the effect of impairing or lessening the Turnpike Company's proportionate income on the remaining portion of its road, such impairment or injury to such remaining portion, if any, should also be compensated for and allowed for, in the compensation awarded in your verdict. In the progress of this case, you have necessarily noticed that the nature of the property or right which is sought to be appropriated by the village of Avondale is peculiar in that its value cannot be ascertained by the ordinary rules for determining values, namely, 'market value.' For this kind of property there does not appear to be any market value which can be ascertained, hence recourse is had to another mode of determining the value."

See to the same effect Cincinnati v. Scarborough (1880) 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 874; Harrisburg, C. & C. Turnp. Road Co. v. Cumberland County (1909) 225 Pa. 467, 74 Atl. 340.

2. Property producing profits independent of owner's industry.

Where property is of such a nature that it produces a profit independent of the labor of the owner, that profit is to be considered in determining the market value of the property. Pegler v. Hyde Park (1900) 176 Mass. 101, 57 N. E. 327; Gearhart v. Clear Spring Water Co. (1902) 202 Pa. 292, 51 Atl. 891; Iron City Automobile Co. v. Pittsburgh (1916) 253 Pa. 478, L.R.A.1917C, 420, 98 Atl. 679; Weyer v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. (1887) 68 Wis. 180, 31 N. W. 710; Stolze v. Manitowoc Terminal Co. (1898) 100 Wis. 208, 75 N. W. 987.

Thus, in Iron City Automobile Co. v. Pittsburgh (1916) 253 Pa. 478, L.R.A. 1917C, 421, 98 Atl. 679, the court held that while, in fixing the value of a leasehold destroyed by the taking of the property, recourse could not be had to evidence showing the annual profits and income of a business conducted by the tenant, as an element fixing the market value of the lease, nevertheless, if the leasehold was one which, because of certain peculiar qualities in and of itself, actually produced a revenue or enabled the tenant directly to make a saving in the conduct of his business, aside from the results of his personal management, then the profits directly produced by the property could be considered in ascertaining its market value.

And in Weyer v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. (1887) 68 Wis. 180, 31 N. W. 710, it was held that in estimating the value of farming land it was proper to consider its productiveness, or the income derived therefrom; for from the nature of the land and its use no better criterion could have been adopted in order to ascertain its real value.

So, in Pegler v. Hyde Park (1900) 176 Mass. 101, 57 N. E. 327, a proceeding to assess damages for the taking of a leasehold estate in property used for greenhouses, it appeared that evidence was received of the amount of business done by the owner. The court held that the evidence was admissible as bearing upon the question of the capacity of the real estate for use.

In Stolze v. Manitowoc Terminal Co. (1898) 100 Wis. 208, 75 N. W. 987, wherein it appeared that the land condemned for railroad purposes was used and cultivated as a market garden, the court held that there was no error in allowing the plaintiffs to prove the net profits derived from the land; for its character and use necessitated a liberal rule of evidence in proving its market value.

And in Gearhart v. Clear Spring Water Co. (1902) 202 Pa. 292, 51 Atl. 891, the court held that evidence of the probable returns from an investment in land because of the uses which might be made of it was a consideration which entered with an intelligent estimate of its value, and was entirely distinct from an estimate based on the profits of a business which might be conducted on it. The decision was apparently based on the fact that the land had a productivity independent of the management, skill, and industry of the owner, since it appeared that the property taken consisted of reservoir land which was part of the bottom of a natural basin and peculiarly adapted for the formation of ice.

III. Rule in Canada and England.

In the British jurisdictions, in the few cases wherein the subject has been discussed, evidence of the profits derived from a business conducted on property is considered as an element in fixing the market value in expropriation proceedings. Re Davies (1918) 28 Ont. L. Rep. 544, 4 Ont. Week. N. 1154, 13 D. L. R. 912; Re Meyer (1914) 30 Ont. L. Rep. 426, 5 Ont. Week. N. 733, 19 D. L. R. 785; Ripley v. Great Northern R. Co. (1875) L. R. 10 Ch. (Eng.) 435, 31 L. T. N. S. 869, 23 Week. Rep. 685. See also Reg. v. Vaughan (1868) L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 190, 38 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 49, 17 Week. Rep. 115. See also Pile v. Pile (1876) L. R. 3 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 36, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 841, 35 L. T. N. S. 18, 24 Week. Rep. 1003.

Thus, in Re Meyer (1914) 30 Ont. L. Rep. 426, 5 Ont. Week. N. 733, 19 D. L. R. 785, wherein it appeared that a parcel of land upon which the owner conducted a profitable business was expropriated for municipal purposes, the court held that the profits derived from the business conducted on the land constituted an element to be considered in fixing the value of the property taken.

In Ripley v. Great Northern R. Co. (1875) L. R. 10 Ch. (Eng.) 435, 31 L. T. N. S. 869, 23 Week. Rep. 685, a proceeding to determine the compensation to be paid the plaintiff for the taking of certain lands, evidence was received of the profits which might have been derived from supplying water from a reservoir on the property to cotton mills when built. The court held that the arbitrator was right in considering the evidence as an element in fixing the award, saying: "It is said that even then the umpire ought not to have admitted evidence as to the prospective profits which would be made by selling the water to the mills to be built. Now, I confess I do not see how it was possible that the umpire could discover what loss Mr. Ripley had sustained by reason of his being deprived of the advantage of selling the water from his reservoirs to the mills, without going into evidence of what those profits would be. No doubt there are deductions to be made from the gross profits, and when the profits are ascertained it has to be considered that the compensation will be given at once, whereas the profits would only be gained at a future time, and would only be gained at a certain risk and certain expense. All those deductions are to be made; but I do not know how the value of such property can possibly be ascertained unless you commence by ascertaining the profits, and then make all proper deductions."

In Re Davies (1913) 28 Ont. L. Rep. 544, 4 Ont. Week. N. 1154, 13 D. L. R. 912, wherein it appeared that the respondent was the owner of property on which he maintained a brick works, and that lands immediately adjacent thereto and necessary in the expansion of his business were taken for railroad purposes, the court held that it was proper, in estimating the value of the land, to compute how much the owner could make by using it in connection with his business.

See also Pile v. Pile (1876) L. R. 3 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 36, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 841, 35 L. T. N. S. 18, 24 Week. Rep.

1003, an action for the administration of an estate involving the award of arbitration in a condemnation proceeding wherein it seems that the umpires in computing the value of land taken considered the profits of a business conducted on the property as one of the elements fixing its value.

In Reg. v. Vaughan (1868) L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 190, 38 L. J. Mag. Cas.

N. S. 49, 17 Week. Rep. 115, the court held that while a tenant of property taken under the right of eminent domain was entitled to compensation based on the profits derived from his business as a publican, he could not recover in the basis of profits received after the property had been taken possession of under the proceedings to condemn.

(McPherson, Circuit Judge, dissents in part.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey (Haight, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Buffington, McPherson, and Woolley, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Wicoff & Lanning, Heyn & Covington, and George B. Covington for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. Raymond Tiffany for defendant in error.

Woolley, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on a policy of accident insurance. While the errors assigned cover the whole range of the trial, the single question urged on review is whether notice of the accident was given the insurance company within the time stipulated in the contract of insurance, and whether, accordingly, the trial court erred in refusing a motion for binding instructions in favor of the defendant.

A policy of accident insurance, issued by the defendant company to Henry Johnston, was in force on February 28, 1914, when Johnston fell upon a sidewalk and sustained injuries to his head. On August 30, 1915, he died, and September 4 following, Emma E. Johnston, his widow and executrix, notified the insurance company of the accident and made claims for indemnities under the policy. The insurance company, considering notification of an accident eighteen months after its occurrence to be flagrantly violative of the provision of the policy respecting notice, refused payment, whereupon the plaintiff brought this suit.

The indemnities which the insurance company had stipulated to pay in the event of accident to the insured were two kinds, namely, weekly indemnities for disabilities payable to the insured, and death indemnity payable to his wife. Action was therefore brought on the double undertaking of the insurance company by the wife of the insured in her dual capacity of executrix and beneficiary.

As the proceedings at the trial followed the double aspect of the cause of action, the court instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiff they should render two verdicts in her favor, one in her capacity of executrix and the other in her individual capacity. The evidence, so far as we can discern, was of a character that would support one verdict as well as the other, yet the jury, curiously enough, made a discrimination and rendered a verdict against the plaintiff as beneficiary and for the plaintiff as executrix of the insured.

The plaintiff was apparently content with the opposing verdicts. The defendant insurance company was not. It sued out this writ of error, but directed it solely to that part of the judgment which holds it liable to the executrix for weekly indemnities covering the period from the date of the accident to the date of the death of the insured.

The merits of the controversy were embraced in the issues, whether there was an accident, and if so, whether the disabilities and subsequent death of the insured were solely and directly due to the accident independently of all other causes. With these issues, the defendant concedes, we have nothing to do, as they were resolved by the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff. We are concerned only with the question whether the plaintiff was precluded from maintaining this action in either of her capacities, because of the failure (astonishing as it at first appears) to give the insurance company notice of the accident until eighteen months after its occurrence.

The rights involved in this litigation are contractual, and arise from an agreement between the parties. This agreement is embodied in the policy of insurance. There the insurer undertook to indemnify the insured for the consequences of accidents, and the insured undertook to notify the insurer of any accident upon which he would make claim for indemnity. The time within which such notice should be given was indicated in the policy, and was agreed to by the insured. The giving of notice within the time stipulated therefor became an undertaking on the part of the insured, the performance of which is regarded by the law as an absolute condition precedent to the enforcement of the insurer's liability.

The provision of the policy is as follows: "Written notice must be given the company . . . of any accident or injury for which a claim is to be made, . . . within twenty-one days from the date of the accident or injury, unless the giving of such notice within such time shall not be reasonably possible, in which event such notice must be so given as soon as reasonably possible."

In inserting this provision in the policy of insurance, it is evident the insurer considered it a substantial feature of the contract and intended that its liability for indemnities should be conditioned upon compliance with it. The law views such provisions as reasonable means to be employed by insurance companies in protecting themselves against fraudulent claims, and requires that they be complied with in the manner and within the time

Insurance—
accident—provision for

agreed upon as a condition precedent to an action on the policy. But under this rule there frequently arise questions as to what constitutes compliance with such provisions, and courts are called upon to interpret their meaning. So, in this case, it becomes necessary to construe the provision in order to determine whether notice was given in compliance with its terms. The plaintiff urges that the insured, though he gave no notice of the accident, was excused for not complying with the provision because of a mental condition occasioned by the accident, which made compliance impossible. On the other hand, the defendant contends that the insured was not so excused, or, if he was, then the duty of complying with the provision devolved upon his wife, or if not upon her, then upon her niece, who were persons next to the insured and in a measure conversant with the contract of insurance and of the insured's undertaking to give notice.

These contentions, considered with reference to the evidence, raise no new questions of law. The novel feature of the case is in the application of the law to a notice of the unusual character of the one here given eighteen months after the accident.

The manifest object of providing in a contract of accident insurance for notice to be given within a time either precisely prescribed or generally defined is to afford the in-suror an opportunity promptly to inquire into the accident, and to take such steps for its protection as can only be taken shortly after its occurrence. To attain this end different insurance companies write different provisions in their policies according to their varying notions of what is necessary for their protection. Some require that the notice shall be given within a specified number of days after the accident, others that "immediate notice" be given, and still others that notice be given "as soon as possible," or "as soon as reasonably possible."

Notice within a given number of days is held by some courts, though harsh, to be unconditionally binding upon the insured, even though the giving of such notice be made impossible by the very accident insured against. Whiteside v. North American Acci. Ins. Co. 200 N. Y. 320, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, 93 N. E. 948; Roehner v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 160, 164; Heywood v. Maine Mut. Acci. Asso. 85 Me. 289, 27 Atl. 154. Other courts interpret like provisions as made by the parties in full contemplation of the possibility of the insured being rendered incapable of giving the prescribed notice by the accident insured against, and follow what now appears to be the rule, that where, because of circumstances surrounding the accident, including the mental condition of the insured as a consequence of the accident, the giving of notice within the time specified becomes impossible, it will be excused, and notice given within a reasonable time after the removal of the obstacle will be sufficient.

A discussion of these cases appears in notes to Jennings v. Brotherhood Acci. Co. 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 109, 130 Am. St. Rep. 109, and in a note to Hilmer v. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 319. As the provision in controversy does not unconditionally limit the giving of notice to a given number of days, some of the cases cited bear upon the question under discussion only as they show the drift of judicial decision from the harsh rule requiring compliance with the provision without regard to the ability of the insured to comply with it, to the more liberal rule that such provisions are made and agreed to in contemplation of the impossibility of literal compliance. Other cases cited bear directly upon the matter under discussion, in that they contain judicial interpretations of the expressions, "immediate notice," and "notice as soon as possible," found in many policies. "Immediate notice" is not construed to mean notice to be instantly given, but is construed to mean "reasonable notice," or notice to be given within a reasonable time. In this regard the defendant concedes that a provision for "immediate notice" is identical in point of law with the provision of the <sup>reasonable</sup> ~~time for notice.~~ policy in this case requiring (in the last event) that notice "be given as soon as reasonably possible." Foster v. Fidelity & C. Co. 99 Wis. 447, 40 L.R.A. 833, 75 N. W. 69. The legal meaning of both is that notice shall be given within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances of the case and upon the reasonable opportunity for giving notice which the circumstances afford the one upon whom devolves the duty of giving it.

See Fidelity & D. Co. v. Courtney, 186 U. S. 342, 346, 347, 46 L. ed. 1193, 1196, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax, 73 C. C. A. 649, 142 Fed. 653; National Surety Co. v. Western P. R. Co. 119 C. C. A. 91, 200 Fed. 675; People's Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Smith, 126 Pa. 317, 12 Am. St. Rep. 870, 17 Atl. 605; Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 46 Iowa, 631; Roseberry v. American Benev. Asso. 142 Mo. App. 552, 121 S. W. 785.

The provision in dispute contains two binding clauses and one saving clause. As we construe it, the first requires written notice of an accident within twenty-one days from the date of its occurrence. By this clause the insured is bound to give notice within the time specified, unless, as provided by the saving clause that follows, the giving of notice within that time shall not be reasonably possible. In that event, the concluding clause binds the insured to give notice as soon thereafter as is reasonably possible. In suing on a policy containing such a provision, an insured, or his legal representative, has the burden of showing performance of this condition precedent. He must show that notice was given within twenty-one days, or, failing in this, he must excuse his failure by showing that it was not reasonably possible for him to give notice within that time, and that he has complied with the remaining clause by giving notice as soon thereafter as was reasonably possible. Whether notice was not given within the initial limit of twenty-one days because it was not reasonably possible, and whether it was given as soon thereafter as was reasonably possible, this being the ultimate limit of the provision, are clearly questions of fact and ordinarily are questions for the jury. Whether such questions are for the jury or the court is determined by familiar rules. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax, 73 C. C. A. 649, 142 Fed. 653, 660.

Evidence—burden of proof—time for giving notice of accident.

Trial—question for jury—time for notice of accident.

If the facts are not controverted, or if from proven facts no doubtful inferences can be drawn as to the reasonable impossibility of the insured giving notice within twenty-one days, or as to whether he gave notice as soon thereafter as was reasonably possible, then, of course, there is nothing to submit to the jury, and the court may hold as a matter of law that the condition precedent has or has not been performed. But if the facts and circumstances are controverted, and are such as to sustain an inference that it was not reasonably possible for the insured to give notice within twenty-one days, and that the notice thereafter was given as soon as was reasonably possible, the question whether the insured has performed the condition precedent to the enforcement of the insurer's liability for indemnity is for the jury. The language of Mr. Justice Paxson, in speaking for the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in People's Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Smith, 126 Pa. 317, 12 Am. St. Rep. 870, 17 Atl. 605, is peculiarly appropriate to this discussion. He said: "A person might be so injured as to be physically unable to give notice for weeks. Hence it is that such questions are referred to the jury, to say whether, under all the circumstances, there has been an unreasonable delay in giving notice."

See National Surety Co. v. Western P. R. Co. 119 C. C. A. 91, 200 Fed. 675, 681; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax, 73 C. C. A. 649, 142 Fed. 653; Hughes v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 222 Pa. 462, 71 Atl. 923; Everson v. General Acci. F. & L. Assur. Corp. 202 Mass. 169, 88 N. E. 658 (" . . . as soon as possible").

Applying these observations to the facts of this case, startling as these facts are, we shall first inquire whether a right of action on the policy by the personal representative of the insured was lost by the failure of the insured to give notice at any time. This inquiry can readily be disposed of. The evidence upon which the jury found that injury to the insured and his death were due solely to the accident was sufficient to sustain a finding that the accident created a mental condition in the insured which made compliance with the provision of the policy impossible. The trial court squarely charged the jury that, if they found it was reasonably possible for the insured to give notice at any time, the plaintiff could not recover. The verdict was for the plaintiff, hence the verdict was a finding that it was not reasonably possible for the insured, in view of his mental condition, to give notice at any time after the accident. By this finding, the insured was excused.

Insurance—impossibility of giving notice of accident.

The next questions are whether the undertaking of the insured to give notice of the accident devolved upon his wife when he became incapable of performing it, and whether the court should have decided that question as a matter of law.

The defendant contends, upon authority of a stray dictum in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax, 73 C. C. A. 649, 142 Fed. 653, 657, that the provision of the policy required notice to be given by someone on behalf of the insured within the time prescribed, if the insured himself was not able to give the notice. The controlling fact of the Nax Case was that the insured was in full possession of his faculties for a long period after the accident, and could have given the notice, and the point of decision was that, being able to give notice, he was bound to give it, and that his failure barred recovery on the policy by his personal representative. Manifestly the Nax Case does not rule this case.

The evidence upon which the defendant bases its contention that the wife of the insured was bound to give the notice required of him is meager and unsatisfactory. The evidence tends to prove that Johnston never spoke of his accident insurance after the accident; that Mrs. Johnston knew that her husband carried a policy of accident insurance and that he kept it in a safe deposit box, the key to which was accessible; that she did not know the name of the company which issued the policy; that in September, 1914, about seven months after the accident, there was received in her husband's mail a renewal certificate in the form of a receipt for a renewal premium of $40, then due on the policy; that, accepting this certificate as a notice as well as a receipt,

Mrs. Johnston sent her check for $40 to the insurance company, inclosed in a letter showing that the check was in payment of a premium on the policy in suit; that the letter and check had been written by her niece and that she signed them at her request; and that she was wholly ignorant of the terms and conditions of the policy until after her husband's death, when she found the policy, and promptly gave notice of the accident.

From this testimony, it was possible for the jury to find two facts, first, that Mrs. Johnston knew of the existence of the policy, and second, that she was ignorant of its terms. The trial court refused to find as a matter of law that Mrs. Johnston knew the terms of the policy, and refused to hold, therefore, that she was bound by the undertaking of her husband to give notice of the accident, as a condition precedent to her action on the policy. What the court did was to leave the question of Mrs. Johnston's knowledge of the terms of the policy to the jury, under instructions that if they found that she knew the terms of the policy in the lifetime of her husband, it was her duty to give the notice, and failing so to do, she could not recover. The jury rendered a verdict for Mrs. Johnston as executrix of her husband's will, which was a finding that she did not know the terms of the policy. Clearly no duty devolved upon the wife to perform an undertaking of her husband to which she was not a party, and of which she was ignorant. Assuming, without deciding, that such a duty devolved upon her had she knowledge of her husband's undertaking, the finding by the jury that she had no such knowledge disposed of any question of her duty and left her free to maintain this action.

notice by wife.

The contention that the action was barred because the niece failed to give the notice which the policy required of the insured is no stronger than the case made against the wife; for, while the evidence showed that the niece had a wider knowledge of the business affairs of the insured, it was sufficient for the jury to find that she also was ignorant of the terms of the policy.

In showing knowledge of the terms of the policy on the part of the wife and the niece, the defendant laid stress, with no little force, upon a phrase appearing in the renewal certificate received after the accident. In this certificate were printed in conspicuous type the words: "Notify the Company at Once in Event of Accident." This direction to the insured, coming, it is assumed, within the observation of the wife and niece, is persuasive of the defendant's contention that they were thereby substantially informed of the terms of the policy, yet, opposed to this evidence, there was the testimony of the wife and niece that they were ignorant of its terms, and the jury, by accepting, reconciling, or disregarding the testimony as they chose, found that the wife and niece did not know the terms of the policy.

The finding of the jury was, in effect, that it was not reasonably possible for the insured to give notice of the accident because of his mental incapacity occasioned by the accident; and that <sup>—delay for</sup> <sup>eighteen months</sup> <sup>—effect.</sup> it was not reasonably possible for the wife and niece to give notice for him, because of their ignorance of the requirement until after his death, when, the obstacle of their ignorance being removed, notice was given as soon as reasonably possible. This finding was upon a question which the court could not avoid submitting, and was sustained by one view of the evidence. It is not within our province to say that the finding was wrong. It, therefore, concluded the defendant.

McPherson, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I agree with nearly all that has been so well said by Judge Woolley, but I regret to find myself obliged to disagree at a vital point. In my opinion the company was entitled to binding instructions, for the reason that the wife and the niece should be conclusively charged with knowledge of the company's provision for notice, and should bear the consequence of their failure to comply until nearly a year thereafter. The insured was injured in February, 1914; in September, his wife and his niece received and read the company's letter concerning the renewal of the policy, the letter bearing the words, in large type, "Notify the Company at Once in Event of Accident," and they acted on the letter by paying the premium and thus extending the policy for another year. The insured did not die until August 30, 1915, but no notice of the accident was given until September 4, a year and a half after the fall, and almost a year after the wife and the niece had learned that prompt notice of the injury was required. I do not see how a court could permit a jury to find that they did not know the contents of the letter, when concededly they opened it and read it and sent a check to the company in compliance with its contents, even referring to the policy by its number and the name of the insured. Those who receive and act upon a writing must be held to know its terms, just as a man cannot be allowed to say that he looked, but did not see a train, although he stepped directly in front of a moving car.

Moreover, no one can doubt that the wife and the niece had a right to make the payment, although they were assuming to act for the insured without his express authority, and no one can doubt that they would have been justified also in giving notice of the accident on his behalf. The closeness of the family relation is a sufficient reason, coupled with his inability to act for himself. But if the wife and the niece had these implied rights, I think they were impliedly bound to discharge the corresponding duties.

If they stood in the shoes of the insured, and were protecting the interest that he could not protect for himself, why were they not bound by the same duty that would have bound him—of course, so far only as their actual or presumed knowledge extended? In a word, the evidence seems to me conclusive that they knew what was conspicuously before their eyes, and since they knew it I think they were bound to act thereon. No doubt they had a reasonable time to act after the knowledge reached them, but under the facts of this case a year is not reasonable, and I think the court should have said so as a matter of law.

Petition for rehearing denied, January 8, 1918.

NOTE.

The question of the reasonableness of time of notice of an accident or injury within the requirement of an accident policy, as a question for the jury, is discussed in the annotation to EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORP. v. ROEHM, post, 186. The view adopted in the reported case (METROPOLITAN CASUALTY INS. CO. v. JOHNSTON, ante, 175) is in accord with the general rule laid down in the introduction in that annotation that, where there are disputed facts and circumstances concerning the reasonableness of the giving of notice of accident or injury, or there are doubtful inferences from proven facts, the question is for the jury, otherwise the question is one of law for the court. The question of delay due to incapacity to give notice, under policies providing for notice as soon as reasonably possible, or qualification "unless not reasonably possible," is covered under subd. II. subsec. c.

Plff. in Err.,
v.

JOHN ROEHM.

Ohio Supreme Court — April 2, 1919.

(— Ohio St. —, 124 N. E. 223.)

Insurance — indemnity — provision for notice.

A provision in a policy of indemnity insurance, to the effect that written notice should be given the company within thirty days from the date of sustaining the injury, is of the essence of the contract, and, like other contracts, should be construed so as to give effect to the intention and express language of the parties. This rule of law is subject to the qualification that if at the time of the accident, and within the period stipulated for the giving of notice, no reasonable ground existed warranting a belief that the injury was anything but trivial in its character, not justifying a claim for damages, and it subsequently develops that as a result of such accident serious consequences have ensued, and that immediately upon being advised of this fact the insured gives written notice to the insurer, the question whether the notice was given within time is not a matter of law, but is a question for the determination of a jury. The last clause of the fourth proposition of the syllabus in the case of Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers, 62 Ohio St. 529, 49 L.R.A. 760, 57 N. E. 458, is disapproved.

(— Ohio St. —, 124 N. E. 223.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Montgomery County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McMahon & McMahon, for plaintiff in error:

Policies of insurance, like other contracts, should be construed so as to give effect to the intention and express language of the parties.

Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers, 62 Ohio St. 529, 49 L.R.A. 760, 57 N. E. 458.

Plaintiff's ignorance of the true character of his injury did not excuse his failure to give notice within the thirty days.

Failure to comply with the notice clause in a policy of accident insurance bars the right to recover under the policy.

Messrs. Breene, Dwyer, & Finn, for defendant in error:

Where, because of circumstances and conditions surrounding the transaction, the giving of notice within the time specified became impossible, it will be excused and held sufficient if given within a reasonable time after the removal of the obstacle.

Plaintiff gave notice to defendant immediately after it became known that bodily injuries had been sustained, and that is a sufficient compliance with the stipulation in regard to notice.

Nichols, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, John Roehm, while engaged in a game of basket ball, on ——— day of June, 1914, in the city of Dayton, Ohio, was accidentally struck a hard blow in the left eye. Although immediately seeking medical treatment, neither he nor his physician apprehended any serious injury from the blow. For about ten months thereafter he attended to his ordinary business, wholly without appreciation that his sight was other than normal. Consulting another physician in April, 1915, he learned for the first time that as a direct result of such accidental blow he had lost the greater part of the vision of the injured eye. He thereupon submitted to treatment, in endeavor to save his sight; all, however, without relief, the final outcome of the affair being the entire loss of the sight of both eyes. Immediately after becoming aware of the fact that serious injury had been occasioned by the blow, due notice was given the insurance company.

At the time the defendant in error met with the accident he was the holder of a policy in the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, which insured him "against bodily injuries during the term of the policy." This policy contained the following provision on the subject of notice: "No claim shall be valid on account of any injuries, fatal or otherwise, unless written notice is given to the company within thirty days from the date of sustaining any injuries, fatal or otherwise (unless such notice may be shown not to have been reasonably possible), for which claim is to be made."

In August, 1917, within a month of the time that full knowledge was available as to the ultimate extent of the injury, action was entered in the common pleas court of Montgomery county to recover on the policy.

The insurance company demurred to the petition, its position being that since the petition showed that notice was not given of the happening of the accident within the time stipulated by the policy, namely thirty days, the plaintiff was without remedy.

From the time the blow on the eye was received until the serving of the notice, a period of quite ten months elapsed, so unless circumstances are disclosed constituting a legal excuse for failure to serve notice sooner, and within the period of thirty days, the demurrer to the petition was properly sustained by the court of common pleas of Montgomery county.

The only excuse recognized by the company for failure to serve notice is that the service of such notice was not reasonably possible. It is claimed by the company that this excusing clause has no relation to the injury itself, or its nature and extent, but relates wholly to some condition that the insured might have found himself in at the time—for instance, continued delirium, or some state of mind that would have rendered him practically unaccountable in law for his conduct. It refuses to recognize that any uncertainty as to the extent of the injury, or even the belief on the part of the insured that the injury was so insignificant that he did not want to dignify it by presenting a claim therefor, constitutes any excuse under this clause for failure to give notice.

The position of the defendant in error is that his conduct was entirely consistent with the attitude of a reasonable and prudent man; that, so long as he was unaware that any consequence of a serious nature was to be apprehended, he had decided to refrain from presenting a claim, and therefore notice was unnecessary; and that it was only when the truth had forced itself on his attention that the very serious effect soon thereafter realized to the fullest was likely to follow that he felt he had a valid claim under the policy, and that then he immediately gave the required notice.

The question for determination is: Do the facts alleged in the petition justify the holding that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff is to be denied recovery, or are they such as to require the submission of the cause to a jury for its solution?

We are of opinion that the failure of the plaintiff to notify the company of the fact that he had suffered a blow over the eye, within the thirty-day period, will not necessarily operate to defeat a recovery. His conduct between the day that the blow was inflicted and the day that the indemnity—provision for

terrible possibility fell on him like a thunderbolt was highly commendable, if not exceptional. It showed a high regard for the rights of the insurance company, for all too often very slight injuries are made the basis of a claim for indemnity. It would seem a poor reward for virtue, if conduct of this character were to be made the groundwork for a successful defense against recovery for a grievous loss. It would penalize a decent regard for the rights of others and put a premium on that sort of conduct that carries insurance for profit rather than protection.

It would seem quite clear that the entire lack of knowledge, or even apprehension, on Roehm's part, that any serious result was to follow from the accidental blow, creates a condition fairly within the terms of the policy excusing notice. At no time within the period of ten months would it have been possible for him to give notice of a state of facts entirely unknown to and unsuspected by himself.

It is recognized in every jurisdiction that provisions as to notice must be reasonably construed; indeed, the authorities generally hold that such provisions should be liberally construed in favor of the insured. Much the greater weight of authority outside of Ohio supports the doctrine that notice given immediately after the extent of the injury is brought to the knowledge of the insured is a compliance with the requirement that notice must be given within a time reasonably possible after the happening of the accident.

In the case of Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ohle, 120 Md. 371, 87 Atl. 763, the court held in effect that, under a clause in an accident insurance policy which required notice of injury to be given as soon as might be reasonably possible, a notice given by a physician of loss of sight, due to infection during an operation, five months after the injury was received, but as soon as he learned that his sight was destroyed, was sufficient.

Practically the same doctrine was announced by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of People's Mut. Acci. Co. v. Smith, 126 Pa. 317, 12 Am. St. Rep. 870, 17 Atl. 605. Similar views were evidently held by the supreme court of Nebraska, as announced in the case of Midland Glass & Paint Co. v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. 102 Neb. 349, L.R.A.1918D, 442, 167 N. W. 211.

In the case at bar there is no charge of fraud or claim of bad faith, nor can there be any pretense that the delay in giving notice was prejudicial to the insurer. Neither can it be urged that there are not circumstances tending to justify the delay.

In these vital respects this case is to be distinguished from the case of Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers, 62 Ohio St. 529, 49 L.R.A. 760, 57 N. E. 458, upon which authority the plaintiff in error chiefly relies.

Notwithstanding this difference in fact we are of opinion that the conclusion we have reached in the case at bar will necessitate the overruling of the fourth proposition advanced in the syllabus of the Myers Case, supra. Our disagreement is not, of course, with the first paragraph of the proposition in question, for we are now holding that the question of compliance with terms of the notice may depend upon the circumstances of the case. We are, however, out of harmony with the view that, in a case of the character under investigation, with its attendant circumstances, where the facts are not disputed, what is a sufficient compliance with the policy requirements as to notice is a question of law. On the contrary, we feel that the insured has a right to have a jury pass on the question, and determine whether the circumstances of this particular case did not justify and excuse his conduct in failing to give the notice called for by the policy until he actually became aware that his eyesight was seriously affected.

We find authority supporting our conclusion herein in the second proposition of the syllabus of the case of Hickman v. Ohio State L. Ins. Co. 92 Ohio St. 87, 110 N. E. 542. That case, like the one at bar, was one involving the right to recover on an accident insurance policy. The policy provided that in the event the insured exposed himself to obvious risk of injury, or obvious danger, the company's liability should be but one fifth the face of the policy. The litigation was centered around the question whether the insured had so exposed himself. The court of appeals of Cuyahoga county held that since the facts in the matter were substantially undisputed it became the duty of the court to determine the issue as a matter of law, and denied the right of a jury to pass on the question of fact. This court reversed the court of appeals, holding, in the second proposition of the syllabus: "When, in such an action, an issue of fact is made by the pleadings as to whether the injury to the insured resulted while he was exposing himself to a risk or danger which was obvious to him at the time, and there is no substantial conflict in the testimony of the witnesses on the trial, but the conflicting testimony discloses a variety of circumstances from which different minds might reasonably arrive at different conclusions as to that issue, it is the duty of the court to submit the determination of it to the jury."

So, in the instant case, the question as to whether it was reasonably possible for Roehm to notify the company as to the injuries sustained, at a period of time earlier than that employed by him, and within the thirty days mentioned in the policy, is one about which different minds might reasonably arrive at different conclusions.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the Court of Common Pleas of Montgomery County, with instructions to overrule the demurrer of the insurance company, and for further proceedings according to law.

Scope.

It is to be observed that this note is not concerned with the question of substantive law as to what amounts to a compliance with the requirements of the contract in regard to notice of accident or injury, but, with an occasional exception, is confined to cases in which the court expressly considers the point whether the question is for the court or the jury.

I. Introductory.

It is a general rule that where there are disputed facts and circumstances concerning the reasonableness of the giving of notice of accident or injury, or there are doubtful inferences from proven facts, the question is one for the jury; otherwise, the question is one of law for the court.

The court in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax (Fed.) supra, said: "The only remaining matter to consider is, Should the question whether the stipulation for immediate notice had been complied with have been submitted to the jury, or should peremptory instructions to find for the defendant on this point have been given by the court? If in the trial in the court below there had been, as to this point, any disputed facts or doubtful inferences from proven facts, they should, of course, have been submitted to the determination of the jury; but where, as in this case, there are no disputed facts, but simply an admitted failure of the insured, or of anyone on his behalf, to give the immediate written notice stipulated for in the policy, for a period of seventy-two days, without any satisfactory explanation of such failure, there was no question at all to be submitted to the jury, and the court, as a matter of law, should have found that the stipulation had not been legally complied with. This view of the situation should have been manifested by the court, by peremptory instructions to find for the defendant."

II. Where there is provision for notice as soon as reasonably possible, or qualification "unless not reasonably possible."

a. Delay due to uncertainty as to extent of injury.

It will be observed that in EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY ASSUR. CORP. v. ROEHM (reported herewith) ante, 182, where the accident policy provided that no claim should be valid on account of any injuries unless notice was given within thirty days from the date of injuries, unless such notice might be shown not to have been reasonably possible, and it appeared that the insured's eye was injured, but for ten months afterward he believed his injury to be trivial, and when he first became aware of its seriousness immediately gave notice, it was held that the question whether the notice was given within the time required by the policy was not one of law, but was a question for the determination of the jury.

And in Fidelity & C. Ins. Co. v. Mountcastle (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 200 S. W. 862, where an accident policy provided for written notice of accidents as soon as reasonably possible, and a statute provided that a stipulation in a policy fixing the time for notice at less than ninety days should be void, it was held that the court could not say, as a matter of law, that under the circumstances the delay in giving notice of an accident was an unreasonable one, although written notice was not given for about sixteen months, there being evidence that it was uncertain during this time as to the extent of the injury, and that shortly after the accident the insured gave verbal notice to the insurer's local agent, who agreed to make a report to the general agent of the company, and that some months afterward he again talked with the local agent about making a claim, but was dissuaded by the agent's statement that he probably could not get the policy renewed, at the insured's age, if he made a claim, and that subsequently, after a renewal, the agent stated that the company would pay the insured's doctor's bills if he would furnish the receipted bills, and these were furnished, and were paid by the company.

In Sheafor v. Standard Acci. Ins. Co. (1918) 166 Wis. 498, 166 N. W. 4, it was held, apparently as a matter of law, that notice was given as soon as reasonably possible within the requirements of a policy providing for notice of injuries within twenty days after the date of the accident causing the injury, unless it was shown not to have been reasonably possible to give such notice within the time provided, and that in such case notice should be given as soon as reasonably possible, it appearing that the insured sustained an injury to his eye which eventually caused the loss of the sight thereof, and that immediate notice was given as soon as the insured obtained knowledge that the injury was the result of the accident.

In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ohle (1913) 120 Md. 371, 87 Atl. 763, where recovery for the loss of sight was sought under a policy providing for notice of injury "as soon as may be reasonably possible, of any injury for which a claim is to be made," and there was testimony that the insured, a physician, while performing an operation was infected, and that within two weeks the poison developed to some extent on his hand, and in about six months a disease of the eyes resulted, and about seventeen months after the injury he suffered the loss of the sight of one eye and the partial loss of the other, and then gave notice of the injury, a verdict returned by the jury for the plaintiff was affirmed, the court stating that under the circumstances the notice was sufficient, but saying nothing expressly as to whether the question of the reasonableness of the notice was one of law or fact.

In Hummer v. Midland Casualty Co. (1914) 181 Mich. 386, 148 N. W. 413, where the policy provided for notice of accident as soon as possible, it was held that the court should have instructed the jury that the plaintiff did not give notice as soon as possible, and that it was not for the jury to determine whether notice was given as required by the policy, there being evidence that the insured delayed for nearly five months to give any notice that he had suffered an accidental injury to his eye, although he had notice before that time that the injury was serious, and after about a month was able to be about the house and look after some of his business affairs.

b. Delay due to uncertainty as to whether injury or death was the result of accident.

Where a policy provided for written notice of an accident as soon as reasonably possible, and it appeared that the insured accidentally fell into an excavation and sustained injuries which in course of time resulted in his being paralyzed, but for eleven months he was advised that his condition was due to disease instead of the accident, although he at all times attributed his condition to the accident, but failed to give any notice of its happening until eleven months thereafter, it was held as a matter of law that the notice was not given within the time provided for in the policy. Hefner v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 330.

In Tromblee v. North American Acci. Ins. Co. (1916) 173 App. Div. 174, 158 N. Y. Supp. 1014, where there was a provision for notice of accident "as soon as may be reasonably possible," it was held that the court properly refused to hold as a matter of law that the notice was not timely, there being evidence that the beneficiary did not realize for some time that the insured's death resulted from the injury, and that she mailed notice to the insurer's local agent about twenty days after the insured's death, and it was forwarded and admitted to be received by the company three days later.

In METROPOLITAN CASUALTY INS. CO. v. JOHNSTON (reported herewith) ante, 175, where an accident policy provided for notice of any accident or injury within twenty-one days, unless the giving of such notice in such time should not be reasonably possible, in which event notice should be given as soon as reasonably possible, and there was evidence that the accident sustained by insured created a mental condition which made the giving of notice by him possible, and that no notice was given until eighteen months after the accident occurred and after the insured's death, the question of compliance with the provision was left to the jury, and a finding that it was not reasonably possible for the insured to give notice of his injury was held sustained by the evidence, and a verdict for the plaintiff was affirmed.

And in Higgins v. Midland Casualty Co. (1917) 281 Ill. 431, 118 N. E. 11, where the accident policy provided for written notice of accidents as soon as possible after their occurrence, and there was evidence that the insured suffered a sunstroke and shortly thereafter was confined to his bed, and later taken to a hospital, and as a result of the accident he suffered a complete physical and mental breakdown from which he never recovered, and that no notice of the accident was given for more than a year, when the insured's wife, who was appointed conservator, within ten days of her appointment gave notice of the accident, it was held a question for the jury as to whether or not the notice was given within a reasonable time, taking into consideration all of the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, and that the court was not justified to direct a verdict by the jury upon this question.

And in Columbian Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller (1913) 140 Ga. 346, 78 S. E. 1079, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 408, it was held that the court could not say as a matter of law that notice had been given in accordance with a provision of an accident policy, providing for notice to the company as soon as reasonably possible after the occurrence of an accident causing bodily injury or death, but that the question was properly left to the jury as to whether the notice had been given as soon as reasonably possible under the circumstances of the case, there being evidence tending to show that prior to and immediately after the death of the insured, who was found dead in the bathroom, which was filled with gas, the plaintiff was sick and in a nervous state of health, and consequently did not give the notice for eighteen days.

In Everson v. General Acci. F. & Life Assur. Corp. (1909) 202 Mass. 169, 88 N. E. 648, where it appeared that the insured was injured at a lonely camp in New Brunswick by severely burning one of his hands in such a manner as to require its amputation two days later, that he was far from home and kindred, and that notice was sent on the fourth day after the injury, it was held sufficiently favorable to the defendant to leave it to the jury to say, in view of the circumstances and inferences reasonably to be drawn from them, whether the notice was sent "as soon as may be possible," within a requirement of the policy.

III. Where there is provision for immediate notice, or notice at once.

a. Delay due to uncertainty as to extent of injury.

In People's Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Smith (1889) 126 Pa. 317, 12 Am. St. Rep. 870, 17 Atl. 605, where the policy provided for immediate notice of injury, and there was evidence that the insured was struck in the eye by the lash of his whip, and was treated by several physicians for a month before he ascertained that he would lose the sight of his eye, and at the end of that time he gave notice of the injury, and made a claim for the loss of the sight of his eye, the question whether notice was given within a proper time was left for the jury, the court said: "It is true the delay in such cases may be as great as to justify the court in ruling it, as a question of law. There was no such delay in the case at hand, however. The word 'immediate' in the contract must be construed to mean within a reasonable time thereafter under all the facts and circumstances of the case, and what is a reasonable time must be decided by the jury unless . . . the delay has been so great that the court may rule it as a question of law."

And in Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald (1905) 165 Ind. 317, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422, 112 Am. St. Rep. 232, 75 N. E. 262, 6 Ann. Cas. 551, where the accident policy involved required immediate notice of injury, and notice of an injury was not given until about thirty days after its happening, the question whether it was given within a reasonable time was held for the jury, in view of evidence that his injury resulted from placing his hand under his head while asleep, and gradually developed into a condition necessitating an operation and causing a protracted illness.

And in Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (1877) 46 Iowa, 631, where the policy provided for immediate notice of accidents, the question whether the insured gave notice within a proper time was held for the jury, there being testimony tending to show that after his injury the insured was treated at one place for eight or nine days, when he went to his home in another town, where he continued treatment for eight or ten days more, when he called in a physician who treated him from four to six weeks, and evidence that the disability continued for nine weeks. It was conceded in this case that the question of due diligence in giving notice is ordinarily one for the jury, but it was claimed that under the facts and circumstances, which were not in dispute, the question became one of law.

In American Acci. Ins. Co. v. Norment (1891) 91 Tenn. 1, 18 S. W. 395, where the policy provided for immediate written notice of an accident at the home office of the insurer, it was held that a jury might find that the notice had been given within a reasonable time, there being evidence that the seriousness of an injury did not at once develop, and that notice was given to the insurer's local agent about six or eight weeks after the injury occurred, and that the agent gave the insurer written notice of the accident at its home office.

In Young v. Railway Mail Asso. (1907) 126 Mo. App. 325, 103 S. W. 557, where the policy provided for notice at once of any injury, the court stated that immediate notice means notice within a reasonable time, and that the evidence showed that notice was given in a reasonable time, there being testimony that at the time the plaintiff met with an accident he did not realize the seriousness of his injury, or that it would prevent him from following his occupation, until something like a week after it occurred, and that he then gave notice. There is nothing expressly said in this case, however, as to whether the question is one of law or one of fact.

b. Delay owing to uncertainty whether injury or death was the result of accident.

In Hughes v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. (1909) 222 Pa. 462, 71 Atl. 923, the question whether the insured had complied with a provision for immediate written notice of an accident was held for the jury, where there was evidence that while on a train a cinder struck his eye, causing temporary pain which disappeared in the morning, but that several weeks thereafter an impairment of the vision occurred, and a cataract followed, which, six weeks after the cinder struck his eye, the doctors determined resulted therefrom, and the insured then gave notice of his injury. The court said: "Appellant complains that the delay in notifying the company was so great that the court should have decided it as a matter of law adversely to the plaintiff. It has been repeatedly ruled, in actions under policies requiring immediate notice to be given of the accident, that the word 'immediate' is to be construed as meaning a reasonable time after the accident, under the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Cases arise where the delay has been so great that the court is fully justified in ruling it as a matter of law; but this occurs only where the admitted facts and circumstances disclose nothing by way of extenuation or excuse. Where the facts are sufficient to account in some measure for the delay, without reflecting upon the diligence or good faith of the assured, it is for the jury to say whether the delay was reasonable or not under the circumstances."

In Ewing v. Commercial Travelers' Mut. Acci. Asso. (1900) 55 App. Div. 241, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1056, affirmed without opinion in (1902) 170 N. Y. 590, 63 N. E. 1116, where the policy contained a provision for immediate notice of accident or injury, with full particulars thereof, and there was evidence that the beneficiary, at the time of the insured's death, did not know the cause thereof, and it was not known that death resulted from accidental injury until after the report of a chemist, who made an analysis of the insured's organs, and that as soon as the result was made known, which was about two weeks after the insured's death, he immediately gave the insurer notice. The court stated that, assuming this evidence to be correct, it might properly be held as a matter of law that the notice given fully complied with the condition of the policy, and that as a question of fact the jury, which found a verdict for the plaintiff, seemed to have reached the right conclusion.

In Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Bethel (1910) 140 Ky. 609, 131 S. W. 523, where the accident policy involved provided for immediate notice of any accident, it was held that a reasonable time was allowed in which to give notice, and that what is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances in the case, and is a question of fact for the jury, and an averment by the beneficiary in this case was held sufficient, which stated that as soon as she learned of the cause of the insured's death and of the insurer's liability, she gave notice of the accident on a specified day, which was about three months after the accident occurred.

In Coldham v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1894) 2 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 314, where the policy required immediate notice of an accident, and, although the beneficiary had knowledge that the insured fell upon an icy sidewalk and died two days later from the effects thereof, she did not know that the fall was accidental, and failed to give notice for thirteen months, and until she learned that the injury was accidental, it was held as a matter of law that such notice was not, under the circumstances, a compliance with the condition requiring immediate notice. The court stated that the words "immediate and forthwith," as used in provisions for notice of injury, are construed to mean, under all the circumstances of the case, a reasonable time, and that ordinarily what is a reasonable time is a question of fact for the jury, unless upon the undisputed facts the delay has been so great that the court can rule upon it as a matter of law.

In Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Fletcher (1891) 5 Ohio C. C. 633, 3 Ohio C. D. 308, where an accident policy provided for immediate notice of an accident or injury, and that a failure to give such immediate notice within ten days should invalidate a claim, and there was evidence that the insured, who sustained an accidental injury to his eye, was rendered delirious by his injury, and was kept under the influence of opiates for several weeks, and gave no notice to the insurer for about eight weeks, it was held that the question whether the insured had exercised due diligence in view of all the circumstances was a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and that, taking into consideration the condition of the insured, it could not be said that the jury were not justified in finding that immediate notice of the accident, in compliance with the provision, was given.

And the facts in Curran v. National L. Ins. Co. (1916) 251 Pa. 420, 96 Atl. 1041, were held not to warrant the court saying, as a matter of law, that immediate written notice of an accident was not given, where the plaintiff testified that the policy was in the possession of the person injured, and that the plaintiff was so prostrated by the accident that for some time he thought nothing of insurance, and when he finally located the policy and determined that the loss was covered by it, which was about two months after the injury, he gave notice thereof.

In American Acci. Co. v. Card (1897) 13 Ohio C. C. 154, 7 Ohio C. D. 504, where the policy provided for immediate written notice of an accident, and it appeared that the insured's wife, who was the beneficiary and also his administratrix, had no knowledge of the existence of the policy for about four months after the accident and the insured's death, when she immediately gave written notice, it was held that the court should not, as a matter of law, have instructed the jury that upon the facts, immediate notice was not given within the meaning of the policy, and that the question whether the provision as to notice of the accident had been complied with was properly submitted to the jury.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nax (1905) 73 C. C. A. 649, 142 Fed. 653, where the policy provided for weekly indemnities to the insured in case of accidental injury, and also for the payment of a certain sum to a named beneficiary if death resulted within a specified time, provided immediate written notice of any accident or injury should be given to the insurer, it was held as a matter of law that notice was not given within a reasonable time, and that a verdict in an action by the beneficiary should have been directed for the insurer, there being testimony that, although the insured was perfectly conscious and able to talk of his affairs, no notice of the accident was given by him or anyone during the seventy-two days between the occurrence of the accident and the date of his death. The court stated that if, in the trial of the case, there had been any disputed facts or doubtful inferences from proven facts, they should have been submitted to the determination of the jury, but that where, as in the case at bar, there were no undisputed facts, but simply an admitted failure of the insured, or of anyone on his behalf, to give immediate notice as stipulated for in the policy, for a period of seventy-two days, without any satisfactory explanation of such failure, there was no question at all to be submitted to the jury, and that the trial court, as a matter of law, should have found that the stipulation had not been legally complied with.

And in Dunshee v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1904) 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 559, where the accident policy involved provided for immediate written notice of any accident or injury, and the insured delayed for over four months giving notice of the injury, although he was able during this time to transact business and to have given notice, it was held, apparently as a matter of law, that notice was not given within a reasonable time, and that no recovery could be had on the policy.

And in Hatch v. United States Casualty Co. (1908) 197 Mass. 101, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 508, 125 Am. St. Rep. 332, 83 N. E. 398, 14 Ann. Cas. 290, where there was a provision for written notice within ten days of the event causing injury, and it appeared that although the insured, after he sustained an injury, was in his usual health for about a month, when he was confined to his bed and died four days after, he gave no notice of the injury, and that none was given until the beneficiary sent notice of death, it was held, apparently as matter of law, that there could be no recovery on the policy; that by failing to give notice according to his contract insured gave up his right to hold the company liable, and that after his death it was not within the power of the beneficiary to revive the right lost.

And in Foster v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1898) 99 Wis. 447, 40 L.R.A. 833, 75 N. W. 69, the court held, as a matter of law, that immediate notice of an accident was not given, where the evidence showed that the beneficiary knew that the insured's death was accidental within twelve days after it occurred, but did not give notice for twenty-nine days thereafter. The court stated that, where the facts are uncertain or disputed and the inferences doubtful, the question whether timely notice was given is one for the jury under a proper instruction, but that, where the facts are not in dispute and the inferences are certain, it is a question of law for the court.

And in Accident Ins. Co. v. Young (1891) 20 Can. S. C. 280, it was held, apparently as a matter of law, that there was no compliance with a provision of a policy for immediate notice of any accident or injury, there being evidence that notice of an accident and death was not sent until one month and eight days after the accident, and sixteen days after the insured's death, and that it was not received at the insurer's home office until three days after it was sent.

And in Myers v. Maryland Casualty Co. (1907) 123 Mo. App. 682, 101 S. W. 124, the court stated that, without a showing of good cause therefor, the failure of the insured to give notice until six weeks after an injury, in law, constituted a breach of the condition requiring the giving of immediate notice.

And the complaint in Railway Pass. Assur. Co. v. Burwell (1873) 44 Ind. 460, was held defective, where the action was on an accident policy requiring immediate notice of injury, and the complaint alleged that notice was given six days after an injury was received, and there was no averment of any legal and proper excuse for not having given the notice sooner. Nothing was specifically said as to whether the question was one of law or a question for the jury.

In Horsfall v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1903) 32 Wash. 132, 63 L.R.A. 425, 98 Am. St. Rep. 846, 72 Pac. 1028, where the evidence showed that the beneficiary of an accident policy caused notice of the accident to be sent to the insurer on the twelfth day after the insured's death, it was held that the court properly submitted to the jury the question whether notice was given within a reasonable time within a condition of the policy requiring immediate notice of an accident.

IV. Where policy provides for notice within specified number of days.

a. Delay due to uncertainty whether accident caused injury.

In United States Casualty Co. v. Hanson (1905) 20 Colo. App. 393, 79 Pac. 176, a failure to give notice of an injury for about eight months was held not to preclude a recovery because of noncompliance with a provision of the policy, requiring written notice within ten days of the event causing the accident, where it appeared from the facts that the insured believed that his trouble resulted from rheumatism, and gave prompt notice after he was informed by a physician that his illness resulted from the accident. The question was apparently decided as one of law, but without discussion.

In Trippe v. Provident Fund Soc. (1893) 3 Misc. 445, 23 N. Y. Supp. 173, affirmed in (1893) 140 N. Y. 23, 22 L.R.A. 432, 37 Am. St. Rep. 529, 35 N. E. 316, where the policy provided that notice of any accidental injury should be given within ten days from the date either of injury or death, and it appeared that insured was tenant in a building that fell, and that he was buried in the debris, and that his body was not discovered and taken from the fallen building for three days, and that notice of injury and death was given eleven days after the accident and eight days after the body was found, it was held that, the facts respecting the accident and death being undisputed, the question of what construction should be given to the provision was one clearly of law for the court, and a holding that the notice was sufficient was sustained.

Where the insured was accidentally burned, and as a result was mentally incapacitated, and because of the necessary use of opiates was unconscious for nearly three weeks, when notice was given, it was held that the facts were sufficient in law to excuse him from complying with a provision of the policy for notice within ten days. Roseberry v. American Benev. Asso. (1909) 142 Mo. App. 552, 121 S. W. 785.

In Woodman Acci. Asso. v. Pratt (1901) 62 Neb. 673, 55 L.R.A. 291, 89 Am. St. Rep. 777, 87 N. W. 546, where the policy required notice within ten days of the occurrence of an accident, and the evidence showed that the insured, by reason of an accidental fall, sustained a concussion of the brain, and for a period of three or four months was more or less deranged, and notice was not given of the accident for over forty days, the question whether it was given within a reasonable time was held to be properly submitted to the jury, and the evidence was held to be sufficient to sustain the jury's finding that notice was given within a reasonable time.

In Graves v. United Commercial Travelers (1917) 165 Wis. 427, 162 N. W. 425, where the policy provided that in case of accidental injury the insured should, within ten days, send a written notice to the insurer, and that failure to send such notice should constitute a waiver of the claim, and it appeared that the insured sustained a slight injury, supposed at first to be trivial, but that on the ninth day after suffering the injury he knew that it was serious, and although he was able to give the notice within the ten days he failed to do so, it was held, apparently as a matter of law, that he could not recover on the policy.

In Mellen v. United States Health & Acci. Ins. Co. (1910) 83 Vt. 242, 75 Atl. 273, where the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that he sustained an accidental injury, and that a few days later he visited a certain doctor and asked him to notify the insurer of the injury, and that the doctor did so, it was held a question for the jury whether such notice was sent within twenty days from the date of the accident, as required by the policy, and that it could not, therefore, be disposed of by the court. CENTRAL AMUSEMENT COMPANY, Impleaded, etc.

(224 Mass. 344, 112 N. E. 857.)

Landlord and tenant — liability of landlord for nuisance — fall of ornament from building.

1. The owner of a building which has a continuing nuisance in the form of an unsafe ornament overhanging the sidewalk does not relieve himself from liability for injury to a pedestrian by its fall by letting the building to a tenant.

Nuisance — ornament overhanging sidewalk.

2. An ornament attached to the front of a building adjoining a sidewalk, which is constructed of materials which will disintegrate under the influence of the weather, and which is not properly fastened to the building, is a continuing nuisance.

[See 4 R. C. L. 408, 409; 20 R. C. L. 433.]

Appeal — improper joinder of parties.

3. Joining landlord and tenant in an action for injury to a pedestrian by the fall of an ornament from the leased building is not reversible error if the tenant was eliminated from the case by the verdict of the jury.

Parties — improper joinder — who may complain.

4. The landlord against whom a judgment is entered for injury to a pedestrian by the fall of an ornament from his building cannot complain that his tenant was joined in the action.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant Central Amusement Company to rulings of the Superior Court for Essex County (Quinn, J.) made during the trial of actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries to the feme plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence, which resulted in a verdict for the defendant operating company, and for plaintiffs against the excepting defendant. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The rulings asked for by the defendant Central Amusement Company, and which the judge refused to make, were as follows:

"1. Upon all the evidence the plaintiff cannot recover in the above action.

"2. Upon the allegations in the plaintiff's declaration the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.

"3. Upon the evidence in the case the defendant was not negligent.

"4. If the jury find that the piece of stucco actually fell, as alleged, the cause of its falling, upon the evidence, is conjectural and is as consistent with due care on the part of the defendant as with lack of due care."

"6. If the fall of the piece of stucco was caused by the lack of proper securing of the concrete ornaments on the wall, and the defendant had no notice of this, but had intrusted the work to a competent contractor, the defendant is not liable for the stucco work falling."

"9. The evidence introduced in the case does not sustain the allegations in the declaration."

Messrs. James T. Connolly, Damon E. Hall, and M. J. Mulkern, for defendant Amusement Company:

If the piece that broke contained a sumed that the 2d and 9th requests should have been given, that affords the present defendant no ground for complaint. Nothing stands in the way of entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the present defendant. Where two or more are sued jointly and the action is not discontinued against any, "taking judgment against one not only operates as a discontinuance, but constitutes a bar to obtaining judgment against the others." Cameron v. Kanrich, 201 Mass. 451, 452, 87 N. E. 605. There is nothing in Contakis v. Flavio, 221 Mass. 259, 108 N. E. 1045, inconsistent with this conclusion. The technical difficulty about the entirety of a joint judgment has no application to proceedings before judgment. Munroe v. Carlisle, 176 Mass. 199, 201, 57 N. E. 332. It is not necessary to consider whether Stat. 1913, chap. 716, is pertinent. The defendant has suffered no harm. Smith v. Com. 210 Mass. 259, 262, 96 N. E. 666, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1236.

4. There were exceptions to portions of the judge's charge, and to the admission of evidence. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss these in detail; we have considered them and discover no reversible error.

Exceptions overruled.

NOTE.

The question considered in the reported case (HOWARD v. CENTRAL AMUSEMENT Co. ante, 195), as to liability for injury to person in street by fall of part of structure of completed building is considered in the annotation following HOWARD v. REDDEN, post, 204.

v.

WILLIAM H. REDDEN et al.

(93 Conn. 604, 107 Atl. 509.)

Negligence — fall of cornice into street — liability of contractor.

1. A contractor who constructs a cornice upon a building is not liable for injury to a pedestrian by its fall onto the sidewalk beneath it through the negligence of the owner of the building in permitting the fastenings to rust and rot away.

Nuisance — cornice over sidewalk.

2. The construction upon a building of a cornice overhanging a sidewalk is not a nuisance because time may cause the fastenings to rust or rot and permit the cornice to fall upon the walk.

Proximate cause — fall of cornice into street — injury to pedestrian.

3. The erection of a cornice over a sidewalk is not the proximate cause of injury to a pedestrian by its fall because of the rusting and rotting of its fastenings.

Pleading — allegation of proximate cause — conclusion.

4. An allegation in a petition to recover damages for injuries that each and every act, omission, and neglect stated was a proximate cause of the injury, without the operation of which the injury would not have occurred, is a mere legal conclusion, and adds nothing to the allegations of fact in the petition.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New London County (Keeler and Maltbie, JJ.) in favor of defendant Gilbey, in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate by a falling cornice, for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. No error.

Statement by Gager, J.:

Action to recover damages for death caused by a falling cornice, brought against the builder Gilbey, and the owner Redden, to the superior court for New London county, and tried to the court, Keeler, J., upon demurrer of Gilbey to the substituted complaint. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant Gilbey, from which judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The material facts, abbreviated from the substituted complaint, are alleged as follows:

Redden owned a four-story brick building fronting on Bank street, a much-used street in New London; the front wall of the building being built upon the boundary line between the lot and Bank street. Upon the top of the front wall was a wooden cornice 3 feet wide, and 36 feet long, overhanging the sidewalk, and weighing 800 pounds. The defendant Gilbey built this cornice for Redden. It was carelessly, negligently, and insecurely fastened to the wall, was unsafe and liable to fall by its own weight, and by reason of such liability was intrinsically dangerous to persons passing on Bank street. The defendants did not use beams and bolts of sufficient size and strength in fastening the cornice to the wall, but negligently nailed the cornice with wire and cut nails of small and insufficient size, to weak and insufficient furring strips, which strips were carelessly nailed to weak and insufficient pieces of timber built into the wall. The cornice was covered by a tin roof, carelessly flashed to the brick wall so that rainwater ran under it and rotted away the woodwork and furring strips, and rusted away the nails.

The cornice was so constructed by said Gilbey that it would, by natural action of the elements and from natural causes alone, and by reason of its own weight and insecure fastening, fall to the sidewalk.

The tin roof by natural causes became worn and rusted, and rainwater and other elements leaked into the cornice and rotted the woodwork and furring strips on the inner side of the cornice, and rusted away the nails by which the cornice was fastened to said furring strips and building.

The defendant Redden negligently and carelessly failed and neglected to inspect the cornice to determine its condition, and negligently and carelessly failed and omitted to remove the cornice from said building.

Because of the said negligences, acts, and omissions of the defendants, the cornice on September 16, 1917, fell from its place on the front of said building upon this plaintiff's intestate, then lawfully traveling on said highway in the exercise of due care and caution, and so injuring him that he died about an hour and a half after being struck.

The plaintiff further alleged:

Each of the acts, negligences, and omissions of the defendants contributed to the fall of said cornice, and each of said acts, negligences, and omissions was a proximate and efficient cause, without the operation of which the falling of the cornice would not have happened.

To this complaint the defendant Gilbey demurred for the following reasons:

(1) The defendant George Gilbey was under no duty to the plaintiff for the reason that his contract to build was with the owner of the land and building, William H. Redden, and said building and cornice were constructed and completed long before the injury to the plaintiff.

(2) Because the negligence of the defendant George Gilbey was not the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, but was consequential and remote.

(3) Because the defendant George Gilbey had made no representations to the plaintiff that said cornice was safe or properly constructed, had no contractual or other relations with him, and had no occupation of said building or control over it or duty toward it at the time of said accident, and for a long time prior to that.

(4) Because it appears that there is no causal connection between the negligence of the defendant George Gilbey and the injury to the plaintiff.

(5) Because it does not appear from the complaint that the defendant George Gilbey owed any duty to the plaintiff.

The demurrer was sustained, the plaintiff refused to plead further, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant Gilbey. The plaintiff appeals, assigning error in sustaining the demurrer.

Gager, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint is somewhat obscure, and it requires close inspection accurately to get at the real relation of the various acts set forth.

The only connection the defendant Gilbey had with the cornice is that at some time he constructed the cornice for defendant Redden, owner of the building. For some reason—probably because it would not help the plaintiff's case—the complaint contains no allegation of time, except that Redden owned the building on the day of the accident. The complaint necessarily imports, however, that at some considerable time prior to the accident Redden owned the building, and that he then employed Gilbey to construct the cornice. We do not think that counsel for the plaintiff would claim that in the climate of New London tin roofs and nails rust out and woodwork rots over night. It takes a considerable period of time, probably some years, for such rusting and rotting as to render these materials useless or insufficient for building purposes. At any rate, it appears, and is so alleged in the complaint, that the cornice remained in place until by natural causes, rainwater and other elements, the rusting and rotting took place, with the final result that, due to such rusting and rotting, the cornice fell; and it further appears, and is so alleged, that defendant Redden failed and neglected to inspect the cornice to determine its condition, and failed and neglected to remove the cornice. Whether Gilbey in doing the work was acting as independent contractor or as the servant of Redden does not clearly appear. We assume that it is intended to hold Gilbey as a contractor. It is not alleged that Gilbey had anything whatever to do with the building after the construction of the cornice. The necessary inference of fact is that he did not. His is the ordinary case of a contractor or carpenter doing a job upon a building at the request of the owner, and thereafter having nothing to do with it. It is further to be presumed, from the acceptance and use necessarily implied from the other allegations of the complaint, that the cornice was constructed as the owner directed, or at least to his satisfaction. Whether the original contract was well done or not, it distinctly appears, and this is the controlling factor in the case, that the fall of the cornice was not due to the condition the contractor left it in, but to the neglect of the owner Redden to inspect and guard against the result of rusting and rotting that inevitably takes place in every structure in which nails, tin, and wood are used. The structure stayed up as long as the materials did not rust and rot out.

The reasoning of Miner v. McNamara, 81 Conn. 690, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, 72 Atl. 138, is conclusive of the present case. In that case the Hubbell Company was alleged to have negligently constructed a warehouse. It was delivered to the owner, who knew the negligent construction, and that the building was unsafe. The owner leased to the plaintiff without disclosing the condition of the warehouse, and the building collapsed from its inherent weakness about a month after plaintiff took possession. This presents a much stronger case for the plaintiff than the present, for the collapse was due to conditions existing when the Hubbell Company turned over the building to the owner, and was not due to a supervening natural deterioration negligently allowed by the owner to proceed to the point of collapse, when reasonable inspection and care by the owner would have prevented it. Yet this court held that the Hubbell Company was not liable, on the ground that its negligence was not the proximate cause of the collapse, but that the failure of the owner to notify the lessee of the defective condition was negligence, and the proximate cause of the collapse. The court said: "Whether this defendant (the Hubbell Building Company) is liable for the plaintiff's injury depends upon whether its negligent or unlawful act was the proximate cause of that injury. 'That only a proximate cause of an event, juridically considered, which, in a natural sequence, unbroken by any new and intervening cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred.' Smith v. Connecticut R. & Light Co. 80 Conn. 268, 270, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 707, 67 Atl. 888. The last conscious agent in producing the injury is the party liable for it. 1 Beven, Neg. 3d ed. 53. The law does not search for the more remote agencies by which the injury was brought about or made possible."

It appears from the present complaint that the fall of the cornice was due to the action of rust and rot, and it is in terms alleged: "The defendant Redden negligently and carelessly failed and neglected to inspect the cornice to determine its condition, and negligently and carelessly failed and omitted to remove said cornice from said building."

A contractor or workman is surely not the insurer of the everlastingness of the materials of a cornice built by him. The owner, or occupier, as the case may be, is under obligation to give such inspection and make such repairs as will at least preserve the structure from the dangerous effects of natural causes,—wind, rain, dampness,—which no foresight of construction can guard against.

But the plaintiff contends that this is a case of a nuisance per se, and therefore the contractor is liable in any event. It is unnecessary to discuss the law in such cases, for the reason that the allegations do not show a nuisance per se, and do show a supervening proximate cause. There is, to be sure, an allegation that the cornice was so constructed as to be a constant menace, as liable to fall by its own weight due to insecure fastening. Whether this was so or not, the fall which in fact occurred was of a structure quite different from that left by the builder. So long as it remained as left by him, it did not fall. The fall was due to rust and rot occurring from natural causes, and which the complaint says should have been guarded against by the owner by inspection and repair or removal, and which he neglected. The most alleged against Gilbey is negligence, and then it is shown that the subsequent negligence of the owner brought about the fall. There is no similarity between the facts of this case and of those cited by the plaintiff. House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 631, was the case of an overshot water wheel built near the road, uninclosed and uncovered, and calculated by its very nature to frighten horses. The danger was constant from the time the wheel was constructed, and it was that identical danger which caused the accident.

The bridge cases, of which O'Brien v. American Bridge Co. 110 Minn. 364, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 980, 136 Am. St. Rep. 503, 125 N. W. 1012, may be taken as an illustration, are cases where the very method of construction made the bridge liable to collapse at any time, and it did collapse because of the defects in its construction alone. The very danger left by the contractor, without any intervening cause, materialized in the collapse. We may apply to the claim of nuisance per se the words of Hobson, Ch. J., in Simons v. Gregory, 120 Ky. 116, 85 S. W. 751: "But the doctrine of these cases is not to be applied to the fall of an elevator, which is charged to be due concurrently to its defectiveness, the unskilfulness of the operator, and his gross neglect in using it; for an elevator which, after being run for months, breaks down by reason of its being operated by an inexperienced and unfit person, and by reason of his gross negligence, cannot be said to be imminently dangerous to human life. Such an elevator cannot be distinguished from a defective steam boiler, a defective coach for the carriage of passengers, a defective wall, defective shelving in a storeroom, or a defective chandelier in a hotel, or the other things for which the maker has been held not to be responsible to third persons injured thereby."

Proximate cause—fall of cornice into street—injury to pedestrian.

A cornice is not per se a nuisance. There was no imminent peril involved in its ordinary use with ordinary care. The peril occurred because of the lack of ordinary care. O'Brien v. American Bridge Co. supra. The original negligent construction did not cause any harm, until the owner's negligence with respect to inspection and repair occurred, and the defendant Gilbey confessedly was in no way bound to anticipate or assume responsibility for this.

This ruling of our courts is amply supported by the authorities. In Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 12 L.R.A. 322, 23 Am. St. Rep. 221, 21 Atl. 244, a contractor was sued for damages caused by the defective construction of a porch built for a hotel company. Upon the point of liability of the contractor, the court cited with approval Wharton on Negligence: "The true rule, which we think applicable to it, may be found in Wharton on Negligence, 2d ed. § 438. It is as follows: 'There must be causal connection between the negligence and the hurt; and such causal connection is interrupted by the interposition between the negligence and the hurt of any independent human agency. . . . Thus a contractor is employed by a city to build a bridge in a workmanlike manner, and after he has finished his work, and it has been accepted by the city, a traveler is hurt when passing over it by a defect caused by the contractor's negligence. Now, the contractor may be liable on his contract to the city for his negligence, but he is not liable to the traveler in an action on the case for damages. The reason sometimes given to sustain such a conclusion is that otherwise there would be no end to suits. But a better ground is that there is no causal connection between the traveler's hurt and the contractor's negligence. The traveler reposed no confidence in the contractor, nor did the contractor accept any confidence from the traveler. The traveler, no doubt, reposed confidence in the city that it would have its bridges and highways in good order; but between the contractor and the traveler intervened the city, an independent, responsible agent, breaking the causal connection.'"

The same section is cited with approval in the comparatively recent case of Thornton v. Dow, 60 Wash. 622, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 977, 111 Pac. 899.

By reason of the rule of proximate cause adopted, it will not be necessary to discuss further the general rule of nonliability of the contractor after having turned over the work to the owner, nor the few exceptions recognized in the cases. Although this rule has received attention, referring more especially to the cases collected in 14 R. C. L. p. 107, § 42, and the notes in 26 L.R.A. 504; 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 968; and L.R.A. 1915E, 766, we find nothing that leads us to question the soundness of the rule above adopted. The reason for the general rule, stated in terms supporting our conclusion, is well stated in the note referred to in 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 969, as follows: "'But the better reason,' says Mr. Justice Johnson, in Casey v. Wrought Iron Bridge Co. 114 Mo. App. 47, 89 S. W. 330, 'is that ordinarily in such cases there is found a break in the causal connection between the contractor's negligence and the injury. Whart. Neg. 368. It is the intervening negligence of the proprietor that is the proximate cause, and not the original negligence of the contractor. By occupying and resuming possession of the work, the owner deprives the contractor of all opportunity to rectify his wrong. Before accepting the work as being in full compliance with the terms of the contract, he is presumed to have made a reasonably careful inspection thereof and to know of its defects; and, if he takes it in the defective condition, he accepts the defects and the negligence that caused them as his own, and thereafter stands forth as their author. When he accepts work that is in a dangerous condition, the immediate duty devolves upon him to make it safe; and if he fails to perform this duty, and a third person is injured, it is his negligence that is the proximate cause of the injury. His liability may be incurred either from his substitution for the contractor, or from his neglect to repair."

But the plaintiff, referring to the doctrine of the "new conscious agent," as mentioned in Miner v. McNamara, 81 Conn. 690, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, 72 Atl. 138, says, in substance: "Redden is not a new conscious agent. He is one of the original wrongdoers, creators of a nuisance. His failure to inspect is an act of omission, not of commission. It is a concurring rather than a proximate cause of the injury."

This claim is hardly even plausible. Acts of omission, equally with acts of commission, are in law acts of a conscious agent. Even if Redden was an original wrongdoer, the injury was, by the terms of the complaint, due to his subsequent neglect as its proximate cause. The objection would have applied with equal force in Miner v. McNamara. Negligent omission to give notice was the act of the conscious agent on which that case turned.

Finally, the plaintiff says he has avoided the proximate cause doctrine by the allegations of the thirteenth paragraph of his complaint that each and every act, omission, and negligence stated was a proximate and efficient cause, without the operation of which the falling of the cornice would not have happened. We quite agree with the trial court that this allegation of proximate cause

—conclusion.

is simply a statement of legal conclusions. It adds nothing to the previous allegations of fact. Further, the paragraph is a striking illustration of the not infrequent confusion of thought with reference to conditions and legal cause.

The court correctly sustained the demurrer of the defendant Gilbey upon the second and fourth grounds, and we have no occasion to consider the others.

There is no error.

The other Judges concur.

pleted building adjoining the highway, by reason of which a traveler lawfully on the highway is injured. It does not include the fall of awnings, signs, lamps, or other articles attached to the building, but which are not a part of the structure, and excludes cases where the building has been previously damaged by fire, or where the fall is caused by fire.

II. General rule.

A building abutting on a highway must be so constructed and maintained that it will not fall and injure persons lawfully on the highway. While the owner or person in control of such a structure is not an insurer, he is bound to use reasonable care and skill in the construction and maintenance of the building, and he is obliged to inspect from time to time. If the building or any part thereof, when constructed or purchased, is in an inherently dangerous condition so that it is liable at any time to fall and injure persons in the highway, or if it becomes in such condition by reason of use or mismanagement, it is a nuisance, and the person whose duty it is to remedy the defect must do so within a reasonable length of time after the creation of the nuisance.

The case of Mullen v. St. John (1874) 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530, seems to be the leading case on this question. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff, while walking along the street, was injured by the falling of the walls of a building adjacent to the highway. It was held that the owners of the building were under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that the building, or any part of it, should not fall into the street and injure persons lawfully there, and that the question whether reasonable care had been used must depend on all the circumstances of the case. "Buildings properly constructed do not fall without adequate cause. If there be no tempest prevailing, or no external violence of any kind, the fair presumption is that the fall occurred through adequate causes, such as the ruinous condition of the building, which could scarcely have escaped the observation of the owner. The mind is thus led to a presumption of negligence on his part, which may, of course, be rebutted. In the absence of explanatory evidence, negligence may be presumed."

In Woods v. Trinity Parish (D. C.) supra, a child who was standing in front of the defendant's church building, which adjoined the highway, was struck and severely injured by a shutter which fell from the building. It was contended by the defendant that as the plaintiff was not standing on the sidewalk proper at the time of the accident, but on a paved space between the sidewalk and the front building line of the church edifice, the defendant did not owe to her the duty owed to a traveler on the street. But the court held that as the whole space in front of the church was paved and uninclosed, and was commonly used by the public, it was a part of the public street, on which any one of the public had a right to be, and it was therefore immaterial on which part of it the plaintiff was standing at the time of the accident. It was held, further, that where the declaration alleged knowledge by the defendant of the defects of the shutter, it was not necessary to prove by a preponderance of testimony that the defendant knew of the unsafe condition of the shutter. It was said in this connection by the court: "This degree of knowledge was not essential in order to enable the plaintiff to make out her case. It was sufficient that, evidence of the want of security of the shutter in its fastening being given, the plaintiff should indicate, by evidence, notice to the defendant of such defect, or circumstances from which such notice could properly have been presumed."

In Sinkovitz v. Peters Land Co. (1909) 5 Ga. App. 788, 64 S. E. 98, it appeared that the plaintiff, while on the sidewalk in front of the defendant's building, was struck by a window pane which fell from the building. It was held that "when the plaintiff showed that the pane of glass which struck her fell out of the window of defendant's building, and that its fall was not caused by the occupants of the suite of rooms or by the agency of any other person, she had made a prima facie case."

In Connolly v. Des Moines Invest. Co. (1906) 130 Iowa, 633, 105 N. W. 400, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 223, it appeared that the plaintiff, while on the sidewalk in front of a building owned by the defendants, was struck and injured by a cast-iron window cap that fell from one of the upper windows of the building. It was held that when a building situated on a public street becomes dangerous from faulty construction, or other cause, a continuing duty of inspection exists; not such an inspection as shall make the owner an insurer of the safety of the building, but a reasonable inspection from time to time. And if the owner delegates to another the work of inspecting the building, he does not discharge his duty by exercising ordinary care in the selection of the inspector, but he is responsible for the negligent performance of the inspection.

In Mitchell v. Brady (1907) 124 Ky. 411, 13 L.R.A. 751, 124 Am. St. Rep. 408, 99 S. W. 266, it appeared that a child walking on a city street was killed by the falling of a water pipe constructed on the side of a building which abutted on the sidewalk. It was held that a person erecting a building on a city street is under a legal duty to use ordinary reasonable care that it shall not fall into the street and injure persons lawfully there. A ruinous wall or other structure likely to fall is a nuisance, and, if it falls and injures a person in the street after a reasonable time to repair or remove it has elapsed, the owner is liable to the person injured.

In Murray v. McShane (1879) 52 Md. 217, 36 Am. Rep. 367, it appeared that the defendant's building, which fronted on a public street, had become dilapidated and in a condition endangering the safety of passers-by. The plaintiff, passing the house, sat on the sill of the door, temporarily, to lace his shoe, his head being projected into the street, when a brick fell from the wall of the building, striking the head of the plaintiff and severely injuring him. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was a trespasser, and not a traveler passing along the highway. But the court said: "The alleged 'locus in quo' in this case is partly in the highway, and partly on the property of the adjoining owner, the head of the plaintiff, which was injured, being within the lines of the highway, as alleged, and the body resting for a lawful purpose on the doorsill. He was not a trespasser 'quoad hoc;' if he had remained in that position longer than necessary, against the owner's will, he might have become so."

A stucco ornament which is negligently constructed of improper materials, attached to a building adjoining a public highway and allowed so to remain, is a continuing nuisance, and a person passing in the street who is injured by the falling of the ornament has a cause of action. HOWARD v. CENTRAL AMUSEMENT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 195.

In Green v. Cariganis (1914) 217 Mass. 1, 104 N. E. 571, a piece of slate falling from the roof of a building adjoining the highway struck and injured the plaintiff, who was passing along the street. There was some question whether the falling slate came from the roof of defendant's building. It was held that, in the absence of evidence of a wind at that particular time, the logical and reasonable inference would be that the falling slate would come down in a substantially perpendicular direction, and as the plaintiff was directly in front of defendant's building at the time of the accident, the jury was justified in finding that the slate fell from the defendant's building.

A declaration alleging that the glass windows in a building adjoining a city street were negligently permitted to become out of repair and unsafe, and that the glass in the windows had become loose, falling and striking the plaintiff, who was passing along the street, has been held to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Bannigan v. Woodbury (1909) 153 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531.

In Detzur v. B. Stroh Brewing Co.

(1899) 119 Mich. 282, 44 L.R.A. 500, 77 N. W. 948, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 371, it was shown that a piece of glass, falling from a window in a building adjoining a public street, struck and injured the plaintiff, who was passing in front of the building. There was evidence tending to show that the glass had for some time been in a shattered condition, and that there was no unusually high wind at the time of the accident. It was held that these facts supported a finding of negligence.

The law imposes a duty on a person erecting a building on premises adjoining a public highway so to erect it as to render it reasonably safe, and sufficiently strong not only to resist the strain on the supporting timbers of the roof, but also strong enough to support the roof at all seasons, in all ordinary weather. And where a person lawfully passing in the street is injured by being struck with a portion of the roof of the building, the defendant cannot excuse himself by proof that he employed an independent contractor to furnish the material and perform the work. Wilkinson v. Detroit Steel & Spring Works (1889) 73 Mich. 405, 41 N. W. 490.

In Ryder v. Kinsey (1895) 62 Minn. 85, 34 L.R.A. 557, 54 Am. St. Rep. 623, 64 N. W. 94, it appeared that a small sign attached to a building adjoining the highway had become insecure and dangerous to persons passing in the street. A policeman attempted to remove the sign and called on the plaintiff's son to assist him, when part of the wall in the building fell, striking and injuring the plaintiff's son. The evidence showed that the fall of the wall was due to a latent defect in the construction of the building, and there was no evidence tending to connect such cause with the owner's negligence. It was held that in the absence of evidence tending to show that the defect might have been discovered and removed before the accident, by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the owner, he would not be liable.

72 S. W. 1083, that the plaintiff, while standing on the sidewalk in front of a building owned and occupied by defendant, was struck by a guard rail which fell from the building, and that the section of railing which produced the injury had, for a long time prior to the accident, been loose and insecure, although it appeared that the remaining spans of railing were bolted, and that after the accident this section was in like manner protected. It was held that no actual notice to, or proof of knowledge of, the imperfect and dangerous condition of the railing, was required, and that the proof entitled the question of negligence to be submitted to the jury.

In Pearson v. Ehrich (1912) 148 App. Div. 680, 133 N. Y. Supp. 273, it appeared that the plaintiff, while walking along a city street, was struck by a piece of glass which fell from a building owned and occupied by the defendant. The proof of these facts, it was held, established a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant, under the rule of "res ipsa loquitur," and it was then incumbent upon the defendant to explain the circumstances or otherwise establish his freedom from liability.

In Ugla v. Brokaw (1907) 117 App. Div. 586, 102 N. Y. Supp. 857, it appeared that a coachman, while driving a team of horses in a public highway, was struck by a piece of a skylight, which fell or was blown from a building which adjoined the highway. It was held that the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" applied, the incident itself being sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence. See to the same effect (1902) 77 App. Div. 310, 79 N. Y. Supp. 244.

In Mentz v. Schieren (1901) 36 Misc. 813, 74 N. Y. Supp. 889, it appeared that the plaintiff, while passing along a public street, was struck and injured by an iron guard which fell from a window of a building adjoining the highway. It was held that proof of the fall of the guard raised a presumption of negligence sufficient to call for an explanation, and that the explanation offered by defendant was inadequate to rebut the presumption.

In Odell v. Solomon (1885) 99 N. Y. 635, 1 N. E. 408, it appeared that the plaintiff, while on a public highway, was injured by the falling of a window sash from a building adjoining the highway. It was held that the defendants were not liable, as there was no evidence that they had any reason to apprehend the existence of any such defect as that which was developed by the accident which occurred; and the simple fact that the premises were not kept in repair was not sufficient to establish negligence against the defendant. "It cannot be contended," the court said, "that the owner or occupant of a building is chargeable with the duty of constant inspection and extreme care which is required of railroad companies, and others managing dangerous machinery which is liable, from its nature, to become defective and cause injury. Reasonable care is all that the law requires, and what is reasonable care depends upon the nature of the property and the dangers in its use ordinarily to be apprehended."

The fall of a wall of a building abutting on a highway causing injury to a traveler implies negligence. The doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" applies, and the defendant has the burden of proving that the building, at the time of the accident, was safe, so far as diligent examination would show. Vincett v. Cook (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 318.

In Scullin v. Dolan (1871) 4 Daly (N. Y.) 163, it appeared that a piece of coping from the chimney on defendant's house fell and injured the plaintiff, who was passing along the sidewalk. It was held that the defendant was not liable, as he was not guilty of negligence either in the construction or maintenance of the chimney.

It appeared in Palmore v. Morris, T. & Co. (1897) 182 Pa. 82, 61 Am. St. Rep. 693, 37 Atl. 995, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 597, that a child, while standing on the sidewalk in front of a large building, was struck and injured by a falling gate attached to the building. The evidence showed that the gate was out of repair and was in a dangerous condition. It was held that there was evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that there was negligence on the part of him whose duty it was to repair.

In Waterhouse v. Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. (1902) 16 S. D. 592, it appeared that the walls of a building adjoining a public highway suddenly collapsed, striking and injuring the plaintiff who was at the time standing in front of the building. Suit was brought against the owner of the building, and it was held that it is the duty of the owner of a building which adjoins a public highway to use ordinary care to discover any defect in the building, and the fact that the defendant did not construct the building, but purchased it from another, would not shift the liability. It was held, further, that it was not necessary to prove that the defendant had actual knowledge of the defective condition of the building.

In an earlier appeal in the same case (1900) 12 S. D. 397, 48 L.R.A. 157, 81 N. W. 725, it was held that a complaint which alleged that the building was owned by the defendant, and was negligently constructed of improper materials, stated a good cause of action, as the owner of a building is liable for its negligent construction. The fact that the building has stood for many years was said to afford very slight evidence of its proper construction, the court adding: "From the fact that the building fell of its own weight, without any external violence, a fair presumption would be that the fall occurred through adequate causes, one of the most natural of which would be the negligent and faulty construction of the building itself."

In O'Connor v. Curtis (1892) — Tex., 18 S. W. 953, the owner of a building adjoining a public street was held liable to a person lawfully in the street, who was injured by the falling of the cornice and part of the fire wall of the building. See, to the same effect, O'Connor v. Andrews (1891) 81 Tex. 28, 16 S. W. 628.

A person passing in the street who is struck by a falling gutter from a building adjacent to a public highway cannot hold the owner of the premises liable, where it is shown that the owner had employed workmen at different times to examine and repair the gutter, and otherwise used reasonable care in inspecting and maintaining it, and where there is no evidence tending to show that the fall was due to any neglect or default on his part. Palmer v. Bateman [1908] 2 Ir. R. 393.

In Ferrier v. Trepannier (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 86, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate, while passing along a public street, was killed by the falling of a window from the third story of a building adjoining the highway. It was held that the owner of property abutting on a highway is under a positive duty to keep it from being a cause of danger to the public by reason of any defect, either in structure, repair, or use and management, which reasonable care can guard against.

In Roberts v. Mitchell (1894) 21 Ont. App. Rep. 433, it appeared that plaintiff, while walking on a public street, was struck by a cornice which fell from a building adjoining the highway. The defendant, who was the owner and occupant of the building, had never caused it to be inspected, although he had owned it for several years. It appeared that the building had been erected by a competent contractor several years before the defendant purchased it. In commenting on the duty to inspect, the court said: "The evidence in the present case shows that the building was put up in 1871, that the defendant bought it from the original owner and builder in 1882, and that from that time, at all events till the occurrence of the accident, no examination had been made of the condition of the cornice or brackets as to whether they continued to be fastened as firmly and were in as safe a state as it may be assumed they were when first put up, or as they were in 1882. Certainly it could not be assumed that they would last forever, or that the wood would not shrink or decay, or the fastenings rust or become loose from weathering or other cause, and I think the jury or judge might well infer that if they had been examined from time to time the condition of this particular bracket and any other loose ones would have been discovered, and this defect remedied."

III. Persons liable within rule.

a. Lessor.

The owner of a completed building which adjoins a highway is liable to a person passing in the street who may be injured by the falling of any part of the structure, although the premises are in possession and under exclusive control of a tenant, if the building by reason of faulty and negligent construction, or the use of improper and unsuitable materials, or for any other reason is, when leased, in such condition that it is liable at any time to fall of its own weight. Such a condition constitutes a nuisance, and it is not material that the building was not constructed by the owner or that the tenant has obligated himself to repair. If the fall is caused by defects which arose after the owner parted with possession to the lessee, but which do not in themselves constitute a nuisance, but are due to culpable negligence, the owner, as well as the tenant, is liable to third persons injured thereby if he has obligated himself to repair. If the building, or the part thereof which falls, is not under the exclusive control of any one tenant the owner is liable. Mitchell v. Brady (1907) 124 Ky. 411, 18 L.R.A. 751, 99 S. W. 266; Howard v. Central Amusement Co. (reported herewith) ante, 195; Uggla v. Brokaw (1907) 117 App. Div. 586, 102 N. Y. Supp. 857; Waterhouse v. Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. (1900) 12 S. D. 397, 48 L.R.A. 157, 81 N. W. 725, subsequent appeal in (1902) 16 S. D. 592, 94 N. W. 587; O'Connor v. Andrews (1891) 81 Tex. 28, 16 S. W. 628; O'Connor v. Curtis (1892) — Tex. —, 18 S. W. 953.

Where a water pipe attached to a building adjoining the highway is allowed to become loose and out of repair, and is in such a condition as to be a constant danger to persons in the highway, it constitutes a nuisance, and a person lawfully in the street who is injured by the falling of the pipe may hold that owner of the building liable, although the building is in possession of a tenant under lease, who has obligated himself to repair. Mitchell v. Brady (Ky.) supra.

A stucco ornament of improper and unsuitable material, negligently attached to a building by the owner, constitutes a nuisance, and the owner of the building is liable to a person in the street who is injured by the falling of the ornament, although the building is in the exclusive possession of a lessee. Howard v. Central Amusement Co. (reported herewith).

In Uggla v. Brokaw (1907) 117 App. Div. 586, 102 N. Y. Supp. 857, it appeared that the defendant leased a piece of property to a tenant, who constructed thereon a building which adjoined the highway. The defendant paid for the building and supervised its construction. Thereafter the tenant went into possession of the building under a second lease in which he obligated himself to make repairs. The plaintiff, while driving a team of horses along the highway, was struck by part of the skylight which was blown from the building. The court said: "If the building was not a nuisance, that is, in a condition to endanger the traveling public or adjacent property, or those lawfully thereon, at the time the defendant surrendered entire possession thereof to his tenant, he would not be liable if thereafter, by the act of the tenant or through his negligent omission to make repairs, they became dangerous and unsafe, but in such circumstances the tenant would be liable."

Where a building has become a nuisance, and is leased to a tenant, the owner is liable for any injury that may result from such nuisance to third parties, when such owner has not exercised ordinary care and diligence in discovering its condition, and it is immaterial that the lease contains no covenant to repair. Waterhouse v. Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. (1902) 16 S. D. 592, 94 N. W. 587.

157, 81 N. W. 725, it appeared that a building adjoining the highway collapsed, injuring a person in the street. Action was brought against the owner of the building, the complaint alleging that the building was under his control and that it was negligently constructed of improper material. It was held that as the owner of a building is liable for its negligent construction it was not necessary to allege that the defendant constructed the building; and as the complaint did not allege any decay or want of repairs the tenant was not a necessary party. The court said: "It seems to be the proper rule that the landlord is liable for the negligent construction, and the tenant for the negligent use, of the premises. If a dangerous or injurious structure is erected on the premises when he lets them to the tenant, the landlord is, of course, liable."

In O'Connor v. Curtis (Tex.) supra, it appeared that the building from which a water pipe fell was under lease to several tenants. The court held that the owner of the building was liable, as it did not appear that the portions falling were within the holding of any one tenant, and as no agreement to repair on the part of the tenants was shown. See to the same effect, O'Connor v. Andrews (1891) 81 Tex. 28, 16 S. W. 628.

b. Lessee.

The lessee of a completed building which adjoins a highway is prima facie liable to passers-by who may be injured by the fall of the structure, or any part thereof, if the building, or the part falling, is under his exclusive holding in the lease. And he owes a duty to the public to use ordinary, reasonable care in the management and use of the building. If the condition of the premises when leased is such as to constitute a nuisance, it is his duty to remedy the defects, and if he does not do so he is guilty of continuing a nuisance, and the tenant, as well as the landlord, is liable for any injuries which may be caused thereby to a person lawfully in the highway. Mitchell v. Brady (1907) 124 Ky. 411, 13 L.R.A. 751, 99 S. W. 206; Green v. Carigianis (1914) 217 Mass. 1, 104 N.

Where a water pipe attached to a building adjoining the highway is allowed to become loose and out of repair, and is in such a condition as to be a constant danger to persons in the highway, it constitutes a nuisance which should be remedied by the tenant in possession; and if he fails to do so, and a person lawfully in the highway is injured by the falling of the pipe, the tenant is liable in damages. Mitchell v. Brady (Ky.) supra.

In Green v. Carigianis (1914) 217 Mass. 1, 104 N. E. 571, action was brought against the lessee, who was at the time in possession and control of the building. In holding the defendant liable, the court said: "The entire building numbered 125 was in the exclusive control of the defendant as lessee; and hence it was his duty, as between himself and the public, to keep it in such safe condition that travelers on the highway should not suffer injury therefrom."

In Odell v. Solomon (N. Y.) supra, action was brought against the lessees, who were in exclusive possession of the building and were obligated under their lease to repair the premises. It was held that the plaintiff's recovery could not be sustained on the ground that the lessees failed to perform their covenant with the landlords, as the covenant did not inure to the benefit of a stranger who sustained an injury in consequence of its breach, but the plaintiff, to recover, must show culpable negligence on the part of the lessee, and as the lessee had used ordinary care and diligence in the maintenance of the building, he was held not liable.

c. Independent contractor.

An independent contractor engaged to construct or remodel a building which adjoins a public highway is not liable to third persons passing along the street who may be injured by the falling of any part of the structure, after the work has been completed and the building has been turned over to the owner. Daugherty v. Herzog (1896) 145 Ind. 255, 32 L.R.A. 837, 57 Am. St. Rep. 204, 44 N. E. 457. And see HOWARD v. REDDEN (reported herewith) ante, 198.

In Daugherty v. Herzog (Ind.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate, while walking on a public thoroughfare, was killed by the falling of the wall of a building adjoining the highway. The defendant, an independent contractor, had been engaged to remodel the building, and had completed the work and turned the building over to the owner about two years before the accident. The plaintiff claimed that the work was done unskilfully and negligently, and that the fall of the wall was due to this fact. It was held that the defendant was not liable, as he owed no duty to the injured party. It was held, further, that there must be a causal connection between the negligence and the injury; and such causal connection must not be interrupted by the interposition, between the negligence and the injury, of any independent human agency.

An executor or administrator is not liable in his representative capacity for injuries to a person in the street, occasioned by the fall of part of a building adjacent to the street, if the injury occurred after the death of the testator. He may, however, be held personally liable if the property is in his possession and under his control. Bannigan v. Woodbury (1909) 153 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531; Ferrier v. Trepannier (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 86.

In Bannigan v. Woodbury (Mich.) supra, action was brought against the defendant individually, and as administrator. It was held that he was not liable in his capacity of administrator, as the accident in question occurred after the death of the testator, and the heirs were not made parties to the action. It was held, however, that as he was in possession and control of the premises, he would be personally liable.

In Ferrier v. Trepannier (Can.) supra, the defendants were executors of an estate of which the building in question was a part, and were also trustees for the heirs to whom this particular building had been bequeathed. Action was brought against the defendants personally, as well as in their representative capacity as executors and trustees. It was held that the defendants were not liable as executors of the general estate for the following reasons: (1) They were not in possession of the building as executors at the time of the accident, but were trustees of this particular property for specific devisees; (2) even if the executors had been in possession the corpus of the estate would not be liable for the plaintiff's damage; (3) even if the executors had been in possession, and assuming that the whole estate might be liable, action does not lie against the executors alone.

It has been held that a trustee holding the legal title to premises abutting on a highway is liable in his representative capacity to a person passing in the street, who is injured by the falling of part of a completed building. Ferrier v. Trepannier (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 86.

In that case the lower court held that the defendant trustees, who held the legal title to the premises, were liable in their representative capacity for injuries caused through a defect in a building adjoining a highway, by reason of which a traveler was killed. The question was not before the court on appeal, but it was intimated that, had it been involved, the holding of the lower court would have been affirmed.

A grantor of defective premises adjoining a highway, who has parted with the title and possession of the premises, is not liable to a person passing in the street who is injured by the falling of part of the building conveyed, although the grantor knew of the defect at the time he made the conveyance, provided the defect was so obvious as to be discoverable by careful inspection on the part of the grantee. In such cases it is the duty of the grantee to inspect the premises, and, if necessary, to make repairs, and if he fails to do so and persons lawfully in the street are injured, he, and not the grantor, is liable. Palmore v. Morris, T. & Co. (1897) 182 Pa. 82, 61 Am. St. Rep. 693, 37 Atl. 995, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 597, wherein the court said: "There may be a case where the grantor conceals from the grantee a defect in a structure known to him alone, and not discoverable by careful inspection, where the owner would be held liable, though out of possession; but that is not this case; the rotten gate, the testimony shows, was as obvious before the accident as afterwards, and the reasonable time for the purchaser to discover it was not limited to the twenty hours after he took possession, but to the weeks and months pending the negotiations, before the delivery of the deed."

But see Kelly v. Washburn (1917) 178 App. Div. 664, 165 N. Y. Supp. 891, wherein it was held that a person who sold a defective and dilapidated house to housewreckers was liable for injuries to a third person, who, while passing on the street, was struck by a foundation stone from the building, although title to the building had passed and it had become legally severed from the land at the time of the accident. It was also held that the owner of an undivided half interest in the land, who deeded his interest to another before the accident, does not escape liability where it was shown that the deed was not recorded until after the accident.

g. Municipal corporation.

A municipal corporation is not liable for the fall of any part of a completed building adjoining a public highway, whereby a traveler on the street is injured. The defect which causes the fall is a defect in the building and not in the highway. Mitchell v. Brady (1906) 124 Ky. 411, 13 L.R.A. 751, 124 Am. St. Rep. 408, 99 S. W. 266.

In that case it appeared that a child, while standing on a public street, was hit by a falling water pipe which was insecurely attached to a building adjacent to the highway. An attempt was made to hold the city liable on the theory that this pipe, which hung over the sidewalk, endangered people passing in the street, and thus made that portion of the street a defective highway. There was no evidence tending to show notice on the part of the city of the dangerous condition of the spout, and as the danger came from the defective condition of the house, and not from any defect in the sidewalk, it was held that the city was not liable.

IV. Exceptions to rule.

a. Vis major.

An exception to the general rule imposing liability for the fall of a part of a building exists where the accident is caused by a superior force over which the defendant has no control. A building which adjoins a public highway must be so constructed and maintained that it shall withstand all storms and winds that are common or likely to occur in that particular locality, but it is not necessary to foresee storms of unusual violence. Sinkovitz v. Peters Land Co. (1909) 5 Ga. App. 788, 64 S. E. 93; Detzur v. B. Stroh Brewing Co. (1899) 119 Mich. 282, 44 L.R.A. 500, 77 N. W. 948, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 371; Uggla v. Brokaw (1907) 117 App. Div. 586, 102 N. Y. Supp. 857; Vincett v. Cook (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 318.

In Sinkovitz v. Peters Land Co. (Ga.) supra, it was contended by the defendant that the fall of the window was caused solely by an extraordinarily high wind. It was held that the case should have been submitted to the jury to find whether the fall was attributable to such an extremely high wind as that the casualty might be considered an act of God; and that the plaintiff should have been allowed to file a proposed amendment showing that the defendant was negligent in failing to provide a windowpane capable of sustaining the force of the usual windstorms and flurries of wind to be expected in that particular city and in the locality where the building was situated.

In Detzur v. B. Stroh Brewing Co. (Mich.) supra, the evidence showed that the glass which fell from the building had for some time prior to the accident been in a shattered con-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Winnebago County (Burnell, J.) in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover for work and labor performed, and materials furnished, in printing certain campaign literature. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Silas Bullard and D. K. Allen, for appellant:

There was no evidence of liability on the part of defendant for the indebtedness claimed in this action, either as having caused or created the debt, or as being responsible therefor in any capacity, or as having ratified and obligated himself for the payment of same.

W. 479, 77 Wis. 394, 9 L.R.A. 564, 46 N. W. 537.

Messrs. Williams & Williams, for respondents:

The fact that the services were charged on the creditors' books to the agent is evidence, but is not conclusive, that credit was given to the agent.

He who would avail himself of the advantages arising from the act of another in his behalf must also assume the responsibilities.

Meachem, Agency, § 148.

The questions as to whom credit was given, whether defendant had authorized or ratified what was done, were for the jury, and the judgment will not be reversed merely on the ground that the weight of evidence was against the verdict.

Timlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action at law upon contract to recover for work and labor performed and materials furnished in printing letterheads and circulars for distribution to the electors in the effort to have Mr. S. A. Cook nominated for United States Senator at the primary election for the year 1910, the jury returned a verdict finding that the plaintiffs did the work and furnished the materials upon the credit of, and relying for payment upon, a committee of which the defendant was one. That in ordering this printing and material one Cowling acted as agent of said committee, and that the printing was done and materials furnished with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, Ballou, who ratified the acts of Cowling in regard to the same.

The errors assigned go to the sufficiency of the evidence to support this verdict and to the sufficiency of the verdict to support a judgment for the plaintiff.

It appeared that the work and material in question were ordered by Mr. Cowling, delivered to him, and charged to him upon respondents' books of account. After the work was begun Mr. Cowling informed respondents that there was a committee to which matters of payment must be referred. It also appeared that Mr. Cowling was chairman of a voluntary campaign committee having charge of the active details of the campaign, and that Mr. Ballou, the appellant, was also a member of and the treasurer of that committee. The work done and materials furnished were appropriate to the purpose for which the voluntary organization was formed. There is evidence tending to show that Mr. Ballou knew of the contract with respondents and made part payment thereon out of the funds contributed to the committee. The verdict found that the plaintiffs did not do the printing and furnish the material upon the credit of or relying upon W. C. Cowling individually for payment. Upon the findings of fact by the jury, which we think are supported by evidence, the members of this committee would be liable to the plaintiffs for the demand in question. The fact that the plaintiffs charged up the account in the first instance against Mr. Cowling, while an item of evidence, was not conclusive, and is disposed of by the finding of the jury above stated. Champion v. Doty, 31 Wis. 190. The members of the committee, including the defendant, Ballou, had knowledge that this work was being done and this material furnished, that it must be paid for, that it was adapted to the purpose for which they had organized themselves into a committee, and that it was a disbursement necessary to their effectual work. The only question is whether the plaintiffs could select one member of this committee and hold him liable for the whole amount. In other words whether the liability is joint and several. It may be that even this question is not presented because it was not raised by answer. Derickson v. Whitney, 6 Gray, 248. But the liability of the members of the committee is joint and several. Fredendall v. Taylor, 23 Wis. 538, 99 Am. Dec. 203, s.c. 26 Wis. 286. Each member of a voluntary association is liable for the debts thereof, if incurred during his period of membership and contracted for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the association was formed. Sheehy v. Blake, 72 Wis. 411, 39 N. W. 479; 4 Cyc. 311.

W. C. COOK et al., Appts.

Voluntary association — liability of members.

1. Members of voluntary associations organized for profit are individually liable for debts contracted in the name of the association by other members, while members of such associations organized without hope or expectation of benefit are liable only on contracts assented to or ratified by them.

[See note on this question beginning on page 222.]

State — personal liability of persons acting on behalf of.

2. Members of voluntary association acting by request of the governor of the state for the purpose of promoting an exhibit to advertise the state at an exposition are personally liable on their contracts for supplies ordered by them in furtherance of the enterprise.

[See 25 R. C. L. 64.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County (Bouck, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, in an action brought to recover the agreed selling price of certain goods alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. E. Wagner, for appellants:

In the absence of a clearly expressed agreement, the defendants cannot be held where the other party has knowledge of the limitations upon their authority, or where the person with whom they contract has the same means of knowing the extent of their authority, although in contracting they exceed it.

Whiting, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action brought to recover the agreed selling price of certain goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendants. At the close of the trial, both parties moved for a directed verdict, the trial court withdrew the case from the jury, entered findings of fact and conclusions, and rendered judgment thereon in favor of plaintiff. From such judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendants have appealed.

The following facts found by the trial court are absolutely undisputed: The defendants voluntarily associated themselves together under the name and style of the South Dakota Panama-Pacific Exposition Commission for the purpose of promoting a suitable exhibit to advertise this state at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. One of the methods determined upon for raising money to finance such exhibit was through the purchase and sale of souvenir coins, pins, brooches, etc. Plaintiff, a corporation engaged in the manufacture of such goods, being notified of a prospective meeting of such association and requested to submit prices on coins, pins, and badges, sent a representative to such meeting. At this meeting these defendants were present. Believing that they could make a success of their contemplated scheme, defendants, through one of their number fully authorized by the others, entered into a contract whereby plaintiff was to and did furnish a large number of brooches, pins, and badges, for which defendants have refused to pay. No question is raised as to the good faith of any of the parties. Defendants failed in their efforts to make a success of this plan for raising money, —they disposed of but a small part of the goods purchased of plaintiff.

It is the contention of defendants that they were acting "for the state in aid of a patriotic purpose," and that it was well known by all parties that they had no legal authority to bind the state. They have cited numerous authorities holding that one is not personally liable who purports to act as agent for and to bind a principal by contract where the party with whom he contracts knows that he is not such agent and has no authority to bind his alleged principal. And there can be no question but what if defendants had contracted in the name of the state of South Dakota, purporting to act as agents of such state, the plaintiff, if aware of their lack of authority, could not hold them personally liable; but this rule of law and the authorities cited have not the remotest bearing upon the situation presented by the facts of this case. It is the law fixing the liability of members of a voluntary association that governs under the facts of this case, and not the laws relating to liability of unauthorized agents. While it is true that the defendants were induced to organize as such association because of a request or so-called "appointment" of the then governor of this state, no claim is made that any party hereto understood that such appointment was authorized by any law of this state. The defendants are exactly in the same position as though they had acted entirely on their own initiative. The defendants, prompted by the best of motives, undertook to devise some means by which this state would be properly represented at such exposition; and to such end they contracted, not in the name of the state, but in the name that they had assumed for such voluntary association. It is certainly true that they fully expected, as undoubtedly did the plaintiff, that they, as had like sented at the Panama-Pacific Exposition."

It is a further fact that, when the goods were shipped, they were shipped to Charles McCaffree, in care of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Commission. Mr McCaffree was the commissioner of immigration for the state of South Dakota.

From these undisputed facts, it is plain that defendants were acting solely in a representative capacity as members of the said commission, and with no intention of becoming personally liable; that plaintiff knew this fact; and that there is nothing in the circumstances of the transaction to disclose any intention on the part of the plaintiff, or of the defendants, that the latter should become personally liable.

It is said in the majority opinion that "there can be no question but what, if defendants had contracted in the name of the state of South Dakota, purporting to act as agents of such state, the plaintiff, if aware of their lack of authority, could not hold them personally liable."

Yet this is exactly what they did do. Plaintiff admitted that it knew that the defendants were acting solely in their capacity as public agents; and plaintiff also knew, or is charged with knowledge, that the commission had no legal existence and could not make a contract that would be binding against the state.

It is clear to me that, when plaintiff shipped these goods, it had such unbounded faith in the success of the enterprise that it relied wholly upon the fund that was to be derived from the sale of said goods. It assumed the risk of the success of the enterprise, and now that that venture has proven a failure, it ought not to be allowed to compel the defendants to protect it against loss.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the action dismissed, at plaintiff's cost.

ANNOTATION.

Personal liability of member of voluntary association not organized for personal profit on contract with third person.

I. Liability as principal:

a. Of member sanctioning contract:

1. General rule, 222.
2. Application of rule, 224.

b. Of member not sanctioning contract:

1. General rule, 229.
2. Application of rule, 230.

II. Liability as partner:

- a. In absence of statute, 232.
- b. Under statute, 233.

I. Liability as principal.

a. Of member sanctioning contract.

1. General rule.

It is held by the great weight of authority, that there is no implied liability of the members of a voluntary association not organized for profit on contracts of the association, and that the members are liable on the principle of actual agency only.

The members of a voluntary association, not organized for profit, are jointly and severally liable as principals on contracts purporting to have been made by, for, or in the name of the association, when they have given either their assent or their subsequent ratification thereto.

In Ohio it seems that members of a voluntary association not organized for profit are liable jointly on contracts of the association which have received their sanction. Higdon v. Gardner (1887) 2 Ohio C. C. 340, 1 Ohio C. D. 519.

In Aikins v. Dominion Live Stock Asso. (1896) 17 Ont. Pr. Rep. 303, it was held that where an obligation is incurred by an entity such as a club, those of its members who sanctioned the contract are liable jointly; but in a later Ontario case (Pears v. Storm- ont (1911) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 508, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 23), such liability seems to have been considered to be joint and several.

In Richmond v. Judy (1879) 6 Mo. App. 465, the court stated the rule as follows: "Associations and clubs, the objects of which are social or political, and not for purposes of trade or profit, are not partnerships, and pecuniary liability can be fastened upon the individual members of such associations only by reason of the acts of such individuals or of their agents; and the agency must be made out,—none is implied from the mere fact of association."

And in Ehrmanntraut v. Robinson (Minn.) supra, it was said: "Of course, a benevolent or social club or association of this kind is not a partnership, in any proper sense of that term. The members are liable, if liable at all, for the acts of their associates, on the ground of principal and agent, and not of partnership. Hence, it is undoubtedly true that only those members who authorized or subsequently ratified the acts of these trustees in taking this lease would be bound by it."

In St. Paul Typothetæ v. St. Paul Bookbinders Union (1905) 94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 725, 3 Ann. Cas. 695, the court, in discussing the liability of a trade union on a contract, said: "Such an association is not a copartnership, and the members thereof are liable, if at all, on the contracts of the association on the law of principal and agent."

In Reding v. Anderson (1887) 72 Iowa, 498, 34 N. W. 300, wherein it appeared that an unincorporated association, a post of the G. A. R., had leased a hall, the court said: "The person making a contract in the name of such an association is personally bound thereby, and the members of the association assenting to the contract are bound in the same way."

In Males v. Murray (1902) 23 Ohio C. C. 396, in considering the liability of members of an unincorporated church, the court said: "In order to hold a member responsible for its debts, it must be shown that such member in some way sanctioned or acquiesced in their creation."

In Ash v. Guie (1881) 97 Pa. 493, 39 Am. Rep. 818, the court said: "Those who engaged in the enterprise are liable for the debts they contracted, and all are included in such liability who assented to the understanding, or subsequently ratified it."

In Ray v. Powers (1883) 134 Mass. 22, wherein the plaintiffs, members of a voluntary association, sought to compel fellow members to contribute their proportionate share of expenses incurred at an exhibition given by the association, the court said: "Mere membership would not bind anybody for any further payment than the initiation fee and annual assessment; but such members as participated in a vote to incur further expenses for an exhibition with premiums, or as assented to be bound by such vote, would be bound thereby."

As a reason for imposing individual liability on certain members of an association it has been pointed out that an unincorporated association is without legal existence, and that consequently its obligations must be placed on those of its members who are the real principals in the transaction. Frendall v. Taylor (1870) 26 Wis. 286.

So, in Ferris v. Thaw (1878) 5 Mo. App. 279, s. c. on appeal (1880) 72 Mo. 446, the court said: "Where members of a voluntary association authorize its officers to engage in a particular transaction in the name of the society, as they do not bind the society as a body, or give to persons interested a tangible third party against whom they can proceed, they are themselves the only persons that can be sued, and are, in fact, principals in the transaction."

And in Clark v. O'Rourke (1896) 111 Mich. 108, 66 Am. St. Rep. 389, 69 N. W. 147, it was said: "Those of the society who were actually instrumental in incurring the liabilities for it are liable as either principals, or agents having no legal principal behind them."

Y.) 426, wherein the court remarked that "there are cases, doubtless, in which the act done is so clearly in furtherance of the objects for which the association was organized that all will be presumptively bound by it. When such is not the case, consent or ratification must be proved."

This doctrine was approved in Richmond v. Judy (1879) 6 Mo. App. 465, wherein it was said that "a person, by acting on a provisional committee, may authorize an agent to contract on his credit, if it appear from the nature and objects of the organization that a certain outlay is a necessary consequence."

In Nelson Distilling Co. v. Loe (1891) 47 Mo. App. 31, it appeared that the plaintiff company had sold and delivered goods, for which they claimed payment, to a club of which the defendants had been members. The by-laws of the club, signed by the defendants as members, stated that each member obligated himself to pay all such proper debts of the association as were contracted by the officers thereof. It was held that by reason of this provision of the by-laws the defendants might be held liable to the plaintiff on the ground that they held themselves out as partners.

2. Application of rule.

In Lewis v. Tilton (1884) 64 Iowa, 220, 52 Am. Rep. 436, 19 N. W. 911, a lessor brought an action on a lease against the members of the executive committee of a club which had occupied the leased premises. The lease was signed by the defendants as an "executive committee." It was held that the defendants were individually liable on the ground, inter alia, that all the members of an organization are liable when they have engaged in the enterprise, and "have assented to the undertaking, or have subsequently ratified it."

In Thompson v. Garrison (1879) 22 Kan. 765, an action by a minister to recover from the defendants money alleged to be due in payment of his salary, it appeared that the defendants, as elders of an unincorporated church, had issued a call to the plaintiff and had undertaken to pay his salary. The court said that if the defendants "were members of a voluntary association which invited plaintiff to perform services they are responsible as members; and it matters not that they were a committee or elders. Each member participating in the invitation is severally bound."

In Newell v. Borden (1879) 128 Mass. 31, an action to recover from the defendants, as members of a fire company, an amount due for fitting up their house, it was shown that the defendants authorized their fellow member Borden to act in respect thereto. It was held that oral testimony of the vote authorizing Borden's acts was "competent to show that the other defendants were jointly liable with him."

In Willcox v. Arnold (1895) 162 Mass. 577, 39 N. E. 414, an action brought on a contract for work done and material furnished for a college class book, it appeared that all of the defendants except one were present at a class meeting and voted to publish a class book, electing Arnold business manager of the publication. At a later meeting they voted to help make up the deficit to the plaintiff. It was held that all the members of the class who voted to publish the class book, or assented to the vote, were properly held liable to the plaintiff. The contract made by Arnold was within the scope of his employment.

In Clark v. O'Rourke (1896) 111 Mich. 108, 66 Am. St. Rep. 389, 69 N. W. 147, it appeared that the defendants were members of the building committee of an unincorporated church, and that the plaintiffs sought to charge them for building material furnished for the church. It was held that the defendants could be held liable as members of an association who had authorized the transaction from which the debt arose.

In Detroit Light Guard Band v. First Michigan Independent Infantry (1908) 134 Mich. 598, 96 N. W. 934, it appeared that a band had been engaged by the commanding officer of the Independent Infantry to attend the encampment of the latter. The band sought to hold the commanding officer liable for the fee stipulated in the contract which was signed by him for the Infantry Company. It was held that the commanding officer was bound as a member of the association. He was a co-contractor and a copromisor, and was "liable on the promise made by himself, for himself and others."

In Ehrmanntraut v. Robinson (1893) 52 Minn. 333, 54 N. W. 188, the action was on a lease to recover eight months' rent. Two of the defendants had signed the lease as trustees of an unincorporated social and benevolent society, the other defendants being members thereof. The lease was apparently made without authority, but the nonsigning defendants knew of the lease and the society occupied the premises. It was held that to hold the members of such an association it must be shown that, as principals, they authorized or subsequently ratified the acts of their agents. The court considered that the acts of the nonsigning members amounted to a ratification of the acts of the trustees, with the result that they were held liable therefor.

In Evans v. M. C. Lilly & Co. (1909) 95 Miss. 58, 48 So. 612, 21 Ann. Cas. 1087, it was sought to hold the defendants liable on a promissory note which they had signed as officers of an unincorporated association. It was held that the members signing the note were individually liable, and that their liability was not affected by the fact that they signed the note in an official capacity.

In Ferris v. Thaw (1878) 5 Mo. App. 279, an action to recover on a promissory note, it appeared that such note was a renewal of a note indorsed by all but one of the defendants, who were members of an unincorporated lodge. The defendants were present at the meeting which authorized and ratified the making of the note, and at the later meeting when the renewal of the note was ratified. The proceeds of the note were used for a legitimate purpose of the lodge. It was held that where members of a voluntary association expressly sanction and ratify the act of one of their officers in executing a note in the name of the association, they will be liable on the note. The court said: "The act of a secretary of a voluntary association will not bind the board, if not authorized; but it will bind any members who were present at a meeting, and concurred in giving authority to the secretary."

In Richmond v. Judy (1879) 6 Mo. App. 465, it appeared that the plaintiff had been ordered to paint and post political bills and notices by one of the defendants, all of whom were members of a campaign committee. The plaintiff sought to recover for his work and material, the bills for which had been approved by some of the defendants. It was held that since there was evidence tending to show that the orders were given with the sanction of the committee, all the members thereof might be held liable for the goods and services. The court said: "Persons who organize as a campaign committee on the eve of an election may perhaps be supposed to know that their associates, in the name of the committee, will incur certain obvious expenses in giving public notice of political meetings, and to sanction such outlay by the very fact of their organization."

In Heath v. Gaslin (1883) 80 Mo. 310, 50 Am. Rep. 505, it seemed that a normal school was organized, but not incorporated, and put in charge of the defendants, a board of regents. The plaintiff was engaged as a teacher in the school, and sought to recover the portion of her salary which remained unpaid. It was held that, inasmuch as the plaintiff, with the knowledge of the defendants, looked to them for her salary, and since they had accepted and retained their office, the liability for the unpaid portion of the plaintiff's salary must be placed on them.

In Downing v. Mann (1854) 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 264, 3 E. D. Smith, 36, it appeared that the plaintiff, at the request of an agent of the defendant association, had furnished a supper at a ball conducted by the association. The names of all but one of the defendants was, with their consent, on a circular shown to the plaintiff at the time the contract was made, and the remaining defendant later ratified the act of the agent in ordering the supper. It was held that since the defendants had by word and deed sanctioned the act of their agent in procuring a supper in the name of the association, they were liable therefor.

In Sizer v. Daniels (1873) 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 426, it appeared that the plaintiff had been engaged by a "county committee" to advance the interests of a political party, and that they had contracted to pay a certain sum for expenses incurred therein. It was held that liability to the plaintiff was incurred only by those members who had voted for the resolutions employing the plaintiff, unless those not voting had authorized the others to take such action. The committee were not relieved of liability by the expiration of their term of office. A committee succeeding the defendants were not bound by the obligations incurred by their predecessors.

In Park v. Spaulding (1877) 10 Hun (N. Y.) 128, it appeared that the defendants were members of a voluntary association known as the Worth Club, and that the steward of the club had made purchases of supplies for the club from the plaintiff, although by arrangement the steward had agreed to make such purchases on his own credit. One of the defendants, whom the plaintiff knew to be a member of the club, had withdrawn therefrom, but had not notified the plaintiff of his withdrawal. It was held that members of the association were jointly liable for any indebtedness incurred by the association, and that withdrawal from the organization would not release a member from liability unless the creditors were notified thereof.

In Ridgely v. Dobson (1842) 3 Watts & S. (Pa.) 118, it appeared that the plaintiff had sold books and periodicals to a voluntary association of which the defendants were members. The defendants were held to be liable on the ground that members of an unincorporated society are bound by any obligations incurred by the society in which they have concurred.

In Ash v. Guie (1831) 97 Pa. 493, 39 Am. Rep. 818, it appeared that a lodge had erected a building and had obtained the funds therefor by the issue of certificates, on one of which the plaintiff brought suit against the defendants, a number of the members of the lodge. It was held that the members of a voluntary association not engaged in trade were not to be considered as partners, but that their liability depended on their authorization of the obligation on which it was sought to hold them; only those members being bound who sanctioned the creation of the building or the borrowing of the money.

In Lynn v. Commercial Club (1913) 31 S. D. 401, 141 N. W. 471, it appeared that the plaintiff, at the request of some of the members of the defendant association, performed services, etc., in the removal of certain buildings, for which services he sought to recover. It was held that although the transaction in question might have been beyond the scope of the association, nevertheless the defendants could be held liable, since it appeared that they had approved thereof.

In Burton v. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. (1895) 10 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 31 S. W. 91, it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover from the deacons and trustees of an unincorporated church. Two of the defendants had executed a note, as deacons, in payment of furniture delivered to the church by the plaintiff. It was held that while members of a trading association might be held liable as partners, the members of an unincorporated society not organized for profit were bound on the society's obligations only when sanctioned by them, and the defendants who signed the note were the only members shown to be liable.

In Hardy v. Carter (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 163 S. W. 1003, it appeared that the defendants were members of a "railroad guaranty committee," which had undertaken to raise money for the building of a railroad; the constitution of the committee specifying that the directors should make loans binding on the committee only on order thereof, etc. Prior to the adoption of the constitution, however, a number of the committee, including some of the defendants, executed several notes of which the one on which suit was brought was a renewal made by the directors some time after the adoption of the constitution. It was held that since the loan had been authorized at a mass meeting, and since the defendants knew that their contract with the promoter, calling for a loan, must be fulfilled, they were bound by the obligation incurred by some of the committee on the original note, and they were not exonerated therefrom by the later acts of the directors in borrowing to renew the first obligation; such acts were justified as coming within the scope of the association's business.

In Fredendall v. Taylor (1870) 26 Wis. 286, it appeared that the plaintiff performed services at the request of the defendants, officers and members of a voluntary association, and sought to recover from them therefor. It was held that the liability of the defendants was governed by the principles of agency, and that since they had ratified the acts of their committee, incurring the obligation, their liability was established; for although the transactions took place in the name of the association, the defendants were in law the real principal, there being no legal association which they could bind.

In Sheehy v. Blake (1888) 72 Wis. 411, 39 N. W. 479, it appeared that a parish priest, as agent for an unincorporated religious society, incurred numerous obligations, and that, on severing his connections with the church, the trustees and other duly empowered agents thereof stated an account with him which they undertook that the church should pay. It was held that the priest, in incurring the indebtedness, had acted within the scope of his agency, and that the trustees, in undertaking to settle the account with him, had done so with the assent of the members of the association, with the result that the members were personally liable therefor.

In Vander v. Ballou (reported herewith) ante, 216, the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant, as a member of a political committee, for printing done for the committee at the order of its agent. It was held that since the members of the committee were aware of the work that was being done, they were all liable to the plaintiff; and since the liability was joint and several, the defendant was bound on the obligation incurred in this case.

In Crawley v. American Soc. (1913) 153 Wis. 13, 139 N. W. 734, wherein the plaintiff, an organizer of societies, endeavored to recover from the directors of a voluntary association for services rendered, it was held that since the directors had voluntarily appeared, and since the liability of the members of such an unincorporated society was joint and several, the defendants could not complain that other members of the association had not been joined as parties defendant.

In Delauney v. Strickland (1818) 2 Starkie (Eng.) 416, 20 Revised Rep. 706, it appeared that the defendant was a member of a club to which the plaintiff had sold and delivered plate, the bill having been made out in the name of one of the managers of the club who was known to the plaintiff. The court directed that if the jury found that the defendant had sanctioned the order for the goods, he would be liable to pay for them.

In Lee v. Bissett (1856) 4 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 233, wherein it appeared that members of a club had paid $60 down on an annual subscription of $10, an indemnity having been agreed to be paid to such members wishing to resign, it was held that they were nevertheless liable to a member of the club whom the club had employed, the members having been parties to the resolution.

In Cullen v. Nickerson (1860) 10 U. C. C. P. 549, wherein it appeared that the defendants, as trustees for a church parsonage, had contracted with the plaintiff under seal for the erection of a building, it was held that where individuals, members of an unincorporated body, sign a deed as such collective body, they are liable individually thereon.

In Aikins v. Dominion Live Stock

Asso. (1896) 17 Ont. Pr. 303, the plaintiff sought to recover from the executive committee of a voluntary association for services rendered at their request. It was held that where one gives credit to an abstract entity, an unincorporated society, he may hold those jointly liable who incur or sanction the obligation.

In Pears v. Stormont (1911) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 508, 20 Ont. Week. Rep. 23, it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover rent under a lease signed by an agent of the defendants, the executive committee of a voluntary association. It was held that since the Athletic Association, an unincorporated body, was not competent to contract, they must be held liable who obtained the lease and enjoyed its benefits; and so the defendants, the executive committee, were bound in this case, although it was declared by the court that all the members of the club who approved the lease might have been held liable.

In Rohl v. Pfaffenroth (1915) 31 West. L. Rep. (Can.) 197, it appeared that the plaintiff had built a church for an unincorporated religious society and sought to recover therefor from the members of the congregation. It was also shown that not all of the members voted for the erection of the building, but that some of them expressed their dissent, of which the plaintiff had knowledge. It was held that those members were liable who had voted for the new building, but that those defendants who had expressed a contrary opinion were not bound. And the liability of those who had assented to the contract was not affected by the expectation that a large sum would be raised by a mortgage, nor by the fact that it was intended that their individual liability should be decreased by such amounts as they had already contributed.

In Austin v. Hober (1917) 3 West. Week. Rep. (Sask.) 994, it appeared that the plaintiff had advanced money to a lodge, a voluntary association, at the request of the defendants, members thereof, one of whom signed a promissory note therefor, the other having been present when the money was advanced and the note given. Both of these defendants were held liable, the one as maker of the note, and the other as a party to the whole transaction.

1. General rule.

A member of a voluntary association, not organized for profit, is not bound by any obligation incurred by or on behalf of the association without his assent or subsequent ratification.

Canada.—Rohl v. Pfaffenroth (1915) 31 West. L. Rep. 197; Austin v. Heber (1917) — Sask. —, 3 West. Week. Rep. 994.

In Re St. James Club (1852) 2 De G. M. & G. 883, 42 Eng. Reprint, 920, 16 Jur. 1075, it was stated that "the law, which was at one time uncertain, is now settled, that no member of a club is liable to a creditor, except so far as he has assented to the contract in respect of which such liability has arisen."

And in Devoss v. Gray (Ohio) supra, the court said: "A member of an unincorporated religious society cannot be held personally responsible for the debts of the society, unless it be shown that he in some way sanctioned or acquiesced in their creation."

The members of an unincorporated society will not be held liable on obligations of the society which were incurred without the authority of the members. Volger v. Ray (Mass.) supra.

Nor will the authorization to pledge the credit of the members be presumed except where the obligation is undertaken for the preservation of the association. Hosman v. Kinneally (1904) 43 Misc. 76, 86 N. Y. Supp. 263.

It may be shown in numerous ways that the members of an association did not intend that their personal credit should be extended to the contracts made for the association.

In some cases the existence of a fund created in various ways has been held sufficient to show that the members of an unincorporated society did not authorize any obligation to be incurred upon their credit. McCabe v. Goodfellow (N. Y.), Riffe v. Proctor (Mo.), and Fleming v. Hector (Eng.) supra.

Members of a political party cannot be considered to have pledged their personal credit for the obligations of the party paper. Lightbourn v. Walsh (N. Y.) supra; Hosman v. Kinneally (1904) 43 Misc. 76, 86 N. Y. Supp. 263.

The approval by a member of a society, of the minutes of a meeting thereof, at which the authorization of a contract was given, does not give that member's assent to the contract; it merely approves the minutes as correct. Meriwether v. Atkin (Mo.) supra.

Nor will a member be bound on an obligation which has been incurred in excess of the authority granted by him. Re St. James Club (Eng.) supra.

In Little Rock Furniture Mfg. Co. v. Kavanaugh (1914) 111 Ark. 575, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 406, 164 S. W. 289, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 848, it appeared that the plaintiff furnished supplies at the request of the defendants, members of a committee selected at a mass meeting to provide for a soldiers' reunion, and sought to recover a balance due and unpaid on these supplies. It was held that the defendants were acting in a capacity which was well known to the plaintiff, and that credit was not extended to them.

In Volger v. Ray (1881) 131 Mass. 439, the action was to recover premiums awarded to the plaintiff's birds at an exhibition held by an association of which the defendant was a member. It appeared that the exhibition had been held under the control of the executive committee appointed by the association, of which committee the defendant was not a member. It was held that since it was not shown that the committee had authority to offer premiums, the court could not say as matter of law that it had such authority; nor were the obligations and duties of members made clear. The defendant was held not to be liable.

In Burt v. Lathrop (1883) 52 Mich. 106, 17 N. W. 716, it was sought to hold the defendants liable as members of a voluntary association. The plaintiff had given his professional services as an attorney in the interests of the defendants. It was shown that the defendants were members of an association which bound them to pay a fee and assessments or lose the benefits thereof; the officers were to employ counsel. It was held that no authority had been given to anyone to make contracts which would be binding on the members personally, who were liable only for the assessments of the combination.

In Riffe v. Procter (1908) 99 Mo. App. 601, 74 S. W. 409, it appeared that the plaintiff, a Baptist minister, had been engaged as pastor of the church of which the defendants were members, and that his salary had been unpaid for six months, which arrears he sought to collect from the defendants. It was held that while it was true that assenting members of a voluntary association are bound by the authorized acts of their officers, this principle was not applicable to the facts of this case. It was insisted by the defendants and accepted by the court that the defendants had never considered themselves jointly or severally bound for the plaintiff's salary, which was to be raised by voluntary contributions of the members; of this the plaintiff had knowledge.

In Meriwether v. Atkin (1909) 137 Mo. App. 32, 119 S. W. 36, the action was for the violation of a contract. The plaintiff planned to erect a building and sought to have a lodge, of which the defendant was a member and presiding officer, occupy the third floor. The defendant agreed to place the proposal before the lodge, which, by its committee and trustees, accepted in writing the plaintiff's offer. The defendant was not present at the meeting of the lodge when this acceptance was authorized, but was present when the minutes of a meeting were read and approved. It was held that while members of an association may be liable on the contracts thereof, when made with their concurrence or subsequent ratification, the defendant in this instance was not liable, since he had in no manner authorized the action of the committee in making the contract in question. His presence at the meeting when the minutes authorizing the contract were approved did not constitute such authority.

In Hornberger v. Orchard (1894) 39 Neb. 689, 58 N. W. 425, the plaintiff sought to charge the defendant, as a member of an unincorporated association, for goods furnished to the association. The defendant requested that the court charge that members joining the association after the obligations had been incurred were not liable therefor. It was held that this request was improperly refused. The court said: "No member of a voluntary unincorporated association is liable for any debts contracted by such society, unless at the time the debt was incurred he was a member thereof, except by an express contract, based on a good consideration, all which must be alleged and proved."

In First Nat. Bank v. Rector (1899) 59 Neb. 77, 80 N. W. 269, it appeared that an unincorporated religious society purchased a tract of land from the plaintiff for which payment was never fully made. After foreclosure proceedings the plaintiff sought to subject the property of the individual members of the society "to the payment of the deficiency judgment." It was held that the members of a voluntary association are not liable for its debts unless they have authorized or ratified the obligation, and that the defendants in this case were not liable since there was no averment or proof of any such authorization or ratification.

In McCabe v. Goodfellow (1892) 138 N. Y. 89, 17 L.R.A. 204, 30 N. E. 728, reversing (1891) 61 Hun. 619, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 65, 15 N. Y. Supp. 377, it appeared that the plaintiff was engaged as counsel by a voluntary association, a Law and Order League, to assist in the enforcement of the liquor laws, and that he sought to recover for his services from the defendant, the treasurer of the league. It was held that since the funds of the league were to be raised by collections and subscriptions, no authority was ever given to any agent of the league to bind the personal credit of the members, who were entitled to presume that all expenses would be paid from the funds so obtained.

In Hosman v. Kinneally (1904) 43 Misc. 76, 86 N. Y. Supp. 263, the plaintiff sought to recover for services performed on a newspaper, from the treasurer of a political party which conducted the paper. By statutory provision the plaintiff had no right of action against an unincorporated association unless he might have proceeded against all the members of the association. It was held that the members of the party had never contemplated or authorized the transaction of business on their credit, nor would such authorization be presumed on the part of the members of an association except where the business transacted was necessary for the preservation of the association.

In Lightbourn v. Walsh (1904) 97 App. Div. 187, 89 N. Y. Supp. 856, wherein the plaintiff, an employee on a paper published by the political party of which the defendant was treasurer, sought to recover for his services, it was held that he could not recover, since it did not appear that authority had ever been given to the defendant to contract any debts in excess of the funds established by the payment of membership dues. No assumption could be made that the members of a political party pledged their personal credit for the business of the paper.

In Devoss v. Gray (1871) 22 Ohio St. 159, it appeared that the plaintiffs had erected a building for an unincorporated religious society, and it was sought to hold the deacons and trustees thereof liable for an unpaid balance due on the work. It was decided that to hold the deacons liable as principals, it would be necessary to show that, as members of the church, they had sanctioned or ratified the business transactions of the building committee which had ordered the work done. Since there was no averment or proof going to show such authorization on the part of the defendants, they could not be held liable.

In Fleming v. Hector (1886) 2 Mees. & W. 172, 150 Eng. Reprint, 716, 2 Gale, 180, 6 L. J. Exch. N. S. 43, it appeared that the defendant was a member of a club to which the plaintiff had sold a quantity of wine. The rules of the club provided that the members should pay cash for all services, and provided for a committee to manage the affairs of the club. It was sought to hold the defendant liable for the purchase of wine by the club. The court held that since the club had provided to finance its affairs a fund composed of the entrance and annual fees of the members, paid in ready money, for all services, there was no ground for taking the position that the members had authorized the committee to pledge their credit when making purchases for the club.

In Re St. James Club (1852) 2 De G. M. & G. 383, 42 Eng. Reprint, 920, wherein it was sought to wind up the affairs of an insolvent club, the question arose as to the liability of the members thereof for the obligations incurred. The court said: "The law . . . is now settled that no member of a club is liable to a creditor except so far as he has assented to the contract in respect of which such liability has arisen." It was pointed out that those who concur in an expenditure become bound thereby, but that in this case the committee had exceeded the power given them when they undertook to issue debentures.

In Todd v. Emly (1841) 7 Mees. & W. 427, 151 Eng. Reprint, 832, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 161, subsequent appeal in (1841) 8 Mees. & W. 505, 151 Eng. Reprint, 1138, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 262, wherein the plaintiff sought to hold the defendants liable for wine purchased for a club by the steward, it appeared that the defendants were members of the committee for the management of the club, the members of which paid into a fund entrance fees and annual dues, all refreshments being paid for in cash. It was held that in order to hold the defendants liable, it would be necessary to show that the obligation was incurred with their knowledge.

In Rohl v. Pfaffenroth (1915) 31 West. L. Rep. (Can.) 197, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover on a contract for the erection of a church for an unincorporated religious society, it was held that those members who had evidenced their dissent from the building plan could not be held liable on the obligation.

In Austin v. Hober (1917) — Sask. —, 3 West. Week. Rep. 994, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant, a member of an unincorporated society, a sum of money advanced thereto, it appeared that while he had signed an agreement concerning money, it was provided therein that it was to be subject to ratification by the lodge, and such acceptance had not been alleged or proved. Nor had the defendant been present or a party to any of the later transactions. It was held that the defendant could not be held liable as a member of the association.

II. Liability as partner.

a. In absence of statute.

In at least two jurisdictions, in the absence of statute, members of a voluntary association not organized for profit are held to be liable as partners for the contracts entered into on behalf of the association. Wilkins v. St. Mark's Church (1874) 52 Ga. 351; Thurmond v. Cedar Spring Baptist Church (1900) 110 Ga. 816 36 S. E. 211; Fetner v. American Nat. Bank (1915) 15 Ga. App. 736, 84 S. E. 185; Shiflett v. John W. Kelly & Co. (1915) 16 Ga. App. 91, 84 S. E. 606; Chick v. Trevett (1841) 20 Me. 462, 37 Am. Dec. 68; McKenney v. Bowie (1900) 94 Me. 397, 47 Atl. 918.

In Fetner v. American Nat. Bank (1915) 15 Ga. App. 736, 84 S. E. 185, the court said: "The court did not err in not charging the jury that the defendants would not be liable unless they had, after joining the voluntary association, delegated to the signer of the note power and authority to bind them."

In Nolan v. McNamee (1914) 82 Wash. 585, 144 Pac. 904, the court, while not passing directly on the subject, held that each member of a voluntary association is individually bound for all the debts thereof, and that the liability is joint and several.

And in Korstad v. Williams (1914) 80 Wash. 452, 141 Pac. 881, it was held that a college fraternity, an unincorporated association, had been correctly specified in a pleading as a copartnership.

In Wilkins v. St. Mark's Church (Ga.) supra, wherein suit on a contract was brought against an unincorporated church, service having been made on its officers, the court said that if all the members had been served, they, the members, might have been held liable "as joint promisors, contracting through an agent, or as partners, contracting in a firm name."

Thurmond v. Cedar Spring Baptist

Church (1900) 110 Ga. 816, 36 S. E. 221, was an action against a church for money due on a contract to erect a building. The court held that a voluntary association such as the defendant could not be sued, but that its members were "liable on its contracts as joint promisors or partners."

In Fetner v. American Nat. Bank (1915) 15 Ga. App. 736, 84 S. E. 185, it was shown that the defendants were members of a social club, and had been present at the meeting when it was organized. It was held that they might properly be considered as partners in the undertaking, with the result that all might be bound by the acts of one when such acts were within the scope of the partnership business. Their belief that they would not be liable for the debts of the association was immaterial.

In Shiflett v. John W. Kelly & Co. (1915) 16 Ga. App. 91, 84 S. E. 606, wherein a suit was brought for liquor, it appeared that the goods had been purchased for a "locker club" of which the defendant was a member and also the treasurer and steward. It was held that "any of the individual members of the locker club could have been held liable on its contracts as general promisors or partners." The defendant was also liable as an agent of an irresponsible principal, an unincorporated association.

Chick v. Trevett (1841) 20 Me. 462, 37 Am. Dec. 68, was an action on an instrument signed by the defendants as trustees, whereby they promised to pay the plaintiff for building a parsonage. The defendants were members of a voluntary association formed for various purposes, including the building of the house. It was held that if the defendants were to be considered as representatives of a voluntary association, they might be held liable as members of that body. For nonjoinder of the other members, the defendants should have pleaded in abatement.

In McKenney v. Bowie (Me.) supra, the action was on a promissory note signed by the defendants as "trustees" and treasurer of the Durham Agricultural & Horticultural Society, which was an association including the defendants. The court said: "Not being incorporated, all of the associated persons were liable upon contracts lawfully made by the association. Those sued being associates, and not interposing the objection that others bound were not sued, cannot escape liability on the note, whether it is regarded as the note of the association or of the individual signers."

b. Under statute.

In Vermont, by statute, all the members of a voluntary association not organized for profit are individually liable to execution creditors for the amount of a judgment remaining unpaid after execution on the joint property. F. R. Patch Mfg. Co. v. Capeless (1906) 79 Vt. 1, 63 Atl. 938; Harbell v. Gifford (1906) 79 Vt. 369, 65 Atl. 80, later appeal in (1909) 82 Vt. 222, 72 Atl. 921, 17 Ann. Cas. 1143.

In Tarbell v. Gifford (1906) 79 Vt. 369, 65 Atl. 80, wherein it was sought to hold the defendants liable as members of an unincorporated association, it was held that, under the statute, an execution creditor might proceed for the amount of his judgment remaining unsatisfied after the sale of association property, against any one or more of the members thereof.

In F. R. Patch Mfg. Co. v. Capeless (Vt.) supra, it appeared that a judgment was obtained against an association of which the defendants were members. The judgment had not been satisfied, and the plaintiff endeavored to recover the amount unpaid thereon from the defendants as members of the association. It was held that, by operation of the statute, the members of the society were individually liable.

In Tarbell v. Gifford (1909) 82 Vt. 222, 72 Atl. 921, 17 Ann. Cas. 1143, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants as members of an agricultural society for professional services rendered the society as attorneys at law. The plaintiffs had recovered judgment against the society which had been satisfied only in part by execution thereon. The court held that the judgment against the agricultural society was conclusive of the liability of those who were members when the liability merged in the judgment was created.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey (Rellstab, J.) in favor of defendant in a suit for an accounting for property alleged to have been wrongfully withheld from an estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Buffington, Woolley, and Haight, Circuit Judges.

Mr. E. A. Merrill for appellant.

Mr. Conover English, for appellee:

The administratrix of the estate is an indispensable party, without whom the case cannot proceed, and whose presence would oust the court of jurisdiction.

S. 366, 34 L. ed. 706, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 117.

Woolley, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1912, Equitable Life Assurance Society issued to David T. Finnie a policy of life insurance for $5,000 on an annual premium of $159.55. Finnie paid the first and second premiums and enough of the third to keep the policy alive until January 20, 1915. Until payment of the balance of the third premium on this date, the policy had no surrender value and was not entitled to participate in dividends; and unless full payment of the third premium were made on this date the policy lapsed. On payment of the balance of the premium, the policy acquired a surrender value of $190.

The insured, being unable to pay the premium and longer to carry the policy, offered to dispose of it to Sarah H. Kelsey, the defendant below, for a sum sufficient to pay the balance of the premium of $120 and to yield him $95. Kelsey accepted the offer. The transaction was completed by an assignment of the policy under circumstances which raised the question in this suit, whether the assignment of the policy was made as collateral security for a loan of $215—$120 premium balance and $95 cash—or was absolute and was made for the outright sale of the policy in consideration of the money that passed.

The annual premiums subsequently maturing were paid by Kelsey until 1917, when Finnie died. Thereupon, Kelsey proved the death of the insured and collected from the society the principal of the policy.

Nelle E. Finnie, the widow of the insured, was in due course granted letters of administration of the estate of her husband. William Ryan, a creditor of the insured, and later the complainant in this action, instituted suit in a state court and recovered judgment against the administratrix, execution on which was returned unsatisfied. Ryan, a citizen of the state of New York, singly and alone, filed a bill of complaint against Sarah H. Kelsey, a citizen of New Jersey, in the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, to enforce his judgment, subsequently joining Nelle E. Finnie, as co-complainant, not in her capacity of administratrix, but "as sole distributee" of her husband's estate.

The scope of the bill of complaint is disclosed by its prayer, which is, in substance, that the assignment of the policy be declared to be a security only for such sums as the defendant advanced to the insured during his lifetime, together with interest thereon; that the defendant be declared a trustee of the balance of the insurance moneys for the benefit of the estate of the insured, and that the defendant make an accounting of this trust to Nelle E. Finnie, the administratrix, and pay over to her as administratrix the balance which such accounting shall show remains in her hands, with interest.

Aside from answering the complainant's bill on the merits, the defendant challenged the right of Ryan, as creditor of the insured, to maintain this action on behalf of the estate of the insured, and also the right of Nelle E. Finnie to maintain this action as distributee of the estate, and challenged also the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that Nelle E. Finnie, in her capacity of administratrix, is a necessary party, and that, being also a citizen of New Jersey, her joinder would instantly oust the court of jurisdiction for lack of diversity of citizenship. The cause coming on to be heard, the court dismissed the bill on two grounds: "First, that the administratrix was a necessary party, and that if she be made a party there would be a lack of diversity of citizenship; second, that the evidence would not justify the changing of the assignment (which was absolute in its terms) into a collateral one."

We refer to Finnie v. Walker, 5 A.L.R. 891, — C. C. A. —, 257 Fed. 698, a case involving other insurance transactions of the same David T. Finnie and cited by both parties as sustaining their respective contentions, merely to dispose of it in a manner that will make certain that the decision in the instant case does not disturb that decision. That case, brought on other policies of insurance issued to the same insured and decided by the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York adversely to the plaintiff, prior to the argument before us, was cited by the defendant as ruling this case. As that decision has since been reversed by the United States circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, the decision of the latter court is now cited by the complainant with equal insistence as ruling the case in his favor. The case cited and mutually relied on was brought by the administratrix of the insured to recover moneys paid by the Assurance Society on policies of insurance which had been assigned contemporaneously with their issuance, on the theory, finally sustained by the appellate court, that the assignees had no insurable interest in the life of the insured, and that the assignments were in consequence wagering contracts. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643, 21 L. ed. 244; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, distinguished from Grigsby v. Russell, 222 U. S. 149, 56 L. ed. 133, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 642, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 863.

As the question in the Federal courts in the second circuit, though raised by the bill in this case, was not urged upon or decided by the trial court, and cannot in any sense extend to the question of jurisdiction on which we think this case turns, we are of opinion that the cited decision has no bearing on the matter before us.

There is no question that Nelle E. Finnie in her capacity of administratrix would be a proper party in an action in equity of the character of this one. Similarly, there is no question that if she were made a party in that capacity to such an action instituted in the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, she would, because of the identity of her citizenship with that of the defendant, instantly oust the court of jurisdiction. There being no question that she is a proper party, the question is whether she is a necessary party. This question is vigorously controverted by the parties to the action, and in support of their opposing contentions, both again cite the same authority or line of authorities, the leading one—and the only one we find necessary to discuss—being Buchanan v. Buchanan, 75 N. J. Eq. 274, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 454, 138 Am. St. Rep. 563, 71 Atl. 745, 20 Ann. Cas. 91.

On authority of this decision, the position of the complainant is, that a creditor of a deceased debtor may, alone and without the joinder of the debtor's personal representative, maintain an action in equity, even when no fraud is involved, to impress a trust in favor of a decedent's estate on property in the possession of another, on the theory that, when the parties before the court are such as to insure a fair trial to all, and when justice can be done to and as between the parties before the court without doing injury to absent persons, a court of equity will take jurisdiction. Waterman v. Canal-Louisiana Bank & T. Co. 215 U. S. 33, 54 L. ed. 80, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 392, 28 L. ed. 1015, 1081, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652. The complainant insists that the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey acted on these general principles in taking jurisdiction of and rendering a decision in Buchanan v. Buchanan when the administrator of the estate involved in the controversy was not a party. We do not regard Buchanan v. Buchanan as authority for this contention, for a reading of that decision shows very clearly that the court decided unequivocally that as a general rule a trustee is liable only to the legally qualified representative of the deceased whose estate has been misappropriated or is being unlawfully withheld. The exception to this rule, to which the court adverted, is the right of the next of kin, like the right of a cestui que trust in the case of a delinquent trustee, to maintain an action when the personal representative of the deceased, through collusion with the defendant or otherwise, refuses to bring the action himself. The complainant in this case endeavored to bring himself within this exception by an appropriate averment in the bill, but as he wholly failed to sustain the averment by any evidence, he stands within the general rule, on authority of Buchanan v. Buchanan and of the cases there abundantly cited, that in such an action as this the personal representative of the deceased is not merely a proper party, but is an indispensable party. The court of errors and appeals of New Jersey in reversing the decree of the trial court for the nonjoinder of the personal representative of the deceased as a party, yet in retaining jurisdiction of the case,—the act on which the complainant mainly relies,—did so only to grant the complainant leave to apply for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the property in dispute and hold it until an administrator could be appointed and an opportunity be afforded him to litigate the question involved. In doing this, the court did nothing more than conserve the property in dispute, which was in danger of being lost; it expressly refused to decide or even consider the merits of the dispute.

We are of opinion that the administratrix of the insured is an indispensable party to this action. As her absence from the record deprives the court of jurisdiction, and as her presence would, because of identity of citizenship with that of the defendant, instantly oust the court of jurisdiction otherwise properly acquired, we affirm the decree dismissing the bill without discussing or deciding the merits of the controversy.

ANNOTATION.

Right of creditors to maintain action in interest of decedent's estate.

This note lies in narrow compass as it excludes actions against the personal representative for an accounting and actions founded on frauds against creditors, such as creditors' bills, or cases where the representative is accused of collusion with a debtor of decedent.

It will be seen that in the reported case (RYAN v. KELSEY, ante, 284) it is held that a creditor could not, at least without making the administratrix a party, maintain an action requiring decedent's assignee of a life insurance policy to account to decedent's administratrix for the proceeds, on the ground that the assignment was not absolute, but as collateral, security.

"As a general rule, creditors cannot sue the debtors of an estate." Gilbert v. Thomas (1847) 3 Ga. 575.

Rumney v. Mead (1877) Finch, 308, 28 Eng. Reprint, 166, was a bill "to have a discovery of $250 which was alleged to be due, and owing by the Defendant to the Estate of one Samuel Bulstrode, against whom the Plaintiff obtained a Judgment, in the Year 1665, for $400 due to him from the said Bulstrode. The Defendant demurred, for that one Thomas Bulstrode is Administrator to the Intestate Samuel Bulstrode, to whom (if any Thing is due) the Defendant ought to pay it; and that the Plaintiff is not capable to make a demand thereof, or to discharge the same." He also pleaded the Statute of Limitations. And the court allowed both the demurrer and the plea.

"Where, after the death of a debtor, certain of his personal property was taken possession of by a stranger, and on his death was taken possession of by his executor, who converted it to his own use, the right of action therefor is in the administrator of the debtor, and creditors cannot maintain a bill for an account against the second wrongdoer without showing some good reason why they sue instead of the administrator." Jones v. McCleod (1878) 61 Ga. 602.

In Buchanan v. Buchanan (1909) 75 N. J. Eq. 274, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 454, 138 Am. St. Rep. 563, 71 Atl. 745, 20 Ann. Cas. 91, cited in the reported case (RYAN v. KELSEY), which was not an action brought by a creditor, but by heirs at law and next of kin, the court said: "Heirs, next of kin, and creditors cannot, in their own names, prosecute actions at law or suits in equity to recover the unadministered estate of a decedent or to collect debts or other choses in action due him. Such suits can be maintained only by the quali-

Bickley v. Donington (1724) 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 253., 22 Eng. Reprint, 214, was a "bill by Creditors of Testator, and one of the Residuary Legatees, against a Debtor to the Testator's Estate, the Executors and the other Residuary Legatee, to compel the Debtor to pay his Debt to satisfy their Demands. And per Lord Chan. The Bill is totally improper and inconsistent with the Principles of Law, and the Rules of this Court; contra by an Executor, the Representative of the Testator. The whole Management of the Estate belongs to the Executor, and the Right of it is vested in him, and not to be taken out of him by Creditors or Legatees. If he releases and is solvent, it is a Devastavit, and he is answerable himself for the Sum released to the Creditors and Legatees. If Collusion and Insolvency, it may be proper to come here for Satisfaction against the Debtor, but it must be always upon some special Case, which is not pretended either by the Bill or at the Bar," and the bill was dismissed.

In Re Franklin (1750) 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 264, 22 Eng. Reprint, 215, it was held that "where there are proper Persons to get in the Estate of another, Chancery will not suffer the Creditors of the Testator to bring a Bill in order to get in that Estate; but if the Executors will collude with a Debtor, there is no Doubt but a Creditor may bring his Bill in order to take Care of the Estate, and charge the Executors with such Collusion."

v.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY.

(180 Iowa, 859, 163 N. W. 861.)

1. A woman may bar her dower given her by a statute providing that on her husband's death she shall have one third of his real property, by an agreement between them looking to a separation, which is carried out in good faith, by which the property is conveyed by their joint signatures to a trust company and a portion of it reconveyed to her in fee, although the husband subsequently obtains an equitable interest in his share by a declaration by the trust company that it holds in trust for him.

Husband and wife — division of property — deeds to trustee — effect.

2. Where a man and wife, in order to divide their property between them, execute deeds to a trustee for the purpose of effectuating such division, each is immediately precluded from claiming any interest in the property which it is agreed shall belong to the other.

Trust — direction to trustee — effect.

3. The rights of husband and wife as established by deeds of their property to a trustee for the purpose of dividing the property between them are not affected by subsequent instructions or directions given to the trustee as to the management, control, or disposition of the property.

Estoppel — to assert dower interest in land.

4. The joinder by a woman in deeds by her husband of property to a trustee, for the purpose of dividing the property between them, estops her from asserting a dower interest in the land intended for him.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Plymouth County in favor of defendant in an action brought to establish a dower interest in certain land. Affirmed.

Statement by Preston, J.:

This is an action in equity in which plaintiff seeks to have set off to her a distributive share, or dower, in certain land transferred to the defendant by deed in which plaintiff and her deceased husband joined and in which plaintiff relinquished her dower interest. Defendant asked to have its title quieted as against plaintiff's claim. After a trial on the merits the trial court held that plaintiff was not entitled to dower, and dismissed her petition, and gave defendant a decree. The plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. C. A. Plank and C. E. Gantt for appellant.

Messrs. Shall, Gill, Sammis, & Stillwill and R. H. Burton-Smith, for appellee:

When a mutual understanding has been acted upon by both parties, each is estopped from thereafter asserting any dower interest in the land conveyed by the other.

Manatt v. Griffith, 147 Iowa, 707, 124 N. W. 753.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general situation, in so far as we think it applicable to points presented, is substantially this, as set out by appellant in her statement of facts: That the plaintiff was married to Wilson B. Martin, now deceased, twenty-four years ago. That at that time deceased had five children by a former marriage, who are still living. One of these is Frank Martin. Plaintiff and deceased had three children, all now living, one of whom is Dwight. At about the time of their marriage they purchased 80 acres of land, referred to in the record as the home 80, and also the west 80. A year or so afterwards they purchased another 80 acres, referred to in the record as the hill 80 and the east 80. A part of the purchase price was taken care of by a mortgage, which was finally paid off by defendant, and under the agreement in which the transfer of the land in suit was made to the defendant. In May, 1909, deceased executed a deed to plaintiff in which he attempted to convey the 160 acres before described. This was subject to a $2,000 mortgage on the property, the payment of which plaintiff assumed. At the time of the execution of some of the instruments hereinafter referred to, June 2, 1915, plaintiff had not been well and did not recover for four or five weeks thereafter. On that date, June 2, 1915, the plaintiff, with her husband, the deceased, and his son Frank, went to defendant company and made application to obtain a loan on the real estate. At that time certain papers were signed for the purpose of making a division of the property between plaintiff and her husband. We may state here that there is testimony on behalf of defendant that the division of the property was in contemplation of a separation between plaintiff and her husband. This is denied by the plaintiff, but the evidence is, and the plaintiff herself so testifies, that thereafter they did live apart. The different instruments executed disposed of all the property of the parties, and also made provision for the payment of debts. Continuing the statement of counsel for appellant, they say that on said 2d of June deceased was seventy-four years of age; and had been sick and quite feeble for about five years; that he died soon afterwards; that is, the next September. That under the plan of the division, which was carried out, plaintiff received the home 80, the personal property, and a lease on the hill 80 for 1915, her husband receiving the hill 80. In addition, there were two insurance policies on Mr. Martin's life, one of which, under a subsequent arrangement, was to go to plaintiff and one to his estate. Certain debts were to be taken care of by each of the parties giving the mortgage for $2,000 on the 80 received by each, which money was to be turned over to defendant to be paid out by it on these debts, and the balance, if any, to be divided equally between plaintiff and deceased. On the date before referred to, June 2, 1915, deeds were given to the defendant as trustee by plaintiff and deceased. Exhibit 10 was a warranty deed conveying the home 80 to defendant. And on the same date (June 2, 1915) a memorandum was given by defendant to the plaintiff by which defendant acknowledged that it held the same land in trust for plaintiff and agreed to manage, control, and convey the same as plaintiff should by will or deed direct. Soon after said June 2d plaintiff employed Mr. Plank to look after the matter of division of property. Some changes were made and some additional papers executed; that deed, exhibit 10 just referred to, was destroyed and a new deed of the home 80 made to Dwight Martin, a son of plaintiff and deceased. We may say parenthetically here that appellee contends that the effect of this was to prevent plaintiff's husband from receiving dower in the 80 acres which went to her in case she should predecease her husband. At the same time, June 2d, the deceased, Wilson B. Martin, and his wife, the plaintiff, executed a warranty deed to the defendant to the hill 80. In this deed both deceased and plaintiff respectively relinquished all contingent rights, including all their right of dower, homestead, or distributive share in the land so conveyed. This instrument is known in the record as exhibit 1. At the same time defendant gave to the deceased a writing, known in the record as exhibit 14, and which is as follows:

Sioux City, Iowa, June 2, 1915.
Wilson B. Martin,
Westfield, Iowa.

Dear Sir:—

We hereby acknowledge that we hold in trust for you the following described property; to wit, The east one half (E.  $\frac{1}{2}$ ) of the southeast quarter (S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of section twenty-six (26), township ninety-two (92), range forty-nine (49), and agree to manage, control, and convey the same as you shall by will or deed direct.

Very truly yours,
Farmers' Loan & Trust Company,
By R. H. Burton-Smith, Atty.

About twelve days thereafter, and on June 14, 1915, a trust agreement was entered into between deceased, Wilson B. Martin, and the defendant, in regard to the 80 acres of land deeded to plaintiff's husband, now deceased. This agreement is as follows:

Trust agreement.

This agreement entered into this 14th day of June, 1915, by and between Wilson B. Martin, of Westfield, Plymouth county, Iowa, party of the first part, and the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, of Sioux City, Woodbury county, Iowa, party of the second part, witnesseth:

That whereas the party of the first part has deeded to the party of the second part all his right, title, and interest in the following described property, to wit, the east one-half (E.  $\frac{1}{2}$ ) of the southeast quarter (S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of section twenty-six (26) township ninety-two (92), range forty-nine (49), situated in Plymouth county, Iowa, in consideration therefor the said second party agrees as follows:

(a) To pay the net income from said property annually to said first party.

(b) In case such net income shall not be sufficient to keep said first party in comfortable circumstances, the said second party agrees to sell said property and, from time to time, to pay over to the said first party such portion of the net returns from said sale as may be necessary to the comfort of said first party, keeping balances at interest.

(c) Whatever property or money shall remain in the hands of the said second party upon the death of said first party shall first be charged with the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said first party and with a reasonable charge for the services rendered by said second party, and the said second party agrees to pay one thousand dollars ($1,000), share and share alike, between Dwight Martin, Grace Waterbury Martin, and Auriel Marie Martin, children by his present wife, Emma J. Martin, if such a sum shall remain in its hands, and to divide any balance equally, share and share alike, among the five children of said first party by his first wife, Mary Martin, or among their children per stirpes.

Signed the 14th day of June, A. D. 1915.

Wilson B. Martin,
Farmers' Loan & Trust Company,
By James F. Toy,
By F. W. Kammann.

By his will, Wilson B. Martin gave to his wife, this plaintiff, the home 80, which had theretofore been deeded to her, and provided that such provision in his will was to be in lieu of dower, homestead exemptions, and distributive share. Another provision of his will is that he makes no provision for his three children by his second wife, the plaintiff, as he expected her to provide for them out of the property set off to her. There are other provisions in the will which we shall not set out.

On the last-named date deceased executed a bill of sale to plaintiff to certain personal property, horses, colts, cows, hogs, machinery, grain, etc., being all the personal property. On that same date the plaintiff and deceased gave to the defendant a paper reciting that, an application having been made for a loan of $2,000, the defendant was authorized: First, to pay the usual and necessary expenses; second, to place the remaining proceeds of said loan into a common fund belonging to both of the subscribers; third, to pay out of said fund all household, medical, or professional bills or debts heretofore contracted by either of the parties; and the remainder to be divided equally, one half to plaintiff and one half to her husband. A schedule of notes and claims was given defendant. On the same day plaintiff executed a written instrument to defendant to execute in blank and deliver to her a deed to the home 80. On the same date plaintiff executed to the defendant the following paper:

The Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, Sioux City, Iowa.

Gentlemen:—

I have executed the assignment herewith delivered to you, being an assignment of Policy No. 66537, in the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, in consideration of an agreement that Wilson B. Martin shall make, execute, and deliver to you the last will or deed of trust in which there shall be devised and bequeathed to Dwight Martin, Grace Waterbury Martin, and Auriel Marie Martin the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000), share and share alike, in said sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000), and upon delivery to you of said will or deed of trust you may deliver to Wilson B. Martin, or anyone whom he shall direct, the assignment hereby turned over to you.

And in another paper she relinquished all her right and interest as beneficiary in said insurance policy. Other papers were executed, but it is perhaps unnecessary to set them out, since appellant contends, and in this appellee seems to acquiesce, that the case turns upon the three exhibits before referred to; that is to say, exhibit 10, the deed from plaintiff and her husband to the defendant, exhibit 14, the paper in which defendant acknowledges that it holds the hill 80 in trust for plaintiff's husband, and exhibit 15, the trust agreement.

Appellant states that the greater part of the testimony consists of a review of the actions and consultations of the parties in fixing up a division of property between plaintiff and her husband, and that, while it establishes the fact that such a division was made, it is thought that it has no bearing on the case, which is solely a question as to whether plaintiff is entitled to dower in the hill 80 conveyed to the defendant, and appellee concedes that the testimony introduced is important, as it bears upon the intention and purposes of the parties. In so far as there may be any conflict in the testimony, we are satisfied with the conclusions of the trial court and deem it unnecessary to refer to the evidence in detail, in view of the fact that the case seems to turn upon the interpretation of some of the written instruments before referred to.

Appellant's propositions are that under § 3366 of the Code, which provides, in substance, that one third in value of all the legal or equitable estates in real property possessed by the husband at any time during the marriage, which have not been sold on execution or other judicial sale, and to which the wife had made no relinquishment of her right, shall be set off to her if she survive him, that plaintiff's dower interest in the real estate in controversy is not a subject of contract between her and her deceased husband, and that therefore her interest in the property in controversy was not divested by the division of the property between them; that such division, being a void contract, cannot be the basis of an estoppel preventing plaintiff from claiming dower in the land. The real basis for plaintiff's claim is that though plaintiff and her husband on June 2, 1915, executed to the defendant the warranty deed, exhibit 10, before referred to, wherein she relinquished her dower therein, the paper thereafter and on the same day executed by defendant, or given to deceased by the defendant, acknowledging that it held the land in controversy in trust for plaintiff's husband, vested an equitable title in deceased which was not divested by the trust agreement thereafter executed by her husband and the defendant, the plaintiff not having joined therein.

Cases are cited by appellant in support of the different propositions, but we think the case is ruled by our holding in the case of Manatt v. Griffith, 147 Iowa, 707, 124 N. W. 755, though, of course, the facts are not precisely the same. Appellant seems to place much reliance upon the case of Re Kennedy, 154 Iowa, 460, 135 N. W. 58, and prior cases similar thereto. But we think the facts in the instant case are essentially different from those involved in the cases cited by appellant. In the Kennedy Case it was held, at page 467 of 154 Iowa, that the fact was that the subject of the contract alleged was her inchoate interest in his real estate. The transaction was based upon an oral agreement between a husband and wife whereby the wife agreed to abide by the last will and testament of her husband in consideration of real estate and personal property conveyed to her, and in that case the court held that, under § 3154 of the Code, following prior cases, one spouse has no interest in property owned by husband and wife which is the subject of contract between them. In the Kennedy Case there was no claim, as in the Manatt Case or in the instant case, that the transactions involved were entered into for the purpose of making a division of the property of the husband and wife, to enable them to control and dispose of their lands free from any dower right of the other therein, or that the mutual understanding and division had been acted upon by both of them.

The court was justified in finding from the evidence that plaintiff and her husband mutually agreed to a full and complete division of their property, with a view to thereafter living apart, and that they both in good faith undertook to carry out such agreement and that it was carried out. The parties were competent to contract, and there was no fraud perpetrated or attempted when the agreement was executed. Appellee contends that after the deeds to defendant had been executed, on June 2d, plaintiff was trying to so arrange matters that if plaintiff's husband should be the first to die, as it was thought he would because of his poor health, that plaintiff might claim dower in his 80, while if she died first he would be cut off from any interest in her

80. Nothing occurred after June 2d to indicate any change of purpose on the part of either plaintiff or her husband, or that plaintiff had any intention of departing from the original plan of a separation and division of property as carried out on June 2d. We think that when plaintiff and her husband by the two separate deeds executed June 2d conveyed all their land to defendant, they were each immediately precluded from claiming any interest in the property which it was agreed should belong to the other.

The agreement and its execution, at least so far as the land was concerned, was completed when the deeds passed. The contract was fair and equitable to plaintiff. At that time there could have been no claim that the deeds were invalid. It seems to us that, whatever may have been done by either of the parties subsequent to June 2d, with respect to giving instructions or directions to defendant as to the management, control, or disposition of the land, could not affect what had previously been agreed upon and executed. After the parties conveyed the lands to the trust company, their rights to their respective properties became fixed, and any arrangement thereafter made would not revest either with a title or interest in the land after they had parted with all their interest therein. This is especially so as to the land, and in all the transactions thereafter there was no effort made to undo what had been done. Subsequent negotiations had to do more especially with the insurance policies.

Trust—direction to trustee—effect.

It is thought by appellee that deceased could not have been compelled to give the $1,000 to her children, since this had not been taken into consideration by either party in the earlier stages of the transaction. It is thought by appellee that when deceased acceded to plaintiff's demand in regard to this, the question arose as to how the payment of this sum to plaintiff's children at the death of her husband was to be made. It is shown that his will had already been made, and that the parties knew of that fact, and that it did not contain a bequest of this character. True, the will could have been changed, but the parties seem to have provided for the payment of this $1,000 at Mr. Martin's death by a provision in the trust deed. That there may be a conflict between the will and the trust agreement with reference to the payment of this $1,000 need not be considered here, we think, because the question is as to plaintiff's right to dower in the land.

We think that the statement by defendant after the execution of the deeds, to the effect that it held the husband's property in trust for him, did not have the effect of revesting plaintiff with an interest in her husband's land, of which interest she had previously divested herself by the deed. Under the authority of Manatt v. Griffith, supra, we think plaintiff is estopped from now asserting any dower interest in the land in controversy.

Dower—bar by division of property.

Estoppel—to assert dower interest in land.

It follows, therefore, that the decree of the District Court must be and it is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Barring dower by conveyance to trustee.

General rule.

A voluntary conveyance by a husband of property to a trustee does not bar the wife's dower therein if the husband retains the beneficial interest. Davis v. Logan (1839) 9 Dana (Ky.)

185; Radley v. Radley (1905) 70 N. J. Eq. 248, 62 Atl. 195; Goodheart v. Goodheart (1902) 63 N. J. Eq. 746, 53 Atl. 135; Meyer v. Barnett (1906) 60 W. Va. 467, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1191, 116 Am. St. Rep. 894, 56 S. E. 206; Powdrell v. Jones (1854) 2 Smale & G. 407, 65 Eng. Reprint, 457, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 123, 18 Jur. 1111, 3 Eq. Rep. 63, 3 Week. Rep. 32.

Compare Baker v. Syfritt (1910) 147 Iowa, 49, 125 N. W. 998, and the reported case (MARTIN v. FARMERS' LOAN & T. Co. ante, 238).

Where the husband, prior to his marriage, makes a conveyance to a trustee, reserving the beneficial use to himself or his assigns, he remains seised of such an equitable estate in fee as to entitle his widow to dower therein. Meyer v. Barnett (1906) 60 W. Va. 467, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1191, 116 Am. St. Rep. 894, 56 S. E. 206, wherein it appeared that prior to his marriage to the petitioner a man conveyed four parcels of land to his son by a former marriage, in trust for himself. It was provided in the deed of trust that the trustee would make such conveyance as the grantor should require. There was also a provision in the deed, making a certain disposition of the property in case the grantor died without requiring a conveyance. On being petitioned for an assignment of dower in the land, the court held that the grantor, being seised of an equitable estate in fee simple, his widow was entitled to dower in that estate.

And where a husband and wife execute a deed of trust to a third person, the husband reserving the sole benefit to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the husband is seised of such an equitable estate in fee simple as to entitle the widow to dower therein, though in the deed of trust she expressly relinquishes all claims. Radley v. Radley (1905) 70 N. J. Eq. 248, 62 Atl. 195; Goodheart v. Goodheart (1902) 63 N. J. Eq. 746, 53 Atl. 135; Powdrell v. Jones (Eng.) supra.

In Radley v. Radley (N. J.) supra, it appeared that a husband and wife executed a deed conveying a portion of his property to a trustee. The purpose of the deed, as recited therein, was to place the title in the trustee free and clear of the wife's dower, which she thereby released. The trustee was to hold the property for the sole benefit of the husband and his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. The trustee subsequently executed a declaration of trust to the husband, covenanting, among other things, to convey the property to the husband, on written demand. In a bill for dower there was no question raised as to the validity of the agreement, but only what effect it had on the widow's dower right. The court held that while the deed would bar the widow's dower in the legal estate, it would not bar her dower in the equitable estate which was thereby created in her husband, though the trustee, in his declaration of trust, covenanted to reconvey to the husband free and clear of her dower.

In Goodheart v. Goodheart (1902) 63 N. J. Eq. 746, 53 Atl. 185, it appeared that a husband and wife who were living apart entered into an agreement whereby each conveyed their separate property to a trustee for their own benefit. The wife joined in the deed of the husband. The trustee was bound to convey to any person the husband should designate. Subsequently the husband died and the widow brought a bill for an assignment of her dower. It was held that the husband was seised of such an equitable estate of inheritance as to entitle the widow to dower therein, though the trustee conveyed the property after his death.

In Powdrell v. Jones (1854) 2 Smale & G. 407, 65 Eng. Reprint, 457, it appeared that copyhold land was purchased by the petitioner's husband. It was surrendered to the use of him and his assigns for life and after his decease to such use as he by will should surrender or devise. The wife joined the husband in the surrender. The husband was admitted in fee and by his will devised the copyhold to a trustee on trial for sale. It was a custom of the manor that the dower of a wife could be destroyed only by her voluntary surrender. Holding that the widow was entitled to dower, the court said: "This, therefore, is a case in which, the husband having been seised of the fee simple and inheritance of this copyhold during the coverture, the widow is, I think, entitled to her free bench according to the custom of the manor, as proved by the evidence."

But in Baker v. Syfritt (1910) 147 Iowa, 49, 125 N. W. 998, an action by a widow for an assignment of dower in the estate of her deceased husband, it appeared that the husband had made a joint will with his former wife, whereby the survivor was to hold the property to his or her use during their life, and other provisions after the survivor's death were therein made. On the question of the relinquishment of dower the court held that if husband and wife execute a joint instrument, whether a deed, a will, or any other instrument, creating a trust for the benefit of a third person, the wife's dower is thereby relinquished.

The reported case (MARTIN v. FARMERS' LOAN & T. Co. ante, 238), holds that when a husband and wife execute a deed of all their property to a third person with the view of living apart, the wife is barred from claiming dower in that land portioned off to her husband even though it appear that the third person holds the property in trust for the husband.

Exceptions to rule.

If the trustee of a husband conveys the property in accordance with the directions of the husband during his lifetime, the right to dower therein is lost. Thus, in Goodheart v. Goodheart (N. J.) supra, stated at length in the preceding subdivision, the court held that the right to dower was lost in property which was conveyed by the trustee by order of the husband, in his lifetime.

But in Davis v. Logan (1839) 9 Dana (Ky.) 185, it appeared that by a parol partition of the property of a decedent by his heirs, a certain lot was allotted to the plaintiff's husband, who was then married. Subsequently the heirs conveyed this property allotted to them to a trustee to facilitate a conveyance to purchasers. The trustee thereupon sold the lot with two others to the defendant. In an action for the assignment of dower the court held that the widow was entitled to dower in the lot allotted to her deceased husband.

Where a husband was a stockholder in a corporation which conveyed its property to a trustee to convey to the trustees of an association, and he conveyed whatever interest he had therein to the same trustee for the same purpose, a subsequent relinquishment of dower by his wife to the trustee was held to be effectual to bar her dower therein, though the title had then passed out of the trustee. Hull v. Glover (1889) 126 Ill. 122, 18 N. E. 198. In that case it appeared that several persons in contemplation of forming a corporation advanced money to one of their number to purchase land. The land was purchased in this person's name, and, on the incorporation of the company, he made a declaration of trust in its favor. Certificates of stock were issued to those who had advanced the money. Later the stockholders agreed to form a private association. On the formation of the association it was agreed that three trustees were to hold the land for the association. The corporation executed a deed of the land to one of their number. Each of the stockholders and his wife conveyed whatever interest he had therein to the designated person, who conveyed to the trustees. It appeared, among other things, that the wife of one of the stockholders did not release her dower in her husband's interest until some time after he had executed the deed of conveyance of his interest. It was contended that, the trustees having parted title, the release did not operate to release her dower. The court held, however, that the release was effective to bar her dower, since such interest might be released to the owner of the fee or to anyone in privity with the fee as to a warrantor of the title for the benefit of the grantee. Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment now under review is one for the plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer, commenced in a justice's court, in which the defendant prevailed. On an appeal in the intermediate court of Kanawha county, the plaintiff prevailed, and the circuit court of said county refused a writ of error to the judgment.

The plaintiff having acquired the title to the premises in question, within the term prescribed by a lease thereof executed by his grantor, two years, commencing March 1, 1917, and while the lessee was in possession, on or about May 1, 1917, proceeds upon the theory of a forfeiture of the lease, occasioned by an assignment thereof by the lessee, executed April 3, 1918. It contains a covenant not to sublet the premises without the written consent of the lessor, but no covenant not to assign. The claim is that the assignment constitutes a breach of the covenant against subletting.

The lessor was U. G. Young; the lessee, Adleberg & Berman, Incorporated; the purchaser of the property, M. B. Goldman; and the assignees of the lease, Daniel Feder & Company. The premises are described as the store at 25 Capitol street, in the city of Charleston.

Failure of the plaintiff to disprove consent to the assignment by his grantor is relied upon by the defendant, as a defect in the case made by the evidence. Such consent, given long after the grantor had parted with his title, would have been unavailable. Such a covenant is for the benefit of the lessor and his assigns. The former no longer has any interest in it; wherefore he clearly has no right to give assent to an assignment of the lease or a subletting of the premises.

The vital question in the case is whether the assignment constituted a breach of the covenant not to sublet, and, as to it, there is some conflict in the authorities. That it does has been distinctly held in at least two cases. Greenaway v. Adams, 12 Ves. Jr. 395, 33 Eng. Reprint, 149; Den ex dem. Bockover v. Post, 25 N. J. L. 285. But the latter was overruled in Field v. Mills, 33 N. J. L. 254. It is claimed that Upton v. Hosmer, 70 N. H. 493, 49 Atl. 96, asserts this doctrine, and there are some expressions in the opinion that seem to countenance it; but the covenant not to sublet was read in connection with other provisions of the lease, which, in the opinion of the court, broadened its scope. In conclusion, the court said: "The purpose of the restrictive clause appears to have been, not so much to control the sale of the cottage, as to covenant against sub-

prohibit the lessee, his heirs and assigns, from making an assignment of the lease without first obtaining the consent of the lessor, his heirs and assigns."

Hence the covenant was construed to be one not to assign as well as one against subletting. In Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. Boston & D. R. Co. 65 N. H. 893, 23 Atl. 529, the covenant was not to assign, and the court held it had been broken by an assignment, not an underletting. In Berry v. Taunton, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 331, 78 Eng. Reprint, 581, the tenant devised the term, and the question was whether his act violated a covenant not to demise for more than from year to year. The court merely held that a devise was within the meaning of the word "demise." In Roe ex dem. Gregson v. Harrison, 2 T. R. 425, 100 Eng. Reprint, 229, 1 Revised Rep. 513, the covenant was against both subletting and assignment, wherefore either constituted a breach. In Doe ex dem. Holland v. Worsley, 1 Campb. 20, the covenant was not to assign or otherwise part with the premises. It obviously included both, as the court held. In Shattuck v. Lovejoy, 8 Gray, 204, the covenant by its terms went beyond a mere subletting. The tenant bound himself not to permit any other person or persons to occupy or improve the premises, without written consent of the lessor. Such, also, was the character of the covenant in Austin v. Harris, 10 Gray, 296. Under a statute providing that, "if lands or tenements are rented by the landlord to any person or persons, such person or persons renting said lands or tenements shall not rent or lease said lands or tenements during the term of said lease to any other person without first obtaining the consent of the landlord, his agent or attorney," both assignment and underletting, without consent, are forbidden. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Settegast, 79 Tex. 256, 15 S. W. 228. This conclusion was arrived at by application of the liberal rule of construction, which is generally held to be inapplicable to statutes imposing forfeitures.

Against this meagerness of authority for the proposition that an assignment is within the meaning of a covenant not to sublet, there stands a very considerable array of authority holding the contrary. Field v. Mills, 33 N. J. L. 254; Lynde v. Hough, 27 Barb. 415; Tiffany, Land. & T. § 48; Taylor, Land. & T. § 403. Covenants against assignments and against underletting are both strictly construed, because they are penal in character, working forfeitures, and because they are restraints upon alienation. 16 R. C. L. p. 832; Tiffany, Real Prop. § 46; Minor, Real Prop. § 417. To be within the operation of such a covenant, the thing done must fall within its terms, its letter, as well as within its spirit or purpose. This is the rule of strict construction. Besides, there is a vast difference in principle between an assignment and a sublease, as well as between <sup>covenant not to sublet—effect of assignment.</sup> their legal results. These differences render it impossible to say an assignment is within the terms of a covenant against subletting.

In the argument submitted for the defendant in error, § 21 of chapter 72 of the Code (§ 3800), defining the scope and effect of a covenant not to assign without leave, is invoked; but it clearly has no application. It does not define a covenant not to sublet. It merely provides a short and convenient form of the common-law covenant against assignments, or a substitute therefor; <sup>—statutory covenant against assignment.</sup> and all of its terms fall within the meaning of "assignment," not "demise" or "sublet." Though Kanawha-Gauley Coal & Coke Co. v. Sharp, 73 W. Va. 427, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 968, 80 S. E. 781, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 786, involved a lease containing a covenant not to sublet, and an assignment seems to have been treated by the parties as a possible breach, a decision as to its effect can hardly be said to have been rendered, since the case turned upon an issue as to waiver, and the court did not enter upon any inquiry as to the interpretation and effect of the covenant.

Under the principles and conclusion stated, there was no breach of the covenant, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Hence the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded.

ANNOTATION.

Assignment of lease as breach of covenant against subletting.

View that assignment is not breach of covenant.

On the theory that a sublease and an assignment of a lease are so distinct that the mention of one does not include the other, it is held in some jurisdictions that an assignment of the lease is not a breach of a covenant against subletting. Field v. Mills (1869) 33 N. J. L. 254; Lynde v. Hough (1857) 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 415; Re Dole [1899] 1 Ir. R. 113. And see the reported case (GOLDMAN v. DANIEL FEDER & Co. ante, 246).

Thus, in Field v. Mills (N. J.) supra, it appeared that the lessee held the premises under a covenant "not to let or sublet the whole or any part of said premises" without the written consent of the lessor. The lessee, without such consent, later assigned the premises, and the court held that such assignment was not a breach of the covenant, saying: "The usual rule of construction, and one which cannot be too sedulously guarded, is, that the intentions of parties to contracts must be gathered from the words used by them. The question never is, what purpose they intended to express, but what purpose they have expressed."

Now, an underletting is an entirely distinct thing from an assignment; and if, by construction, the one is to be held to embrace the other, it certainly must be by the application of a principle entirely anomalous. The rule thus introduced would seem to be this, if by the use of clear terms the doing of a certain thing is prohibited, and if in consequence thereof it seems very strange that something else was not likewise prohibited, that in such case we are to regard the latter act as within the prohibition. The admission of such a principle would seem to unsettle the entire system regulating the construction of contracts."

But in Den ex dem. Bockover v. Post (1855) 25 N. J. L. 285, it appeared that a lease contained a covenant by the tenant that he would not underlet the premises without the consent of the landlord. The tenant, without such consent, assigned the premises, and the assignee thereof in turn sublet them to the plaintiff. On a vacation of the premises by the assignee, the landlord re-entered the same and took possession. The assignee thereupon brought an action against the landlord to obtain the premises. It was held that while the assignment was a breach of the covenant against subletting, nevertheless, the breach gave the landlord no right of re-entry in the absence of a stipulation making a breach work a forfeiture or determination of the tenant's estate. In commenting on that decision and its apparent accord with the English case of Greenaway v. Adams (1806) 12 Ves. Jr. 395, 33 Eng. Reprint, 149, the court in Field v. Mills (N. J.) supra, said: "In Den ex dem. Bockover v. Post (1855) 25 N. J. L. 291, in the opinion delivered in this court, the case of Greenaway v. Adams was referred to with apparent approval, so as to justify, if not necessitate, the ruling made at the circuit in the present case. But in the reported case, this question, now presented, was only incidentally involved, and I do not understand that any matured opinion was intended to be expressed on the subject now decided. Indeed, from the studied caution displayed in the expressions used touching this doctrine, my inference is that it was left, ex industria, open for future consideration."

In Lynde v. Hough (1857) 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 415, an ejectment proceeding brought by the landlord against an assignee of the term, it was held that an assignment of the term by the lessee without the landlord's consent was not a breach of a covenant providing that the tenant would not let or underlet the whole or any part of the demised premises without the written consent of the landlord under the penalty of forfeiture and damages. The court said: "I cannot entertain any doubt that in an action of ejectment for the breach of a condition we must hold that the words 'let and underlet' mean a demise or underletting, and not an assignment, of the whole interest. . . . It seems plain to me that the literal meaning of the word 'let' does extend to an assignment of the term, and if so we have no right to speculate upon the question whether it would be reasonable or otherwise for a landlord to forbid an underlease, and not an assignment. It is enough that by a strict and literal interpretation of this covenant, it does not include such an assignment as was proved on the trial."

In Re Doyle [1899] 1 Ir. R. 113, it appeared that a lessee held the premises under a covenant not to let or demise the premises without the lessor's consent. The lessee assigned the premises. The assignee then sold the premises to a purchaser who refused to take them until the assignee obtained the lessor's consent to the assignment. It was held that the premises of the covenant restrained subletting only, and hence it was unnecessary for the assignee to obtain the lessor's consent to make title.

In some jurisdictions the rule appears to be that an assignment of a lease is a breach of a covenant against subletting. The cases upholding this view disclose, however, that in comparatively few was the exact point raised and decided, the holdings being in the main argumentative or by way of dictum or controlled by the peculiar terms of the covenant. Shattuck v. Lovejoy (1857) 8 Gray (Mass.) 204; Austin v. Harris (1858) 10 Gray (Mass.) 296; Harmon v. Dickerson (1916) — Mo. App. —, 184 S. W. 139; Upton v. Hosmer (1900) 70 N. H. 493, 49 Atl. 96; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Settegast (1891) 79 Tex. 256, 15 S. W. 228; Greenaway v. Adams (1806) 12 Ves. Jr. 395, 33 Eng. Reprint, 149.

The leading case in support of this view is Greenaway v. Adams (Eng.) supra. In that case it appeared that the lessee, without the consent of the landlord, agreed to sell her leasehold interest in a public house to the plaintiff, but the offer was rejected on the ground that she had no power to assign because of a covenant in her lease that she would not "let, set, or demise" the premises or any part for all or any part of the term without the written consent of the lessor. The lessee thereupon assigned to another, whereupon the first purchaser brought an action to compel the lessee to keep her agreement. It was held that an assignment was a breach of the covenant against subletting, hence specific performance would not lie. The court said: "It would be very strange if the landlord meant to restrain underletting, that he should not mean to forbid the tenant to part with the whole interest. Clearly, both according to the letter and the spirit, this covenant did restrain assignment without license."

In Shattuck v. Lovejoy (1857) 8 Gray (Mass.) 204, wherein a landlord sought to recover possession of the premises from the agent of the assignee, the case hinged on the remedy which the landlord should pursue for a breach of the covenants in the lease. It was held therein that where the lessee assigned the premises without the landlord's knowledge or consent, and in direct violation of the covenant that he would not "lease, underlet, nor permit any other person or persons to occupy" the premises,—an assignment was not by itself a termination of the estate, but that the landlord must re-enter in order to cause the estate to revert.

In Austin v. Harris (1858) 10 Gray (Mass.) 296, it appeared that a lessee held the premises under a lease providing that the lessee would not "lease nor sublet nor permit any other person or persons" to occupy the premises without the written consent of the landlord. The lessee, without the written consent of the landlord, assigned the premises to a purchaser, but the purchaser refused to take the same until the lessee had obtained the landlord's consent to the assignment. The lessee thereupon brought an action against the purchaser to recover the price agreed upon for the assignment. The court held that the assignment operated to terminate the lessee's estate, and hence it conveyed no title to the purchaser.

In Harmon v. Dickerson (1916) — Mo. App. —, 184 S. W. 189, it was held that the lessee could forfeit the estate of a sublessee for making an assignment of the lease in violation of the covenant that he would not "sublet or allow any other tenant to come in with or under him without the written consent" of the landlord.

In Upton v. Hosmer (1900) 70 N. H. 493, 49 Atl. 96, it appeared that the lease, in addition to the covenant that the lessee would not "underlet to any person unless with the consent" of the landlord, further provided that the lessee and his heirs would have the right at any time to remove a cottage which the lessee had built on the premises, but that the lessee should not "sell" the property to remain on the premises without the consent of the landlord. The court construed these provisions together and held that they restrained an assignment, saying: "Besides the lessee's covenant not to underlet without the lessor's consent, the lease provided that the lessee and his heirs should have the right at any time . . . to terminate their lease and remove his cottage; also that 'with the consent of the lessor' they might 'sell . . . the same, to be occupied on the premises.' No restrictions were placed upon the sale of the cottage after removal, upon a termination of the lease; but the lessee, his heirs and assigns, were not permitted to make a sale of it, to remain upon the premises, without the consent of the lessor; his heirs and assigns. The purpose of the restrictive clause appears to have been not so much to control the sale of the cottage, as to prohibit the lessee, his heirs and assigns, from making an assignment of the lease without first obtaining the consent of the lessor, his heirs and assigns."

But see Spear v. Fuller (1885) 8 N. H. 174, 28 Am. Dec. 391, where the lease provided that the lessee should not "lease nor underlet" the premises without the landlord's consent, and reserved no right of re-entry in case of a breach. The court held that an unauthorized assignment by the lessee did not work a forfeiture, but merely gave the landlord an action for damages.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Settegast (1891) 79 Tex. 256, 15 S. W. 228, it was held that an assignment, though not strictly within the letter, was nevertheless within the spirit of a statute (Rev. Stat. § 3122) providing as follows: "When lands or tenements are rented by landlords to any person or persons, such person or persons . . . shall not rent or lease said lands or tenements during term of said lease to any other person without first obtaining the consent of his landlord." Hence it was held that the landlord could cancel a lease made by him to one railroad company which was later, without his knowledge or consent, assigned to another. The court said: "The language employed in this article leads us to the conclusion that the person who framed it did not have in mind the technical distinction between an assignment and an underlease, and that it was not the intention to prohibit the one and allow the other. Both are equally within the evil which was sought to be remedied; and while an assignment does not come strictly within the letter it is within the spirit of the statute." M. T. McC.

PEARL MCCREERY JOHNSTON et al., Appts.,

v.

I. E. BEE et al.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 486.)

1. Grandchildren who have obtained their knowledge of their grandmother's handwriting only by inspection and repeated readings of letters from the grandmother to their mother, preserved by the family for a long period of time for sentimental reasons, are qualified to testify to their opinions as to the genuineness of the grandmother's signature.

— to handwriting of deceased person.

2. The handwriting of a deceased person is not necessarily nor always a personal transaction or communication between such person and another living and claiming rights under or against a document purporting to have been signed by the former; and if the latter knows the handwriting of the former, and has obtained his knowledge thereof otherwise than by observation of the deceased person's act of writing, or some other personal transaction, he is competent to express his opinion as to genuineness of the signature in question.

3. The opinion of a witness as to the genuineness of a signature, based upon limited opportunities for knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose signature is in question, may have but little probative value, but it is admissible.

4. As the opinions of nonexpert witnesses testifying merely from comparison of signatures, as to the genuineness of a particular signature, are entitled to no greater weight than the opinions of the jurors or the judge, only experts can so testify.

5. To be competent for such purpose, however, a witness need not be a professional handwriting student, critic, or expert. It suffices that in some way he has acquired peculiar knowledge and skill respecting the determination of the genuineness of written instruments and signatures,—more of such skill and knowledge than men ordinarily have. Bank cashiers are handwriting experts within the meaning of the rule.

Evidence — handwriting — standards for comparison.

6. Ancient letters, shown by the testimony of members of a family to have been written by the person whose signature is in question to her daughter, and preserved, for sentimental reasons long after the daughter's death, and ancient deeds, purporting to have been signed by such person and found in a public office in which they were lodged for recordation, may be used as standards of comparison on the issue as to the genuineness of the signature.

— investment — declaration of intent.

7. A written and sealed, but unacknowledged, declaration by a married woman of her intention to invest a trust fund in her hands in a certain tract of land then owned by her and her husband jointly, reciting the source of the fund, the previous conveyance of the land, and intent thereafter so to invest the fund, is not sufficient to prove actual investment of the fund in the land.

8. Being unable to dispose of or encumber her real estate, without the joinder of her husband in a deed or other contract respecting it, in the manner prescribed by law, a married woman cannot alone covenant to stand seised of her land to the use of another, nor declare a trust in it. Though she may bind her equitable separate estate by her sole contract so as to make it liable in equity, her separate statutory estate stands upon a different footing, and cannot be so bound.

— effect on separate estate.

9. While a declaration of intent to create a trust in property, made by a feme sole or other person having unlimited power of disposition of his property, may be binding upon him as a covenant to stand seised, or as a bargain and sale of the property, if founded upon a valuable consideration, a married woman is incapable of binding her separate statutory real estate in such manner.

[See 13 R. C. L. 1271.]

Trust — declaration of intention to create.

10. A mere declaration of intention to invest a trust fund in certain property does not create a trust therein. Impression of a trust upon the property requires actual investment of the fund in it.

(Williams, J., dissents in part.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Mercer County, in Chancery, dismissing on final hearing a bill filed for the enforcement of an alleged express executed trust in certain real estate. Reversed as to dismissal of bill.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. P. H. M. Patterson, R. D. Bailey, and French & Easley, for appellants:

Mrs. Bee having received the money which represented her dower in the land belonging to her first husband's estate, and having agreed to invest it in land at Princeton and receive the rents and profits of said land during her lifetime, in lieu of interest on the money, she is presumed to have acted in good faith and performed that duty, and not to have committed a breach of trust.

McCreery v. First Nat. Bank, 55 W. Va. 663, 47 S. E. 890; Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 226, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341.

Mrs. Bee, having received the one third of the proceeds from land representing her dower interest, with the understanding and agreement that she invest same in Princeton land and hold it as her dower land, is regarded in equity as having done so, and the

Pleading — prayer at bar of court.

11. Under the prayer for general relief in a bill seeking enforcement of an alleged trust in land, praying specially therefor, disclosing prima facie liability for a sum of money on the part of the alleged trustee, but failing as to the trust in the land, for lack of proof of investment in the fund in the land, there may be a decree for the trust fund, upon a prayer therefor at the bar of the court. But if the bill has been dismissed without the interposition of such a prayer in the court below or the award of such relief, the decree will be reversed in so far only as it dismissed the bill, and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to ask a decree for the amount of the trust fund.

Costs — award on appeal.

12. In such case, costs in the appellate court will be awarded to the appellants, as the parties substantially prevailing.

principle is the same as though she had stated she had actually invested the money in the Princeton land and held same as her dower in lieu of the Loudoun county land.

Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. §§ 364, 365; Atwood v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 85 Va. 966, 9 S. E. 748; 10 R. C. L. p. 383, § 133; Com. v. Martin, 5 Munf. 117.

The money received by Mrs. Bee never lost its identity as real estate, and there was merely a substitution of the Princeton land for the Loudoun county land as her dower, or, in short, the Loudoun county land was exchanged for the Princeton land.

Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 225, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341; Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Gratt. 160; Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997; Marshall v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. 300; Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 364; Com. v. Martin, 5 Munf. 117; Aston v. Kendrick, 90 Va. 825, 20 S. E. 827.

The writing executed by Mrs. Bee, leaving out of consideration the source from which the money was received, created an express trust which could not afterwards be revoked.

Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 226, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341; Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Gratt. 160; Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; McCandless v. Warner, 26 W. Va. 754; Campbell v. O'Neill, 69 W. Va. 459, 72 S. E. 732; Marshall v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. 300.

Messrs. Hugh G. Woods and John M. McGrath, for appellees:

The witnesses, being plaintiffs and heirs at law of Mary L. Bee, are incompetent to testify to any "personal transaction or communication" with Mary L. Bee, who is deceased.

Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 2 L.R.A. 668, 8 S. E. 498; Carter v. Gill, 47 W. Va. 504, 35 S. E. 828.

Testimony as to deceased's handwriting is testimony as to a "personal transaction or communication" within the meaning of chapter 50, § 23, of the Code.

Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657; Anderson v. Cranmer, 11 W. Va. 562; Trowbridge v. Stone, 42 W. Va. 454, 26 S. E. 363.

The witnesses, D. Howe Johnston and E. M. Payne, being husbands of two of the plaintiffs, are incompetent on the principle that where one consort is incompetent the other is also incompetent.

Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657; Bailey v. Bee, 73 W. Va. 291, 80 S. E. 454.

The witnesses, E. M. Senter, Alethia Prince McCreery Keatley, and Mrs. M. A. Lacy, had never seen Mary L. Bee write, and had no opportunity of knowing her handwriting, and were, therefore, incompetent to testify as to her signature.

Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. 870.

Evidence of certain witnesses, comparing the signature to the paper relied on as a declaration of trust, with the alleged signature of Mary L. Bee to certain deeds found in the clerk's office, is incompetent.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 576-578; 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1997.

The paper in question, on its face, or by its terms, does not create an express trust, and there is no evidence in aid of it.

1 Perry, Trusts, § 82; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1009; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 865; Smith's Estate, 144 Pa. 428, 27 Am. St. Rep. 641, 22 Atl. 916.

The paper could not create a resulting trust, because executed after the conveyance of the land on which the trust is alleged to have been impressed.

1 Perry, Trusts, § 188; Bright v. Knight, 35 W. Va. 40, 13 S. E. 63; Gilbert Bros. v. Lawrence, 56 W. Va. 281, 49 S. E. 155.

The declarations of Mary L. Bee, now deceased, that she did not, in fact, invest the money mentioned in the paper in the land therein referred to, but that she spent it on her son, A. J. Lacy, is competent evidence as one of the exceptions to the hearsay rule. It is admissible as being against interest and on the principle of necessity.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 109, 147; 1 R. C. L. p. 500, §§ 41-43; Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 128 N. Y. 420, 26 Am. St. Rep. 482, 28 N. E. 651; Halvorsen v. Moon & K. Lumber Co., 87 Minn. 18, 94 Am. St. Rep. 669, 91 N. W. 28; Overton v. Davison, 1 Gratt. 211, 42 Am. Dec. 544; Stewart v. Doak Bros., 58 W. Va. 173, 52 S. E. 95.

Title to the land in controversy had vested in Mary L. Bee two months before the date of the paper, and she could only divest herself of that title by a deed or in a court of record.

Crawford v. Workman, 64 W. Va. 19, 61 S. E. 322.

If Mary L. Bee had, in the most formal way, attempted to impress a trust on the land in controversy then owned by her and her husband, her act would have been absolutely void, because, in 1875, all contracts or bonds of a married woman were absolutely void at law and also in equity, except as to her separate estate.

Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997; Shumate v. Shumate, 78 W. Va. 576, 90 S. E. 824.

The one-half interest of Mary L. Bee in the land in controversy in this case was not "separate estate."

Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 397.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree complained of dismisses on final hearing a bill filed for enforcement of an alleged express executed trust in real estate, founded upon a valuable consideration.

The relationship of the parties is unquestioned. If there is such a trust as is set up and claimed in the bill, the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit thereof. They are the heirs at law of M. H. Lacey, who departed this life intestate prior to the year 1865, and at the date of his death owned a tract of land in Loudoun county, Virginia, containing 160 acres. On his death the title to this land vested by descent in his two children, Mollie K. McCreery, who died in 1887, leaving several children, and her brother, Andrew J. Lacey, who died intestate in 1906, subject to the dower right of Mary L. Lacey, the widow, who afterwards married Dr. Isaiah Bee, of Mercer county, and became a resident of Princeton, West Virginia. She died in 1907, leaving as her survivors her second husband and a son by him. The former died in November, 1912. The plaintiffs are the children of Mrs. McCreery and Andrew J. Lacey, claiming under the alleged declaration of trust made by their grandmother, Mrs. Mary L. Bee, in 1875, and the defendants are the representatives of the estate of Dr. Isaiah Bee, and the devisees under his wife's will. Before his death, Dr. Bee conveyed to his son, I. E. Bee, and his daughter-in-law valuable real estate and gave them the balance of his estate by will. Mrs. Bee gave all of her estate to her husband, in trust for a little girl reared by the family, and known in this record as Nellie Bee Campbell.

The bill proceeds upon the theory of a substitution of certain real estate at or near Princeton, in Mercer county, for one third of the Loudoun county land, to the rents and profits of which the widow was entitled for the period of her natural life. By a deed dated January 11, 1875, Andrew J. Lacey, Mrs. McCreery, and her husband, and Mrs. Bee and her husband, conveyed the Loudoun county tract of land to John Riticor for a cash consideration of $1,600. Of this sum two thirds belonged to the heirs absolutely, and they owned the other third, subject to the right of the widow to have the interest on it for and during her natural life. The bill charges that this one third, less its pro rata share of the expenses of sale, was invested by Mrs. Bee in a tract of 180 acres of land, situated at or near Princeton, in Mercer county, and conveyed to her and her husband by a deed dated March 8, 1875, and executed by William A. Wiley and Rhoda V. Wiley, his wife. The deed conveying the Loudoun county tract of land was admitted to record March 8, 1875, and the one conveying the Mercer county land March 10, 1875. The former was acknowledged on the day of its date, and the latter on the day after that of its date. After an unavailing effort to set aside the will of Mary L. Bee, and after the death of the late Senator John W. McCreery, the plaintiffs found among his papers, between June 1 and June 15, 1917, a paper relied upon as a written declaration of the trust claimed by the bill. Senator McCreery had been a lawyer, a business man, and, no doubt, the legal adviser of Mrs. Bee in the sale of the Loudoun county land. The paper in question reads as follows:

"$523. Recd of John W. McCreery the sum of Five hundred & twenty three dollars, one-third of the amount realized from the sale of Laceyville, (a tract of 160 acres of land lying in the County of Loudoun, in the State of Virginia, which belonging to the estate of my late husband Dr. M. H. Lacey Deed.) after deducting costs and expenses for selling said land, total sum $1569, which said sum of five hundred and twenty three 00/100 Dollars, one third of the $1569, I am going to invest in a tract of land, lately bought of Wm. Wiley & wife, lying near Princeton & containing 180 acres & receive the rents and profits of said land, during my lifetime in lieu of interest on said sum (said land was conveyed by said Wiley & Wife to Dr. I. Bee & myself

March 3rd /75, & recorded in Deed Book No. 7.

"Witness my hand and seal,

"[Seal] Mary L. Bee.

"May 5th 1875."

The principal grounds of defense were: (1) Nonexecution by Mary L. Bee of the paper relied upon as a declaration of trust; (2) lack of actual investment of the said sum of $523 in the Mercer county land; and (3) legal inability or incapacity of the alleged declarant to carry the trust into execution, her right and title in the land having been irrevocably fixed, it is claimed, by the deed from Wiley and wife before the date of the declaration of trust. On the trial the court below found for the plaintiffs on the first issue thus tendered, and for the defendants upon the second. This result rendered it unnecessary, in the opinion of the court, to enter upon any inquiry as to the soundness of the third position taken by the defendant. A contention of the plaintiffs is that the instrument relied upon creates an executed trust, since a court of equity regards what a party has agreed to do as having been done.

The objection interposed to the evidence of some of the plaintiffs as to the handwriting of the signature to the declaration of trust on the ground of incompetence by reason of interest is not well founded, if we are to be governed by the weight of authority. Of course, none of these parties would be competent as witnesses to prove the actual signing of the paper by Mrs. Bee, nor to qualify themselves by observation of her act of signing any paper; for that would have been a personal transaction within the meaning of the law. State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, 64 N. C. 313; Rush v. Steed, 91 N. C. 226; Wilber v. Gillespie, 127 App. Div. 604, 112 N. Y. Supp. 20. A decided weight of authority affirms the right of an interested person or party to testify to the handwriting of a signature purporting to be that of a deceased person, if he is otherwise qualified, even though he would be an incompetent witness to testify to the act of signing. In Iowa, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin the courts hold that such testimony involves no more than a matter of opinion, and does not relate to a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the decedent. 40 Cyc. 2327; Ware v. Burch, 148 Ala. 529, 42 So. 562, 12 Ann. Cas. 669, note 671; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 261. On the other hand, the contrary has been held in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, as will be seen by reference to the books already cited. The intermediate court of appeals of Indiana has apparently held both ways as to such testimony. Merritt v. Straw, 6 Ind. App. 360, 33 N. E. 657; Shirts v. Rooker, 21 Ind. App. 420, 52 N. E. 629. The decisions adopting the minority rule take the view that, inasmuch as proof of the signature authenticates or validates the document constituting the basis of the action, it virtually covers the whole case, and impliedly proves the entire transaction represented by the document. If, however, the ultimate effect of evidence admitted against the estate of a deceased person were the sole test of admissibility, much evidence not relating to personal transactions or communications would be inadmissible. Much authority and the terms of the statute deny that it is the true test. As to facts not amounting to or involving such transactions or communications, interested witnesses are competent. This is an unqualified and unlimited implication arising from the very words of the statute. There is no proviso saying they are competent only in the event that the fact has only limited probative force respecting the right involved or none at all. The statutory test is whether the fact in question is a personal transaction or communication or involves one. Davidson v. Browning, 73 W. Va. 276, L.R.A.1915C, 976, 80 S. E. 363. The chief purpose of the statute is to prevent the living party to a transaction from testifying because the other, being dead, cannot be produced to contradict him, in case of false swearing. Denial of right to the former to testify puts them on an equality. Faulkner v. Thomas, 48 W. Va. 148, 35 S. E. 915. If so, its reason does not apply here. One party cannot very well contradict another's mere opinion. Whether the witnesses in question were competent depends upon the means by which they obtained the knowledge of the handwriting of the decedent, constituting the basis of their opinions. They are not disqualified by reason of the nature of the fact to which their testimony relates.

The witnesses now under consideration, parties plaintiff, derived their knowledge of the handwriting of Mrs. Bee from letters written by her to their mother, in their early childhood, preserved by their mother until her death, and by them afterwards, for sentimental reasons, and frequently read and perused. These letters were not communications between them and Mrs. Bee, and they make no claim to any other source of knowledge of her handwriting.

Their inspection of these letters also qualified them to express opinions as to the genuineness of the signature in question.

There could scarcely be a better index to the genuineness of the letters than their preservation as heirlooms, tender remembrances, or sacred relics for more than forty years. Besides, it is clearly revealed by their contents,—messages of solicitude, advice, and love from mother to daughter. What is better calculated to make an impression on the minds of grandchildren than the written messages of their living grandmother to their dead mother? An administrator, having examined the papers of his intestate, may testify to his signature. Sharp v. Sharp, 2

Leigh. 249; Tucker v. Kellogg, 8 Utah, 11, 28 Pac. 870. A clerk through whose hands the correspondence of a deceased person with his employer has passed may testify as to the signature of the decedent. Rex v. Slaney, 5 Car. & P. 213; Reid v. Hodgson, 1 Cranch, C. C. 491, Fed. Cas. No. 11,667; Reyburn v. Belotti, 10 Mo. 597; Titford v. Knott, 2 Johns. Cas. 211. A member of a family is qualified by reason of his knowledge of family correspondence in which he had no part. Tuttle v. Rainey, 98 N. C. 513, 4 S. E. 475.

Disqualification for lack of knowledge is charged against S. F. Cleghon and E. M. Senter, the former having had business transactions with Mrs. Bee in 1886, 1887, and 1888, and the latter having received two letters from her in 1890 or 1891. On the question of admissibility, the extent of the knowledge of the witness is not controlling. However limited it may be, he is entitled to express his opinion. Evidence—opinion—handwriting.

Meagerness of knowledge or limitation of opportunity goes only to the weight of the evidence. Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. 870; Pepper v. Barnett, 22 Gratt. 405; Cody v. Conly, 27 Gratt. 313; Rogers v. Ritter, 12 Wall. 322, 20 L. ed. 419; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 259, 262.

The clerk of the county court of Mercer county, after having produced and filed five deeds dated in the years 1882, 1883, 1892, and 1893, and purporting to have been executed by Mary L. Bee, was permitted to testify, from his comparison of the signature in question with those found on the deeds, that said signature was, in his opinion, genuine. He did not claim to know the signature of Mrs. Bee, nor did it appear that he had had any extensive experience in any business requiring particular attention to signatures. Ten witnesses, holding positions in banks, most, if not all, of whom were cashiers, though admitting themselves not to be experts, were permitted to give their opinions, based upon comparison, that the signature was genuine. Their business involved and required close attention to signatures, but they did not deem themselves to be experts. Our statute permitting comparison of writings (§ 21a, chap. 130, Code [§ 4877]) does not in terms require witnesses testifying from comparison to be experts. It provides that genuine writings may be used with or without the testimony of witnesses, for the purpose of comparison. In some jurisdictions it is held, under similar statutes, that only experts can testify from comparison. Nonexperts are excluded because the members of the jury or the judge is as capable of making the test in that way as they are. Griffin v. State, 90 Ala. 596, 8 So. 670; Spottiswood v. Weir, 80 Cal. 448, 22 Pac. 289; Wimbish v. State, 89 Ga. 294, 15 S. E. 325; Woodman v. Dana, 52 Me. 9; First Nat. Bank v. Lierman, 5 Neb. 247; McKay v. Lasher, 42 Hun. 270; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 276; Wigmore, Ev. § 1997; Greenl. Ev. §§ 576, 578; Lawson, Expert & Op. Ev. p. 445. But such experts need not follow the profession of determining the genuineness of handwritings, nor possess anything more than peculiar or exceptional skill and knowledge of the subject of handwriting. It suffices that they are better qualified to express opinions on that subject than men usually are. Lawson, Expert & Op. Ev. p. 453; State v. Webb, 18 Utah, 441; 56 Pac. 159; Com. v. Nefus, 135 Mass. 538; Fairbank v. Hughson, 58 Cal. 314; State v. David, 131 Mo. 380, 33 S. W. 28; Sweetser v. Lowell, 33 Me. 446; Tower v. Whip, 53 W. Va. 158, 63 L.R.A. 937, 44 S. E. 179; Clay v. Alderson, 10 W. Va. 53. The bank officials, testifying as witnesses, come within this definition. It is a part of their daily business to pay out money on their belief in the genuineness of signatures, wherefore they devote more attention to handwriting than laborers, farmers, merchants, or men engaged in the ordinary professions, and obtain more knowledge and skill respecting signatures. They were competent witnesses, but the clerk of the county court, not having shown any evidence of more than ordinary knowledge of signatures, was not competent.

The objection that the deeds used as standards of comparison are not sufficiently authenticated is not well taken. They are solemn instruments, carefully prepared and executed, and taken from the files of a public office in which they were lodged as muniments of title, some of them more than thirty years before this controversy arose, and when Mrs. Bee still possessed the health and strength incident to middle age. Similar standards were admitted for comparison in Luco v. United States, 23 How. 515, 541, 16 L. ed. 545, 550. A deed more than thirty years old, and recorded, is presumed to be genuine. Geer v. Missouri Lumber & Min. Co. 134 Mo. 85, 56 Am. St. Rep. 489, 34 S. W. 1099; Webb v. Ritter, 60 W. Va. 193, 233, 54 S. E. 484.

The evidence thus produced by the plaintiffs, tending to prove the genuineness of the signature, is as full, complete, and satisfactory as they could be expected to make it under the circumstances, and is equally as reliable as that adduced by the defendants. The trial court's finding on this issue must, therefore, be permitted to stand.

The record discloses no direct or positive evidence of actual investment of the money received by Mrs. Bee from her first husband's estate in the Mercer county land. And the alleged declaration of trust says, by implication, that she did not pay that money for the land at or before the conveyance of one half thereof to her. The two land transactions were completed in March, 1875, and the paper declaring her intention to invest trust money in it and make it a trust subject was not executed until May 5, 1875, almost two months later. That declaration was prospective in its terms. Her language was, "I am going to invest in a tract of land lately bought," etc. This implies that she had not then invested it, and says the land had been bought. The paper adds, agreeably to the fact, that it had been conveyed to herself and her husband. The title had already vested in her without any qualification or limitation of any kind, and, according to competent evidence, the cash payment of $730 had been made by the husband alone, in live stock, and the deferred payments, amounting to $470, had not been paid as late as 1878 or 1879. It may be that the two land transactions were intended to be one, and to effect a substitution of the Mercer county land for the other; but this is indicated only by some of the circumstances, the ownership of the Loudoun county land, Mrs. Bee's right and duty, and the relation of the two transactions in point of time. On the other hand, the money received from the estate does not seem actually to have been invested. It was not equal in amount to half of the purchase money of the land, and two months after the land had been conveyed and the cash payment made Mrs. Bee declared it to be her intention to invest the money in that land. If resort could be had to surmise and conjecture, it might be said Dr. Bee made her a present of a half interest in the tract, or that he made the cash payment in live stock, expecting her to reimburse him to the extent of one half of the payment. But such guesses are altogether uncertain, and for that reason cannot be indulged in the disposition of a controversy of this kind.

Besides, there is an insuperable legal obstruction to the view that she could, by this declaration, impress a trust upon land the title to which had previously vested in her.

She could neither convey nor encumber such land otherwise than by an instrument executed in the manner prescribed by law. She could only do so by means of a deed or contract signed, sealed, and acknowledged by herself and her husband. Graham v. Long, 65 Pa. 383. This was not a separate estate which she might have bound in equity by her contract. It was her absolute property, which she could not charge, either at law or in equity, except by the joint action of herself and her husband and in the prescribed manner. Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997.

The argument submitted under the invocation of the maxim that equity regards what ought to be done, or what parties have agreed to do, as having been done, accords a scope to that doctrine much wider than any text-writer or reported decision indicates or warrants. If Mrs. Bee had actually bought the land in question with the trust fund she had in her hands, declaring her intention to take and hold it in trust, but had in fact taken an absolute conveyance to herself, equity would treat her as if she had done what she had declared it to be her intention to do. It would make her a trustee, and compel her to perform the trust in disregard of the terms of the deed. But her failure to invest the money in the land left her only a trustee of the money. She could become a trustee of the land only by actual investment of the money in it. Mr. Pomeroy states the doctrine clearly in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, 4th ed. vol. 2, § 587, as follows: "Whenever a trustee or other person standing in fiduciary relations, acting apparently within the scope of his powers, has trust funds in his hands which he ought, in pursuance of his fiduciary duty, to employ in the purchase of property for the purposes of the trust, and he does purchase property with such funds, but takes the title thereto in his own name, without any declaration of trust, then a trust with respect to such property at once arises in favor of the original cestui que trust or other beneficiary. Equity imputes an intention to fulfil the obligation resting upon the trustee; and, independently of any element of fraud, it regards the trustee as intending to perform the obligation,—as intending to act in accordance with his fiduciary duty, and not in violation thereof. It therefore treats the purchase as made for the benefit of the person beneficially interested. This doctrine is one of wide operation, of great efficiency, and is applied to every variety of persons occupying fiduciary relations."

Trust—declaration of intention to create.

In § 422, vol. 1, of the same work, emphasis is laid upon actual investment as an essential element of creation of the trust. It says: "Whenever a trustee or other person in a fiduciary position, acting apparently within the scope of his powers,—that is, having authority, by virtue of his trust or other fiduciary relation, to do what he does do,—purchases land or personal property with trust funds, or funds in his hands impressed with the fiduciary character, and takes the title to such property in his own name, without any declaration of a trust, a trust with respect to such property at once results in favor of the original cestui que trust or other beneficiary; the purchaser becomes, with respect to such property, a trustee. Equity regards such a purchase as made in trust for the person beneficially interested, independently of any imputation of fraud or fraudulent design, because it assumes that the purchaser intended to act, and was acting, in pursuance of his fiduciary duty, and not in violation thereof. This doctrine is one of wide operation, and is used by courts of equity with great efficiency in maintaining and protecting the beneficial rights of property. It has been applied to trustees proper, to executors and administrators, directors and managers of corporations, guardians of infant wards, guardians or committees of lunatics, agents using moneys of their principals, partners using partnership funds, husbands purchasing property with funds belonging to the separate estate of their wives, and to all persons who stand in fiduciary relations towards others. In order that this rule may apply, however, it must be made to appear with reasonable certainty that trust or other fiduciary funds were actually used in making the purchase. A court of equity, in order to raise a resulting trust, will not assume, from the mere fact that the purchaser had or might have had trust moneys in his hands, that he used them in paying for the property purchased, in the absence of evidence clearly showing such use by him."

The effort to make a distinction here on the ground of the character of the declaration fails, because it was one of unexecuted intention only. If the instrument had actually created a trust, the rights of the parties would have been governed strictly by the terms of the declaration. It would have defined the trust. But it admits no more than a trust in the money received. It shows on its face the title to the land had vested in Mrs. Bee while she still held the money. No trust in the land had been created, and it was legally impossible for her to impress a trust upon it, without prescribed co-operation of her husband. The argument erroneously assumes the existence of an express trust in the land.

Our concurrence in the view of the trial court that actual investment of the money in the land is essential to the establishment of the trust claimed, and that there is a total lack of proof of such investment, renders it unnecessary to enter upon an inquiry as to the admissibility of evidence of declarations of Mrs. Bee, admitted as matter of explanation of her possession, and as tending to prove she had spent all of the money she received from her husband's estate in the education of her son and payment of his expenses. The defendants prevail without the aid of that testimony. It is manifestly not admissible merely to prove payment of the money to the heirs.

Under the prayer of the bill for general relief, there might have been a decree for the money Mrs. Bee received as shown by her receipt and declaration of trust, but without interest for any time prior to her death. But the plaintiffs did not ask for such a decree and their right to the fund was in no way litigated. If demanded, it might be paid, or defenses of some kind might be set up against such demand. For this reason there can be no decree here for the money, though prima facie right to it is disclosed by the record. To decree it here might work surprise and injury. Under such circumstances, the practice is to remand the cause for the award of such relief, upon a proper application and successful resistance of any defense that may be set up. Furbee v. Furbee, 49 W. Va. 191, 38 S. E. 511; 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 349.

prayer at bar of the court.

Failure of the trial court to award such relief or afford the plaintiffs an opportunity to claim it constitutes an error for which the decree, in so far only as it dismisses the bill, must be reversed. Costs will be awarded to the appellants as the parties substantially prevailing.

Williams, J., dissenting in part:

I concur in all of the foregoing opinion except so much of it as remands the cause for entry of a decree by the lower court. The case is one which, in my opinion, calls for entry by this court of such decree as the lower court should have entered. Having reached the conclusion that plaintiffs had failed to establish a trust in the land in the hands of Mrs. Bee for their use, and seeing that they had proved a clear case entitling them to a decree against her separate estate for the money, the court should have given them such a decree, with interest thereon from the time of her death, and made it a lien upon her lands in the hands of her devisees. Her interest in the Princeton land, having been conveyed to her since the creation by statute of separate estates of married women, was her separate estate, and is liable, in equity, for her just obligations. Such decree is consistent with the special relief prayed for, and is such relief as ought to be accorded under the prayer for general relief, and I would enter such decree here.

ANNOTATION.

Knowledge derived from family correspondence as qualifying one to testify as to genuineness of handwriting.

Research has disclosed but few cases passing on the question indicated by the above title. The reported case (JOHNSTON v. BEE, ante, 252) holds, seemingly with sound reason, that family correspondence, preserved by the family for a long period of time for sentimental reasons, may form the basis of knowledge of handwriting by a member of the family who has frequently perused it.

The doctrine that knowledge derived from family correspondence in which he had no part may be sufficient to qualify a member of the family to testify as to the genuineness of handwriting is supported also by the decisions in Tuttle v. Rainey (1887) 98 N. C. 513, 4 S. E. 475, and Sweigart v. Richards (1848) 8 Pa. 436.

It was held in Tuttle v. Rainey (N. C.) supra, that the handwriting of a deceased grantor might be proved by testimony of his nephew, who, though he had never seen his uncle write, derived knowledge of his handwriting from numerous letters purporting to come from his uncle to his father about family matters and family business with which no one else was familiar, from newspapers to his father directed in the same handwriting, and from an autograph photo of his uncle which hung for years on the wall of the family home.

And on a question of boundaries, to prove that field notes were in the handwriting of the deputy surveyor, it was held that his grandson, who had never seen him write, might testify that the handwriting was genuine, where his knowledge was derived by comparison with the handwriting of the grandfather in entries in the family Bible, admitted to be his by all the family, and from many letters in his mother's possession purporting to have been written by her father, the decedent. Sweigart v. Richards (Pa.) supra. It was said: "It is true that this court have decided that the witness who testifies from a comparison of handwriting must have the highest evidence of the authenticity of the standard paper, which would usually be that of some person who had seen the person write it, or evidence of equal authority. Now it appears to me that the family record, admitted and received by all the descendants as his genuine handwriting, is of as high authority and verity as a standard or test as the evidence of a person would be who testified to the standard paper from having seen it written."

On an issue whether a family pedigree was, as it purported to be, in the handwriting of the claimant's ancestor, it was held, in Fitzwalter v. Peerage (1843) 10 Clark & F. 193, 8 Eng. Reprint, 716, that one who had been the family solicitor for many years, and testified that he had acquired a knowledge of the handwriting of the ancestor from his acquaintance with a great number of title deeds, account books, and other instruments purporting to have been written by him, was competent to testify as to the genuineness of the handwriting in question.

But where a witness had not seen a lost letter for more than fifteen years, and her only familiarity with the handwriting of the person whose signature the letter purported to bear was derived from her having seen him write his name in an autograph album about a year before she had seen the letter and about nineteen years before the trial, when the witness was only thirteen years old, it was held that the court rightly declined to base its judgment as to the genuineness of the signature on her testimony. Murphy v. Murphy (1910) 146 Iowa, 255, 125 N. W. 191.

And in Carr v. Carr (1904) 138 Mich. 396, 101 N. W. 550, it was held that the wife of a mortgagee was not competent to testify to the handwriting of the deceased mortgagor, her husband's brother, whom she had never seen, although both she and her husband testified that the mortgagor had frequently acknowledged the debt in letters which he had sent to them and which had been destroyed.

JOEL A. TAYLOR.

(130 Ark. 522, 197 S. W. 1172.)

Damages — for destruction of property — cost of reproduction.

1. The measure of damages for destruction of property, the value of which depends upon its connection with the soil, is the difference in the value of the land before and after the destruction, and for the destruction or injury of property that can be replaced in substantially the condition in which it existed before injury, the measure is the cost of so replacing it.

[See note on this question beginning on page 277.]

Evidence — origin of fire — cause of other fire.

2. Upon the question whether or not a fire was set out by the locomotive of a railroad company, which, if it was so set out, would, under the statute, render the railroad company liable for the value of the property destroyed without regard to the question of its negligence, evidence is admissible that another fire was set out on the same lot a day or two before the one in question, by railroad engines.

[See 11 R. C. L. 996.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County (Driver, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for destruction of plaintiff's property by fire alleged to have been set out by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Daniel Upthegrove, J. R. Turney, Hawthorne & Hawthorne, Troy Pace, and Gordon Frierson, for appellants:

The rule with reference to reception in evidence of testimony as to other fires at different times is that, where the engine is identified, such evidence is inadmissible unless it be shown that such former fires were set out by the particular engine in question, and within a reasonably close time to the occurrence of the fire sued upon.

Messrs. L. Hunter and Holifield & Harrison for appellee.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Iron Mountain Railway Company ran certain of its freight trains over the tracks of the Cotton Belt Railway Company through the town of Rector, one of which, according to the contention of appellee, set fire to his mill and destroyed it. On appellee's part there was proof of the absence of any cause for the fire except from sparks thrown out by a passing engine. It was shown that a heavy train of seventy or eighty cars stopped at a tank, at a distance of twenty or thirty car lengths from the mills, to take water, and that fifteen or twenty minutes thereafter the mill was discovered afire, and that at the nearest point the track was only 80 feet from the mill, and that a strong wind was blowing at the time in the direction to carry the sparks from the engine to the mill.

Over appellant's objection, evidence was admitted showing that other fires had been set out by railroad engines in the vicinity of the fire involved in this suit. But there was no evidence that the particular engine, or any engine of the Iron Mountain Railway Company, had previously set out a fire. Nor was there any evidence that this engine was equipped with a spark arrester differing in any manner from those used by other engines on either the Iron Mountain or the Cotton Belt Railway.

The complaint itemized the property destroyed by fire and alleged its value, and witnesses testified as to the value of the various articles so destroyed. Among other property destroyed were seven or eight thousand laths, some gum logs, 2,000 feet of gum box boards, 2,000 feet of cypress, and 1,500 feet of poplar lumber, together with various kinds of saws, and the engine, boiler, and other fixtures, together with the building under which these things were housed. Other witnesses were permitted to testify to the difference in the value of the land before the fire and afterwards.

Over appellant's objection, an instruction was given which told the jury that the measure of damages was the difference in value of the land immediately before and immediately after the fire, whereas appellant asked the court to charge the jury on that subject as follows: "The plaintiff is limited in his recovery in this action to the reasonable market value of the property entirely destroyed, and to the difference between the reasonable market value of the property destroyed, immediately before the fire, and the sum it would cost to restore the damaged property to its original condition, and the value of the use of property until it could be restored with ordinary care."

We presume that the last part of this instruction refers to property partially destroyed.

In the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Jones, 59 Ark. 105, 26 S. W. 595, it was said: "And it was inadmissible to show that other engines had set fire to materials on or near the right of way, as a circumstance to show that the engine which caused the fire on this occasion, or its appliances, were defective or in bad condition. For such purpose the proof would have to be confined to fires caused by the engine that is said to have caused the fire that burned the appellant's meadow."

The language of that opinion must be read, however, in connection with the issue there being considered. It was there sought to be shown that the railway company had negligently set out a fire, and in that connection it was said that it could not be shown that other engines had set out a fire as a circumstance to show that the engine which caused the fire in question was equipped with defective appliances, but that for such purposes the proof would have to be confined to fires caused by the engine which set out the fire in question. In this opinion, however, it was said: "The evidence that other fires had occurred on the line of the railroad than the one which destroyed the plaintiff's meadow was improperly admitted, as it was not shown that these fires were caused by the engines of the railroad, or that they occurred from the operation of its trains. If this had been shown, it might have been admissible as a circumstance tending to show that the condition of the right of way of the railroad was such that a fire might have occurred from sparks escaping from its engines, and igniting the dry grass and inflammable material on its right of way. But the fact that other fires had occurred, without proof that they were caused by the railroad, was inadmissible."

The question of negligence is not involved in this case, and the jury was required only to find the origin of the fire, and if that responsibility was placed on the railroad company, liability for the damage resulting attached without regard to the question of negligence. Act 141 of the Acts of 1907, page 336.

This evidence was offered "as a circumstance tending to show . . . that a fire might have occurred from sparks escaping from the engine" which passed the mill shortly before the fire occurred. Of course, there must be such substantial similarity of conditions in the proof of other fires as to make it reasonable and probable that the same cause existed to produce the same result. This similarity of condition existed here, as the testimony objected to related to a fire set out in grass near the mill "within a morning or two of the fire which destroyed the mill." And no attempt was made to show that any difference existed in the equipment of the engines to arrest the emission of sparks.

The identical question here raised was considered and decided by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of Campbell v. Missouri P. R. Co. 121 Mo. 340, 25 L.R.A. 175, 42 Am. St. Rep. 530, 25 S. W. 936. There the testimony objected to was that other fires, both before and subsequent to the one in question, at different places on the line of defendant's railroad, had been started by sparks from some of defendant's engines. Here we have a much closer similarity of conditions as a predicate for the admission of the questioned testimony, for here both fires were set out in the same lot and within a day or two of each other. But under the facts stated, the supreme court of Missouri, upon a review of the authorities, held the evidence admissible. Among other cases cited and quoted from was the case of Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 470, 23 L. ed. 362, as follows: "Mr. Justice Strong, who wrote the opinion of the court, says: 'The question has often been considered by the courts in this country and in England; and such evidence has, we think, been generally held admissible, as tending to prove the possibility, and consequent probability, that some locomotive caused the fire.' He follows this statement of the law by a number of citations, both English and American, including the case of Sheldon v. Hudson River R. Co. 14 N. Y. 228, 67 Am. Dec. 155. Further on in the same opinion the judge says: 'The particular engines were not identified, but their crossing raised at least some probability, in the absence of proof of any other known cause, that they caused the fire; and it seems to us that, under the circumstances, this probability was strengthened by the fact that some engines of the same defendant, at other times during the same season, had scattered fire along their passage.' To the same effect are the following cases: Smith v. Boston & M. R. Co. 63 N. H. 25; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 3 C. C. A. 264, 10 U. S. App. 375, 52 Fed. 711; Thatcher v. Maine C. R. Co. 85 Me. 509, 27 Atl. 519."

The supreme court of Missouri concluded its review of the authorities cited with the following statement: "We think the evidence tended to prove the possibility, and consequent probability, that the fire was communicated to plaintiff's property from one of defendant's engines, and that the evidence was admissible, and its probative force was for the determination of the jury. If the issue had been of negligence in the construction or management of the engine only, and the engine which could only have caused the damage had been clearly identified, evidence that other engines emitted sparks and set fires would have been inadmissible under the decisions of this court. Coale v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 227; Patton v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 87 Mo. 117, 56 Am. Rep. 446. But in case the fact whether the fire originated from the engine was alone in issue, and there was no direct proof of the fact, it seems very clear that such evidence would have some tendency to prove that issue. The evidence was all circumstantial, and the facts testified to were circumstances, though slight they may have been, bearing upon the issues." See also Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Harrell, 58 Ark. 455, 25 S. W. 117, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 144.

We concur in the reasoning of that court as applied to the facts of this case, and hold that no error was committed in the admission of the testimony objected to.

We think the court should have instructed the jury on the question of the measure of damages in accordance with the contention of appellant. Here a portion of the property destroyed was lumber and logs and laths, and certain other personal property, the value of which and the damage to which was in no wise dependent upon the value of the land or the damage to it.

It is true this court held, in the case of Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Wilson, 119 Ark. 143, 171 S. W. 484, where a fire set out in a pasture burned the grasses and grain growing thereon, and the fence inclosing it, that the measure of damages was the difference in the value of the pasture before the fire and after the fire. And the same measure of damages was approved in the case of Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Phillips, 97 Ark. 54, 133 S. W. 191, where the property destroyed was an orchard. But these cases must, of course, be read in the light of the facts there recited, and we must have in mind the character of the property there destroyed.

W. 159, it was said that the measure of damages for the destruction of trees on the land by fire was the difference between the value of the land with the trees unburned and with the trees burned. After announcing this measure of damages, the court gave as a reason therefor that the trees were a part of the freehold, and could not be replaced in a short time, and only at considerable expense, and that "the destruction of the trees was a depreciation in the value of the land, of which they were a part."

In 8 R. C. L. page 484, the measure of damages for the destruction of property attached to the realty is discussed. It is there said: "Section 46. Property Attached to Realty.—In cases of injury to real estate the courts recognize two elements of damage: First, the value after separation from the freehold, if any, of the thing taken, injured, or destroyed; and, second, the damage to the realty, if any, occasioned by the severance. The measure of damages in such cases depends to some extent on the character of the property taken or destroyed,—a distinction being often made between property whose chief value consists in its connection with the soil and its incidental enhancement of the value of the land, and those improvements which may be replaced at will, and whose value may readily be determined, apart from the ground on which they rest. Thus, if the property destroyed or injured is so closely connected with the real estate on which it stands or to which it is attached that it has no value separate from and independent of the real estate, or if the injury is to the soil itself, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the real estate before the injury and after it. On the other hand, the value of the property destroyed, or the cost of restoring or replacing such property, is the proper measure of damages for the destruction of buildings, fences, and other improvements, which may at once be replaced, where the exact cost of restoring the property destroyed is capable of definite ascertainment, and where there is no damage to the realty itself. Added to this, the right is generally given to recover for the loss of the use of the property. Some courts hold that where property attached to the realty is destroyed, the owner has his election to sue either for the value of the thing destroyed or for the injury to the freehold, or, in other words, he may seek to recover the value of the destroyed property in its detached form or its value as a part of the realty. If recovery is sought for the value of the property destroyed in its detached form, the measure of damages is its market value when so detached; but if recovery is sought for the injury to the freehold by reason of the taking or destruction of property attached thereto, the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the land before and after the injury. There is considerable conflict of authority in the application of the foregoing rules to cases where a recovery is sought for the destruction of growing crops. In some cases it is held that the proper measure of damages is the value of the crop at the time and place and in the condition it was in when it was destroyed, and in others that it is the difference in the value of the land on which the crop is growing. A similar conflict exists in the case of trees, some courts holding that the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the injury; while others hold that the value of the trees destroyed is the proper measure of damages. It has been held that damages caused by the destruction of fruit trees may be measured by estimating either their value as a distinct part of the land, or the difference in value of the land before and after their destruction; and that, where both methods are resorted to in the same case, the damages must be ascertained by the jury from all the evidence."

In the note to the text quoted many cases are cited bearing upon this subject, several of which are annotated cases.

In a suit for damages for the destruction of a house by fire, the supreme court of Iowa, in holding that the measure of damages was the value of the house, said: "The fundamental principle in all actions for damages is that just compensation be made to him who has suffered injury from another in his person or property, and in order to give satisfaction, measured in money, such rules are formulated as are thought best adapted to accomplish this purpose. A distinction has, for this reason, been made between growing crops, shrubs, and trees, whose chief value is because of their connection with the soil and their incidental enhancement of the value of the land, and those improvements which may be replaced at will, and whose value may readily be determined apart from the ground on which they rest." McMahon v. Dubuque, 107 Iowa, 62, 70 Am. St. Rep. 143, 77 N. W. 517, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 147.

In 33 Cyc. pages 1389-1391, many cases are cited which deal with the measure of damages for property destroyed by fire, and in the text of this article it is said: "Where buildings are injured or destroyed it is ordinarily held that they are capable of a separate valuation, and that the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of its destruction."

All of the cases cited in the note to this text supported it, and none approved a different measure of damages.

We think our own cases, when construed in connection with the facts to which the principles there announced were applied, result in the following statement of the law: That, if the value of the property destroyed depends upon its connection with the soil, the measure of the damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire. But, if the property destroyed could be replaced in substantially the condition in which it existed before the fire, then the measure of the damages is the cost of so replacing it.

The case of Dodd v. Read, 81 Ark. 13, 98 S. W. 703, is not in conflict with this view, but is in harmony with it. That was a suit for damages for the value of a building, and it was there said that the true inquiry was as to the cash market value of the building, and the opinion recites the evidence of the carpenter who was the only witness for the plaintiff on the subject of value, and who testified that the house was worth only $200, and a remittitur was ordered of the part of the judgment in excess of that sum. See also St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Shore, 89 Ark. 418, 117 S. W. 515, 16 Ann. Cas. 939; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Boles, 88 Ark. 533, 115 S. W. 375; Dwight v. Elmira, C. & N. R. Co. 132 N. Y. 199, 15 L.R.A. 612, 28 Am. St. Rep. 563, 30 N. E. 398.

The facts of this case show not only the wisdom and justice, but the necessity, for the rule we now approve. Much of the property destroyed was not even fixtures, and, under the measure of damages given by the court, the jury could not properly have allowed compensation for its destruction. No contention was made that the land itself had sustained any damage; but the property destroyed was a sawmill, with the building which housed it, and the numerous articles of purely personal property used in connection therewith, the value of which was testified to by the witnesses, and which included, among other things, some lumber which had been manufactured on the very day of the fire. The plaintiff was entitled to compensation for this property, although the measure of damages given would not have warranted its assessment; yet, according to appellant, these damages were allowed, together with damages which exceeded the value of the property destroyed when estimated under the rule here approved; and, as we cannot affirmatively say that such is not the case, we must reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial.

NOTE.

The cost of a building, or the repairs thereto, as a necessary or proper element in fixing damages for its destruction or injury, is considered in the annotation following KENNEDY v. TRELEAVEN, post, 277.

v.

PHILIP SENDEL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals — November 2, 1917.

(177 Ky. 535, 197 S. W. 974.)

Damages — Injury to property — cost of restoring.

1. The measure of damages to a building caused by blasting operations is a sum sufficient to restore the property to substantially the condition it was in prior to the injury, and such further sum as will compensate the owner for the diminution in the value of the use of the property during the continuance of the injury if it is occupied by the owner, or diminution in rental value if it is rented.

Public improvement — liability for injury to private property.

2. One performing work under contract with a city for a public improvement is not absolved from liability for injury inflicted upon private property on the theory that he is acting as agent of the municipality in performing a function of government.

Pleading — damages — supplemental petition.

3. The damages for injury to a building by blasting must be limited to those claimed in the petition, although a supplemental petition is filed claiming damages arising after the filing of the petition, if the latter are not separated from other items of injury.

Trial — instructions — measure of damages.

4. Instructions upon measure of damages for injury to personal property must specify the damages to which plaintiff is entitled, not merely state that he is entitled to such damages as would fairly and reasonably compensate him for the injury.

[See 8 R. C. L. 661.]

Damages — injury to lumber.

5. The measure of damages for injury to lumber and staves is the difference in its market value immediately before and immediately after the injury, at the place of injury.

Appeal — instructions given by consent.

6. There can be no objection to an instruction given by consent.

[See 14 R. C. L. 815.]

Blasting — liability for injury — negligence.

7. One is liable for injuries caused by casting debris on another's property by blasting, regardless of the question of his negligence.

[See 11 R. C. L. 673.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, in favor of plaintiff, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by defendants' blasting operations. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Dallam, Farnsley, & Means, for appellants:

The injury and the nuisance were both temporary, and the instructions should have been given on this point only.

When the court told the jury to find whether the injury was permanent or temporary, it was error not to define the two kinds of injuries.

Plaintiff is entitled to recover either the difference between the value of the property immediately before and immediately after the injury, or the cost of repair where it is necessary to make repairs, and the difference in the value of the property immediately before the injury and immediately after the repairs, if in fact the property as repaired is not worth as much as it was worth before the injury.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1914, the appellants, John H. Cahill, C. W. Adams, and John L. Sullivan, partners, doing business under the firm name of Adams & Sullivan, under a contract with the city of Louisville for that purpose, undertook to open out and widen the bed of Bear Grass creek, at a point within the corporate limits of the city, and where a lot owned by the appellee, Philip Sengel, adjoined the creek. There were situated upon appellee's lot, in close proximity to the creek, several buildings, two of which appellee was wont to let to rent, and another in which he kept an office, and another was a cooper shop newly built, in which was machinery used in the business of a cooper, and also upon the lot was a considerable quantity of staves to be manufactured into barrels. The appellants in their operations did a large amount of blasting in order to remove the rocks and possibly other obstructions from the stream, and, in so doing, continued the blasting at intervals, from time to time, for several months. The appellee claims that the blasting was extremely heavy, and cast showers of stones, some of considerable weight, and dirt, and other debris upon the ground and buildings and staves. The stones, falling upon the roofs of the buildings, perforated the roof in many places, and, falling upon his staves, split and otherwise injured them, while the concussion from the force of the blasting blew in his windows, split the wall of one building, and shook the plaster from the walls and ceiling, thereby tearing the paper from the walls and rooms of the houses, and frightened away his tenants, and caused his dwelling houses to be unoccupied for several months. The damages necessitated the repairing of the roofs and buildings, generally, and required the services of tinner, carpenters, plasterers, and glaziers. These matters the appellee complained of in a petition which he filed on the 22d day of April, 1915, and, in an amended petition which he thereafter filed, setting up and seeking damages which he had suffered after the filing of the original petition. In all, he claimed damages in the sum of $2,500. The appellants denied all the allegations of the petition and amended petition, and as a further defense, in a second paragraph of the answer, alleged that while engaged in the opening, widening, and adjusting the creek and its banks, they were engaged, as agents of the city, in performing and carrying out a function of government, and hence are not liable to appellee for any of the alleged damages. The court sustained a general demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer. When a trial was had of the action, the verdict of the jury fixed the appellee's damages at the sum of $1,500, and a judgment was rendered by the court in accordance with the verdict.

The appellants' motion for a new trial being overruled, they have appealed to this court, and insist as errors of the trial court which were to their substantial prejudice, the giving of the instructions, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, by the court to the jury, and the sustaining of the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, to all of which they objected and saved exceptions.

(a) Touching the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, but little doubt can be entertained of the correctness of the judgment of the court. The cities and other municipalities may construct sewers and other similar improvements, and do so, as an exercise of their governmental functions, but it would scarcely require any citation of authority to establish that the city itself would not have authority, in the construction of a street, sewer, or other improvement, to destroy or injure the property of its citizens, without making just compensation, and one with whom the city contracts to do a public work is certainly not immune from damages for injuring or destroying private property in the prosecution of the work, as he could enjoy no more favored position than the city. Section 242 of the Constitution provides that municipal corporations, which have the right to take private property for public use, may not do so unless they make compensation for the property taken, injured, or destroyed, and the compensation shall be made or secured before the property is injured or destroyed. *Pickerrill v. W. 1029; Paducah v. Allen, 111 Ky. 361, 98 Am. St. Rep. 422, 63 S. W. 981; Clayton v. Henderson, 103 Ky. 228, 44 L.R.A. 474, 44 S. W. 667; Madisonville v. Hardman, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 253, 92 S. W. 930; Louisville v. Hehemann, 161 Ky. 523, L.R.A. 1915C, 747, 171 S. W. 165; Park Comrs. v. Prinz, 127 Ky. 460, 105 S. W. 948; O'Gara v. Dayton, 175 Ky. 395, L.R.A. 1917E, 574, 194 S. W. 380.

The appellee by the amended petition specifically alleged the damages which he had incurred, claiming separate amounts for the damages suffered by reason of the injuries from the blasting to his cooper shop and factory; the damages from the blasting and subsequent injuries to the cottage which he held for renting, to the building used as an office, and the shed thereto, and the damages for the injuries to his lumber and staves. The damages claimed in the particular amounts set out in the amended petition were those which had been sustained at the time of the filing of the petition. The amended petition also claimed damages which had been suffered after the filing of the petition, in the same way and for the same character of injuries as alleged in the petition, but the damages to the various pieces of property were not separated, but alleged to be of the gross sum of $500.

The first instruction submitted to the jury the question whether the injury done to the factory and cooper shop was permanent or temporary in character.

The second instruction directed the jury, that if the damages to the factory and cooper shop were permanent in character, to find for the plaintiff such a sum as would reasonably represent the difference between the fair market value of the factory and cooper shop immediately before the injury was done by the blasting, and its fair market value immediately after the injury, not exceeding $452.60, and such a sum as would fairly and reasonably compensate the appellee for the reasonable cost of putting the roofs of the factory and cooper shop in substantially the same condition as they were before the injury, not exceeding on that account the sum of $297.45.

The third instruction directed the jury, that if it believed that the injuries to the factory and cooper shop were temporary, to find for appellee such a sum as would reasonably compensate him for the diminution in the value of the use of the factory and cooper shop, caused directly by the blasting, during the period which was reasonably necessary for making the repairs, not exceeding $462.50, and such sum as would fairly compensate him for the cost of putting the roofs of these buildings in substantially the same condition they were in before the injury, not exceeding $297.45.

The $297.45 mentioned in the instructions was the amount which appellee claimed that he had expended in repairs upon the factory and cooper shop because of the injuries resulting from the blasting, up to the filing of the petition, and the $462.50 was what he claimed was the difference between the value of the roof immediately before the blasting, and its value after the repairs to it had been made by him. The fault in these three instructions is the error in submitting to the jury any question of a permanent injury to the buildings, and it is not in accordance with the measure of damages adopted in this state for injuries to buildings arising from blasting operations. There is not such a permanent injury to the buildings as could not be repaired. The measure of damages to a house, caused by blasting operations, is a sum Damages—injury to property—cost of restoring. sufficient to restore the property to substantially the condition it was in prior to the injury, and such a further sum as will compensate the owner for the diminution in the value of the use of the property during the continuance of the injury, if it is used or occupied by the owner, or, if let to rent, the diminution in the rental value of the property during the continuance of the injuries. Lexington & E. R. Co. v. Baker, 156 Ky. 431, 161 S. W. 228; Southern R. Co. v. African M. E. Church, — Ky. —, 121 S. W. 972; Pickerrill v. Louisville, 125 Ky. 229, 100 S. W. 873; *Wallingford v. Maysville & B. The damages claimed on account of the factory and cooper shop, however, should not exceed $759.95, the amount claimed in the petition up to the filing of the original petition.

In place of instruction 4, which directed the jury to find for the appellee such a sum as would fairly and reasonably compensate him for the reasonable cost of repairing the damages, as resulted directly from the blasting, to the office building and shed, not exceeding $790.25, the instruction should have fixed the measure of damages for the injuries to that building and shed, as is directed with reference to the damages to the factory and cooper shop. The instruction as given does not include any damages on account of the diminution in the value in the use of the building, and the appellee was entitled, in addition thereto, to such a sum as would be reasonably necessary to restore the building to the condition it was in immediately before the injury.

Instruction number 5, with reference to the damages claimed on account of the injuries to the cottages on Lampton street, is not subject to criticism, and fairly stated the measure of damages to which the appellee was entitled.

Instruction number 6, which directed the jury to award the appellee such a sum in damages as would fairly and reasonably compensate him for any damages to his lumber and staves, resulting directly from the blasting, not exceeding the sum of $115, has the fault of not setting out and directing the jury as to the measure of damages to which appellee was entitled. The measure of damages to such personal property as lumber and staves is the difference between the fair market value of the staves immediately before the injury and their market value immediately thereafter, at the place of the injury. Instruction number 7, which directed the jury to allow the damages sustained by the appellee by reason of the blasting, after the filing of the original petition, on April 22, 1915, does not give the jury any measure of damages to control it in arriving at a verdict, but left it to fix the measure of damages upon any rule which might occur to it as furnishing the appellee fair and just compensation. The instruction should have directed a measure of damages, as applied to the different species of property, as heretofore indicated in this opinion.

Instruction number 8 was given by agreement of the parties, and no objection can be heard to it here.

NOTE.

The holding in the reported case (ADAMS v. SENDEL, ante, 268) that the cost of restoring the property is properly to be considered in determining the damages for an injury to property is in harmony with the weight of authority, as is shown in division III. of the annotation following KENNEDY v. TRELEAVEN, post, 277.

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County (Whitcomb, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent destruction of a building by fire. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. L. S. Ferry, T. F. Doran, and M. F. Cosgrove, for appellant:

In an action for the recovery of the value of a building destroyed by fire, in order to make evidence as to the cost of rebuilding the same competent there must also be produced evidence showing the original cost and the depreciation from use, age, and other causes.

Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Galvin, — Okla. —, 158 Pac. 1153, L.R.A. 1917A, 365.

The measure of damages is the difference between the market value of a house and lot before and after a fire in which the house is destroyed.

Pacific Exp. Co. v. Smith, — Tex. —, 16 S. W. 998; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Lasker Real Estate Asso. 81 Tex. 81, 16 S. W. 792.

The circumstantial evidence produced by plaintiff is too remote and speculative a guess, and compels an unwarranted presumption upon which to found a judgment.

Heinz v. Consumers' Light, Heat & P. Co. 81 Kan. 266, 105 Pac. 527.

It was error for the court to direct the attention of the jury to only a part of the evidence, and instruct them to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

As there was no evidence to show the original cost of the building, the admission of evidence as to the reproduction cost was improperly admitted.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover damages for the negligent destruction of a building. A judgment in favor of the plaintiff was recovered, from which the defendant appeals.

J. L. Kennedy, the plaintiff, owned a residence in Oakland estimated to be worth $2,000, which had been insured for $1,000, and he only asked judgment for $1,000. The defendant company had been supplying gas for the residence during its occupancy by a tenant who had just moved out of the building, and when he did so notice was given the defendant of the vacancy, and it was asked to come and cut off the gas. In pursuance of the notice, an agent of the defendant obtained the key and entered the building, when he read the meter and undertook to cut off the gas, but negligently left it open so far as to allow gas to escape. A neighbor who was present when the agent was in the building called his attention to the fact that gas seemed to be escaping, and in order to test it the agent touched a match to the gas at the end of a pipe that had been disconnected from a stove. The gas was ignited and burning, but the agent stated that there was no more gas escaping than there was in the pipe above the cut-off. He left the gas burning and shortly afterwards the building was consumed by fire.

The principal question on this appeal is whether or not the plaintiff established the extent of the loss by competent and sufficient proof. The question was raised by an objection to evidence and an instruction of the court as to the character of evidence by which plaintiff's damages might be measured. There was sufficient evidence as to the origin of the fire, and that it resulted from the negligence of the defendant to uphold the verdict. Testimony was offered as to the size, plan, material, finish, and condition of the building burned. There was also testimony in regard to the cost of constructing a house of the kind burned, and also as to the deterioration of the building from the time it was erected until it was destroyed. The house had been built of white pine, which witnesses said was better and more enduring than the pine now obtainable, but that white pine was no longer on the market, and hence their opinions were based on merchantable pine which was now on the market at this place. Defendant contends that the evidence mentioned was not receivable, in the absence of proof of the original cost of the building.

Generally speaking, it may be said that from one who negligently destroys the property of another he is entitled to recover the actual loss sustained. There being no malice nor intentional wrongdoing, compensation is the proper measure, and hence the defendant was liable for the reasonable value of the building burned at the time and place of its destruction. There is no universal test for determining the value of property injured or destroyed, and the mode and amount of proof must be adapted to the facts of each case. 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 1015. It is frequently said that the market value of the property described at the time and place of the fire is a proper measure, and this is true if the property in fact has a market value. If there be no market value,

then another criterion of value must be found, and the best evidence which can be obtained must be produced to show the elements which enter into the real value. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Stanford, 12 Kan. 354, 15 Am. Rep. 362; Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Ehret, 41 Kan. 22, 20 Pac. 538. All know that there is no market value for property like that for which a recovery is sought, and therefore it was proper to invoke the aid of all the facts bearing upon the actual value at the time of the fire. Defendant insists that the exclusive method of establishing the damage was proof of the cost of construction, with a proper deduction therefrom for deterioration. The cost of a structure is sometimes a proper element for consideration in determining the amount of damages, but it can have little force, where, as here, the building was erected more than twenty-six years ago. The cost of building material and labor changes, and if the cost of material and labor twenty-six years ago was twice as much as at the present time, the original cost, less deterioration, would be a very imperfect criterion for measuring the present value. The cost of replacing the building, making a proper deduction for its age, utility, use, and condition, is a better measure of what the property was fairly and reasonably worth at the time it was destroyed. Some authorities have approved the rule, insisted on by the defendant, that the cost of the property is an essential element of proof; but even these authorities recognize that this rule is not always applicable and that other elements are sufficient to establish the loss. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 65, 9 So. 661; Wall v. Platt, 169 Mass. 398, 48 N. E. 270.

Our own court has adopted and applied a different rule. In Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne, 57 Kan. 291, 46 Pac. 315, where the value of a building that had been burned was in question, it was said: "One method of arriving at such loss is by estimating the cost of replacing the building, less any depreciation from use, age, or otherwise; and the other is by evidence of the value of the building at the time of its destruction, less the value, if any, of the ruins." (p. 301).

In the same case an exception was taken to the testimony of the owner of the building, giving the cost of it, and in holding the testimony improper the court said: "Evidence of the cost of a building, however, can hardly be said to be evidence of its value at a particular time. Sometimes, from the necessities of the case, it may be proper to inquire as to the cost of an article, as tending to establish its value; but there is no such necessity here, and Payne ought not to have been permitted to testify that the house cost about $25,000." (p. 301.)

The defendant has no cause to complain of the rule —cost. for measuring the damage laid down by the trial court.

An objection is made that the court, in its instructions did not present defendant's theory of the case as fully as that of the plaintiff, but we think that the issues were sufficiently presented, and that no prejudice could have resulted to the defendant from the instructions.

We find no error in the record, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

I. Introductory.

There is considerable confusion in the statement by the courts of the measure of damages for destruction of or injury to a building, the rule of most general application apparently being that the value of property destroyed, or the decrease in its value in case of injury, is the measure of damages. See 8 R. C. L. title Damages, pp. 481 et seq. This note, avoiding any general discussion of the measure of damages, is confined to the question whether the original cost of a building, or the cost of reproducing or repairing it, is a proper element to be considered in determining the amount of injury inflicted on the owner by the destruction of the building or an injury thereto. The cases holding that the cost of replacement or repair is, of itself, the proper measure of damages, are of course included.

II. Original cost of building.

a. General rule.

The original cost of a building which has been injured or destroyed, while not the standard of its value at the time of destruction or injury, is a proper element to be considered in fixing the damages, on the theory that the cost, less an allowance for depreciation from age, usage, and other like causes, is a fair criterion of present value.

Pennsylvania.—Lucot v. Rodgers (1893) 159 Pa. 58, 28 Atl. 242.

In Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Ohio City Lumber Co. (Fed.) supra, it was said: "No hard and fast rule, applicable to all cases, can be laid down as to the measure of the loss suffered by the destruction of buildings by fire. In some instances it may be their value detached from the land and separated from the use made of them. In others, where an active market is shown to exist, the market value may be the fair measure of loss. In still others, the cost of reconstruction, after deducting depreciation from age and other causes, may fairly recompense the owner. Usually, however, the real or ordinary value of a building, based upon and determined from its cost, age, condition, location, and the uses to which it has been put, furnishes a fair measure of the loss occasioned by its destruction."

In Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. (Fla.) supra, the court said: "In actions of this kind where the value of the properties destroyed is the criterion of the amount of damage to be awarded, and the property destroyed has no market value at the place of its destruction, then all such pertinent facts and circumstances are admissible in evidence that tend to establish its real and ordinary value at the time of its destruction; such facts as will furnish the jury, who alone determine the amount, with such pertinent data as will enable them reasonably and intelligently to arrive at a fair valuation; and to this end the original market cost of the property, the manner in which it has been used, its general condition and quality, the percentage of its depreciation since its purchase or erection, from use, damage, age, decay, or otherwise, are all elements of proof proper to be submitted to the jury to aid them in ascertaining its value."

In Southern R. Co. v. Slade (Ala.) supra, in an action against a railroad company for the burning of the plaintiff's buildings, it was held that while the cost of a burned building was not the standard of its value, evidence thereof, with evidence showing the depreciation due to usage and age, was permissible. The court said: "While the reasonable cost of the burned building, or of similar new buildings, is not the criterion of value, yet evidence thereof is relevant in support of opinion evidence as to actual value, in connection with evidence showing the extent of depreciation from use and age."

— Ala. App. —, 82 So. 582, the instruction which was held erroneous allowed the difference between the value of the house and lot just prior to, and the value just after, the injury, and also whatever the proof showed it cost to repair the house after the injury. The court said that the charge would have been correct if the latter element had been omitted, observing that the plaintiff was not entitled to both the difference in the value of the property and the cost of repair.

In Linforth v. San Francisco Gas & E. Co. (Cal.) supra, it appeared that an apartment house was injured by a gas explosion. In an action for the damages caused thereby, evidence of the original cost of the building was held to be proper. It was said: "Evidence of the original cost of the building was admitted. Under the circumstances it was proper so to do. This evidence of original cost, standing alone, would, of course, have slight or no weight in determining the award of damages. It would be of value only in determining whether restoration could be made at a reasonable allowance by way of damages. As the award of damages would be based upon the amount necessary to restore the building to its condition before injury, evidence of the original cost would not at all tend to show what that condition was. But, taken with other evidence in the case, such as was here introduced, it did tend to show the condition of the building at the time of the injury. There was the evidence of a painter who repainted and overhauled the building less than two months before the explosion, and who testified to its condition then, to the effect that he found it 'then practically as good as when it was new.' The evidence was not admissible as a criterion of damage, and was not admitted for that purpose. But it was admitted, and was admissible, as a bit of data which, taken with other evidence, tended to enable the jury to formulate their conclusion upon the condition of the building at the time of the injury."

action for the destruction of an elevator by fire, communicated from locomotives of the defendant railroad, evidence as to the cost of the elevator was introduced. The court held that where property destroyed had no market value, the real or ordinary value, based on its cost, the uses to which it was put, its age, condition, location, and the like, should be determined.

In Fite v. North River Ins. Co. (1918) 199 Mich. 467, 165 N. W. 705, no testimony as to the cost of a hotel destroyed by fire was introduced, but there was evidence of the price at which the owner contracted to sell it. The court said: "It seems to be conceded that there is no market value for such property in the place where it is situated, and therefore its real or ordinary cash value at the time of the fire should be ascertained, if it can be, from all the testimony as to the cost, uses it has been put to, its age, condition, and location."

In Roach v. Blair (1916) 190 Mich. 11, 155 N. W. 696, in an action for damages caused by the destruction of a building by fire, communicated by a railroad locomotive, it appeared that evidence was admitted as to the cost of the building, its age, the materials with which it was built, and its size and location. The trial court instructed the jury that if the plaintiff was found entitled to recover, it was "entitled to recover from the defendants as damages such as will fairly compensate it for its loss by reason of said fire, which sum is measured by the fair cash value at said time and place of said property which was destroyed by said fire, and the diminution in value of property injured and not destroyed, caused by said fire, not exceeding the amount claimed by the plaintiff. . . . There has been evidence here as to the price paid by the plaintiff for the real property—and by that it means the building or the land on which the building stood—and evidence of repairs and remodeling of the interior of such building, and there has been evidence as to the amount of material in the construction of the building at the time of the said fire, and the worth and value of the materials, if new, and evidence as to the labor and material required to replace such a building, and also evidence as to the fair cash market value of the building. All these matters have been received as bearing on the one question of its fair cash value at the time and place of the fire." Holding that such instructions were proper, the court said: "The plaintiff offered testimony that a building, the character of the one which was destroyed, had no market value in Hart, and, relying upon this showing, the plaintiff proceeded to show that it had a true cash value, and introduced testimony of its size, location, the materials with which it was built, its age, for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine what the actual cash value was. The instructions appear to be in accord with the general rule applicable to such cases."

In Conner v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1904) 181 Mo. 397, 81 S. W. 145, in an action for the destruction of a mill by fire which was communicated by one of defendant's locomotives, it appeared that testimony relating to the original cost of the mill and the cost of a new mill was admitted. In upholding such admission the court held that, in order to ascertain the value of the mill at the time of its destruction, it was proper to admit testimony as to its original cost. It was said: "It is also insisted that the court committed error in the admission of testimony by plaintiff as to the original cost of the mill and the cost of a new mill. The court, in its instructions, confines the consideration of this testimony to its legitimate purpose; it told the jury that 'the estimate made by the witnesses as to the cost of a new mill on September 6, 1899, can only be considered by the jury in determining the reasonable market value of the mill, burned as it stood on said date, September 6, 1899.' Upon this proposition the court in Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1898) 142 Mo. 666, 44 S. W. 802, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 699, said: 'For the purpose of ascertaining the value of the barn at the time of its destruction, plaintiff was entitled to put the jury in possession of all the facts bearing upon the question. There was, therefore, no error in permitting witnesses to testify to the original cost, though materials should then have been more costly than when the building was burned. Defendant had the right to show the difference in the cost and the depreciation in value by use and natural causes.' This is decisive of that question; there was no error in the admission of the testimony complained of."

In Lucot v. Rodgers (1893) 159 Pa. 58, 28 Atl. 242, an action to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's house caused by the deposit of soil in a street, whereby water collected and soaked through the ground and undermined a retaining wall and the foundation of plaintiff's house, an instruction that the cost of the building was some evidence of its value was sustained.

Since the cost of a building is merely an element in estimating its value at a later date and in a different condition, a considerable lapse of time or change of condition has led courts to declare the proof of cost to be irrelevant. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne (1896) 57 Kan. 291, 46 Pac. 315; Kansas City v. Frohwerk (1900) 10 Kan. App. 120, 62 Pac. 432; Ohio Valley Electric R. Co. v. Scott (1916) 172 Ky. 183, L.R.A.1917C, 1038, 189 S. W. 7.

In Ohio Valley Electric R. Co. v. Scott (Ky.) supra, it appeared that a building had been deposited on the tracks of the defendant company by a flood. In abating this nuisance the company wrecked and tore down the building. The court held that testimony of its cost was incompetent, as it did not tend to throw light on the value of the building as it stood on the tracks. It was said: "As to the third ground urged, that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence as to its size, we find considerable room for the contention. It is shown that the stack chimney in the house had fallen down, knocking out the window sash and perhaps some of the doors, tearing down some of the partition walls, and breaking holes through the floors; that the house was very cheaply built, and was covered with mud, both inside and out, and in its position was warped and twisted so that many of its parts had become unfastened. Since the flood the lot upon which the house stood, and an adjoining lot upon which stands a similar house in size and value, has been sold for $125, and there is other proof of a very convincing nature that the house as it stood when left upon the railroad track was of but little, if any, value, although there is testimony produced by the plaintiff that its value was even more than that fixed by the jury. Some of this testimony, however, we regard as incompetent, particularly that as to the cost of the property, and what it cost to build the house. None of this could throw any light upon the value of the house as it stood just before being removed. Of course, in combating the defendant's contention that the house could not have been removed, the length of time that it had been constructed might be shown, but what it cost to build it has no place in this record, according to our conception."

In Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne (1896) 57 Kan. 291, 46 Pac. 315, the owner of a house which was destroyed by fire was allowed to testify as to the original cost of the building. The court held that one method of arriving at a loss was by considering the value of the building at the time of the injury, and therefore it was error to allow such testimony, since the cost of a building could not ordinarily be said to be evidence of its value at a particular time, though it might be considered if the necessity arose. It was said: "Evidence of the cost of a building, however, can hardly be said to be evidence of its value at a particular time. Sometimes, from the necessities of the case, it may be proper to inquire as to the cost of an article as tending to establish its value; but there is no such necessity here, and Payne ought not to have been permitted to testify that the house cost about $25,000."

In Kansas City v. Frohwerk (1900) 10 Kan. App. 120, 62 Pac. 432, the plaintiff introduced evidence as to the cost of the property and the rent he received for the building before and after the injury. Holding that it was error to admit such evidence, as it was not the way to prove damages, the court said: "The plaintiff, over the objection and exception of the defendant, introduced evidence as to the cost of the property and the rent he received for it before and after the damages, and that in the fall of 1889 and spring of 1890 it was worth between $8,000 and $9,000, and in 1891 it was worth about $1,800. This is not the way to prove damages, and we cannot say that the jury were not prejudiced thereby."

While the original cost of a building is sometimes a proper element in the measurement of damages, if the material cost more at the time the building was erected, it is an imperfect criterion. Thus KENNEDY v. TRELEAVEN (reported herewith) ante, 274, holds that the original cost of construction of a building is sometimes a proper element in the consideration of the proper amount of damages. When, however, the building was built in a period when the material might have cost much more than at the present time, it is an imperfect criterion.

But in Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1898) 142 Mo. 645, 44 S. W. 802, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 699, testimony was admitted tending to show the original cost of a barn which was destroyed by fire alleged to be set out by a locomotive. The court held that it was proper to permit testimony relating to the original cost, even though the material at that time was more costly than at the time of the fire. It was said: "For the purpose of ascertaining the value of the barn at the time of its destruction, plaintiff was entitled to put the jury in possession of all the facts bearing upon the question. There was, therefore, no error in permitting witnesses to testify to the original cost, though materials should then have been more costly than when the building was burned. Defendant had the right to show the difference in the cost and the depreciation in value by use and natural causes."

It is improper to admit testimony relating to the cost of a finished building when the injury is done to an unfinished building. Bennett v. Clemence (1863) 6 Allen (Mass.) 10. In that case an action of tort for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, and tearing down, carrying away, and destroying an unfinished building, certain testimony relating to the cost of the building when finished was admitted. The court held that it was improper to admit such evidence, as the measure of damages was for the injury to the building as it then was.

In Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Ohio City Lumber Co. (Fed.) supra, an action against a railroad company for damages caused by the destruction of the plaintiff's mill, including certain buildings and other property, testimony was held to have been properly admitted which tended to show the reasonable value of the buildings, taking into consideration, among other things, the cost of their reconstruction. The court said: "In this case it appears that these buildings were located in a small village, and had little, if any, market value. The use made of them in connection with the other property destroyed materially affected their value. Under such circumstances, it cannot be said that their market value, detached from the land and separated from the use to which they had been put, fairly represented the loss suffered by plaintiffs in their destruction. No error was committed in permitting the witness to testify as to the fair and reasonable value of these buildings, taking into consideration their age, depreciation, the cost of reconstruction, and their use in connection with the other property destroyed by the same fire."

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Johnston (Ala.) supra, an action for the value of a building which was burned, evidence as to the cost of a new house of the kind burned was admitted. The court said: "Though the cost of building new houses of the kind burned was not the criterion by which to measure the damages caused by their destruction, evidence of such cost was relevant, as tending to throw light on their value."

In BUSH v. TAYLOR (reported herewith) ante, 262, it appeared that certain lumber, engines, saws, boilers, and other fixtures, together with the buildings which housed them, were destroyed by fire caused by sparks from a locomotive belonging to a company of which the defendant was receiver. In an action against the receiver, the court instructed the jury that the proper measure of damages was the difference in value of the land immediately before and immediately after the fire. In reversing this judgment the court held that where the property destroyed depends on its connection with the soil, the measure of damages is the difference in value of the land before and after the fire, but if the property destroyed could be replaced in substantially the same condition, the measure of damages was the cost of replacement. It was said: "We think our own cases, when construed in connection with the facts to which the principles there announced were applied, result in the following statement of the law. That, if the value of the property destroyed depends upon its connection with the soil, the measure of the damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire. But, if the property destroyed could be replaced in substantially the condition in which it existed before the fire, then the measure of the damages is the cost of so replacing it."

But in Dodd v. Read (1906) 81 Ark. 13, 98 S. W. 703, in an action to recover damages caused by destruction of plaintiff's house by fire, testimony was given that the building was worth a certain sum, and a carpenter testified that it was worth that, but it would cost double that sum to rebuild it. The jury returned a verdict of three fourths of what it would cost to rebuild. The court held that it was erroneous for the jury to base their verdict on the cost of rebuilding the house, deducting for the depreciation due to age and decay. It was said: "It is further contended by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict for more than $200. The house was totally destroyed, and several witnesses stated their opinions to be that it was worth about $200. One witness—the only one introduced by the plaintiff on the question of value—testified that he was a carpenter, was familiar with the house, and that, in his opinion, it would cost at least $400 to rebuild it. He gave it as his opinion that the house was worth about $200 at the time it was destroyed. Other witnesses testified that the house was in good condition at the time it was destroyed, and they undertook to describe its condition in detail to the jury. Now, the true inquiry was as to the cash market value of the building, or rather the difference between the market value of the property before and after the destruction of the house; and the witnesses who undertook to state the value placed it at $200. It is manifest, however, that the jury disregarded this testimony, and based the amount of the verdict upon the cost of rebuilding the house anew, less the depreciation on account of age and decay. They either did this, or they arbitrarily rejected the opinions of the witnesses as to the value, and substituted their own judgment. In either event they exceeded their powers and rendered a verdict inconsistent with the evidence. It was competent for the witnesses to state their several opinions with reference to the cash value of the building; stating the facts upon which they reached their conclusions. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lyman (1893) 57 Ark. 512, 22 S. W. 170. None of the witnesses who testified on this subject showed any special knowledge of the value of property in that locality, and the testimony, on that account, is far from satisfactory, but the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the amount of the damages, and the defendant alone reaps all the benefit from the weakness of the testimony. There was no evidence at all that the building was worth $300—all the evidence showed that it was worth only $200—and the jury could not substitute their own judgment for the testimony of witnesses on this point."

In Cleland v. Thornton (1872) 43 Cal. 437, an action for damages caused to buildings by fire, evidence as to the cost of new buildings to replace those burned was admitted. The court held that the evidence was admissible, not as affording a criterion of damages, but merely as furnishing some data by which the court would be enabled to estimate approximately the value of the old buildings. It was said: "There was no error in the ruling of the court, admitting the evidence as to the cost of new buildings to replace those which were burned. The evidence was admissible as furnishing some data by which the court would be enabled to estimate approximately the value of the old buildings; and it is evident from the opinion and order of the court that it was received and considered for this purpose only, and not as affording a criterion of damages."

In Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. (1891) 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661, an action for damages caused by the burning of a hotel and other buildings, evidence of the cost of replacing the buildings was admitted. The court held that if the destroyed property had no market value, evidence of the cost of replacing the property was proper. It was said: "To fix the market value of a thing, it seems to us that there must be a selling of things of the same kind. If there had ever been a sale of a hotel, or of any other building in Tavares, we are not informed, and we have no judicial knowledge, nor does the record inform us, that hotels have a market value there. Yet, though there is no market value or standard value, the plaintiff should not be allowed more than the property destroyed by fire on the 9th of April, 1888, was reasonably worth in Tavares. To do this it is proper to invoke the aid of all facts calculated to show its value, and we are unable to perceive that the circuit judge erred in admitting the evidence of the cost of replacing the building on the day of the fire. It was a fact tending to show, and to be considered with others by the jury in determining, what amount of money would put the plaintiff in the position in which he was at the time. If there were any other facts incident to the condition of Tavares, considered in a business or other point of view, calculated to affect the value of this or any other property there, and which would qualify or outweigh the items of the cost of restitution, and such facts do not appear in the record, we are not responsible. It must be assumed there were none other existing. By saying the testimony was admissible, we do not say what weight should be given it, nor do we come into conflict with the Tennessee and Illinois cases last mentioned. The evident meaning of those cases is that the cost of restitution or of the materials is not the measure of damages governing the jury, and not that such facts can never be considered in arriving at the true value or measure of damages. If an article has no market value, its value may be shown by proof of such elements of facts affecting the question, as exist. Recourse may be had to the items, and its utility and use."

In Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne (1896) 57 Kan. 291, 46 Pac. 315, it was held that one method of arriving at the amount of loss from injury to a building was by estimating the cost of replacing the building, less any depreciation from use, age, or otherwise, the court saying: "The policy required the insurance company to make good unto the assured the amount of loss or damage, to be estimated according to the cash value of the property at the time of the loss, not exceeding $4,000. One method of arriving at such loss is by estimating the cost of replacing the building, less any depreciation from use, age, or otherwise; and the other is by evidence of the value of the building at the time of its destruction, less the value, if any, of the ruins. If witnesses as to the worth of the building are shown by cross-examination to have little knowledge upon the subject, this would be proper matter of argument to the jury as affecting the weight of their testimony, but it should not be excluded on that account."

KENNEDY v. TRELEAVEN (reported herewith) ante, 274, holds that the better method of measuring what the property was reasonably worth at the time it was destroyed by fire is to take the cost of replacing the building and deduct a proper amount for its age and condition.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Home Ins. Co. (1912) 146 Ky. 281, 142 S. W. 398, an action for damages sustained by reason of the burning of a building, evidence was admitted as to the cost of rebuilding a house like the one burned. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the loss sustained, and in proving such loss any relevant matter which would throw light upon its value was admissible. It was said: "It is next insisted that the court erred in admitting evidence as to what it would cost to build a house like the one burned, and in excluding from the jury evidence of the market value of the house at the time it was destroyed. What the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if anything, was the loss he sustained by the destruction of his house. This measure of recovery would compensate him, and it was clearly proper to allow him to prove what it would cost to replace the house that was destroyed, and it was also admissible to give in evidence every relevant fact that would throw light upon its value, and aid the jury in ascertaining the amount of the loss the plaintiff had sustained; such, for example, as the value of the land where the house stood before it was destroyed, and its value afterwards. But we do not understand how it would be practicable for any person to say what the market value of a house was, detached from the land on which it stood, unless it was intended to remove the house to another place or tear it down, as, ordinarily, houses have little value separate from the land upon which they are located. They are regarded as a part of the land, and when we speak of the market value of a building, it is generally understood to include the ground on which the building is located."

In Ætna Ins. Co. v. Johnson (1874) 11 Bush (Ky.) 587, 21 Am. Rep. 228, it appeared that a building, together with other articles, was insured against loss by fire. In an action against the insurance company for loss by fire of the house and the other articles, the court held that, in determining the value of the building destroyed, the value of the building at the time of the fire and of a new building of the same kind and dimensions should be taken into consideration. It was said: "The only question of difficulty on this branch of the case arises in determining the mode of ascertaining the cash value of the building destroyed. If the appellees are allowed the original cost of the building, or a sum sufficient to erect a new one, this criterion would give them doubtless a much larger sum than they are entitled to recover; nor is it proper, in fixing the value, to ascertain the difference in the value of the lot with the building upon it and its value with the building destroyed, as by reason of the peculiar character of the building or the location of the lot for building purposes, the latter might sell for as much, or nearly so, without the building as with it; and to determine its value by inquiry from witnesses as to its marketable value, to be removed from the premises, would necessarily result in lessening its real value to the owner. It seems to us that the just mode of fixing the value, although the rule may not be of universal application, would be the value of the building as it stood upon the ground on the day it was destroyed, as compared with a new building of the same kind and dimensions. If the building was old and dilapidated by use and decay, its value in that condition is what the appellees should recover. The instructions given on this branch of the case directed the jury to ascertain the actual cash value of the property, and left without explanation the mode of ascertaining this value. The jury, as we must conclude from the proof in the case, gave to the appellees as damages the cost of erecting another building."

In an action for the negligent handling of a motor truck, whereby its trailer destroyed a gallery over a sidewalk, it appeared that the lower court allowed recovery for a new gallery. The court held that plaintiff was entitled to recover what it would cost to build a gallery as good as the one destroyed. It was said: "Counsel further argue that the lower court erred in allowing recovery for a new gallery, when only an old one was destroyed. The obligation of defendant, however, is to indemnify plaintiff—to put him in the position that he would have occupied if the injury complained of had not been inflicted on him. It goes further than that of an insurer against loss by fire, who takes no risk against personal effort and inconvenience. And yet, so far as we know, those who are engaged in the insurance business do not undertake to build an old house, by way of indemnifying the assured for the loss of an old house, and no suggestion is here made as to the manner in which that can be done. According to the evidence of plaintiff's contractor, the broken material of which the gallery in question was constructed, and which, at the time of the trial, was lying in a confused heap on plaintiff's premises, could not again be utilized in the construction of a gallery, and it is not pretended that it could be so utilized, save by matching and welding the broken bits of iron, patching the flooring, and supplying missing parts of both with new material, all of which, when done at an expense not estimated, would result in the production of a gallery composed of matched, patched, and welded material, which would not be the gallery that was destroyed, or which plaintiff is bound to accept by way of indemnity for that which was destroyed. Defendant alleges in its answer that it had declined to have anything to do with the debris in question, sets up no claim for salvage, and has offered no evidence that the debris is of any value, or would compensate plaintiff for its occupancy of his premises. We therefore find no reason for making any change in the judgment appealed from, on account of any possible salvage that he may realize." Lambert v. American Box Co. (1919) 144 La. 603, 3 A.L.R. 612, 81 So. 95.

In Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 334, an action for a negligent excavation on adjoining property whereby the walls of plaintiff's warehouse were destroyed, by reason of water washing the soil away from the foundations, the jury were charged that if plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled to recover the amount of damages actually sustained, plus the loss of rent. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the cost of putting the building in as good a condition as it was before the injury, saying: "The judge charged that if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover at all, they were entitled to recover the amount of damages they had actually sustained, including loss of rent from the Syracuse & Oswego line. It is not seriously questioned that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as damages, the cost of repairing and putting the building in as good condition as it was before the injury. The defendants recognized their obligation to pay the plaintiffs for their repairs; and the plaintiffs acted on this recognition in making them. It was not in the nature of a contract between the parties, but of an admission by the defendants of the extent of the damage to the building, and of their liability for the injury. But if there had been no recognition by the defendants of their obligation to pay for the repairs, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover from them the cost of putting the building in as good condition as it was before it was injured by their negligent acts. These were damages that the plaintiffs had actually sustained."

In Silva v. McAlester (1915) 46 Okla. 150, 148 Pac. 150, a suit to enjoin the destruction of certain buildings, on the ground that there was no adequate remedy at law, in that the damages were not susceptible of measurement, the court held that the damages were susceptible of measurement, the measure being what it would cost to replace them, not exceeding the value of the entire property.

In Southern Oil Works v. Bickford (1885) 14 Lea (Tenn.) 651, an action for the recovery of damages for the destruction of two adjoining houses by reason of the wrongful usage of one by a tenant, the court admitted testimony relating to the cost of rebuilding both houses. Holding that, where the value of a building must be gathered from opinion, the cost of replacing is a proper element in its determination, the court said: "There is testimony in the record describing fully the two houses thus destroyed, showing their dimensions, the kind of material used in building them, the character of the work, and the time when built. Bickford also proved that he was getting for his house a monthly rent of $51, and that the damage sustained by the destruction of each house was about $6,000. He also testified that he had rebuilt both houses within ten months after the accident. He was then asked: 'What was the cost of rebuilding each house?' The defendant's counsel objected to this question as irrelevant and incompetent. The court overruled the objection, and the witness stated that it cost $5,400 for each house. The referees report that the court erred in admitting this testimony. We are unable to concur in this opinion. This court held in Memphis v. Kimbrough (1873) 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 140, which was a suit to recover damages for the loss of a steamer by reason of the negligence of the corporate authorities of the city of Memphis, that it was not error to instruct the jury that in estimating the damages they might look, as a circumstance, to the cost of the boat, the jury having been fully instructed by the trial judge that it was not the cost, but the value of the boat at the time of the accident, which they were to ascertain. And it is laid down by text-writers that in actions against insurance companies for the recovery of the value of property lost, where the property has not a 'ready' market value, the cost of replacing the thing is an element proper to be considered. 3 Sutherland, Damages, 87. The absence of a ready market value makes it competent to prove value by the opinions of witnesses who have the requisite knowledge. 1 Sutherland, Damages, 798; Whart. Ev. § 450. And where the value must be gathered from opinion, the cost of replacing would undoubtedly aid the jury in coming to a correct verdict."

In Marks v. Culmer (1890) 6 Utah, 419, 24 Pac. 528, an action for the destruction and demolition of a building by defendants, it was held that when a building can be readily reproduced the plaintiff is entitled to recover what it will cost to reproduce it, and the value of its use while that is being done.

If the injuries to a building are susceptible of being repaired without rebuilding, the reasonable cost of such repairs as will put the building in the same condition as it was immediately preceding the injury, is a proper element to be considered in the measurement of damages.

Under a California statute (Civ. Code, § 3333) the measure of compensation allowed is the cost of the restoration of the building to its original condition, when this can be done at a reasonable expense, plus compensation for the loss of the use of the property. Applying that act it was said in Linforth v. San Francisco Gas & E. Co. (Cal.) supra: "The jury awarded plaintiff $10,000 damages for injuries to the building, and $800 damages, loss of rents. The measure of damages in cases such as this is well settled, and is thus expressed by Joyce on Damages: 'Where a building has been injured by a trespasser, it has been determined that the measure of damages in an action against him therefor will be the cost of repairing or restoring the building to its former condition, where the injury is of such a character that this may be done at a reasonable cost, an allowance also being made for loss of rental during the reasonable time required to make such repairs.' This rule has met with general acceptance. . . . This rule, allowing compensation for the cost of restoration to the original condition when this can be done at a reasonable expense, together with compensation for the loss of the use of the property, is in precise accord with § 3333 of the Civil Code."

In Harrison v. Kiser (Ga.) supra, an action for damages because of injuries to plaintiff's house caused by the careless and negligent excavation of adjoining property, it was held that if plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, it would be a sum sufficient to put the house in the same condition as before the injury. The court said: "Complaint is made that the court erred as to the measure of damages, having charged the jury on this subject that the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the property before the injury was done, and its value after it was done. We do not think this was a correct measure of damages in this case, but, on the contrary, we are of the opinion that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover any damages, he would be entitled to recover whatever sum it would take to put the house in the condition in which it was before it was injured. The complaint is that the plaintiff's house was injured, not that his land was injured; and we know of no better rule than that which we have stated."

In Empire Mills Co. v. Burrell Engineering & Constr. Co. (Ga.) supra, an action for the breach of a construction contract, the defendant claimed damages for injuries by the improper construction of a building, to a brick building adjoining. The jury were instructed that the proper measure of damages was the difference in the value of the building immediately before and immediately after the injury. In reversing the judgment, the court held that when the injury to the property is separable from the freehold, the measure of damages is the cost of restoring or replacing the property destroyed. It was said: "The other question that we deem it necessary to discuss to some slight extent is that raised by the 14th ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, in which it is alleged that the court erred in charging the jury that the measure of damages for the injury to the boiler house of the defendant would be the difference in value between the boiler house in its condition at the time of the injury, if injury were made to it, for any purpose for which the building, the boiler house, was used or might be used, and for which it might have a value, and its value for the same purpose after the injury wrought by the defendant company's breach of its contract in constructing the elevator had been—after that injury had been effected." "As a general rule the measure of damages in actions for injuries to real property is the difference in value before and after the injury to the premises. . . . In some cases the cost of repair or restoration has been adopted as the measure of damages [Harrison v. Kiser (Ga.) supra, and several other cases]; but in such event the cost of repair must be reasonable and bear some proportion to the injury sustained." 13 Cyc. 150, 151. "The value of the property destroyed, or the cost of restoring or replacing such property, is the proper measure of damages for the destruction of buildings, fences, and other improvements which may at once be replaced, where the exact cost of restoring the property destroyed is capable of definite ascertainment, and where there is no damage to the realty itself." 8 R. C. L. 485. . . . Of course, if recovery is sought for injury to the freehold itself by reason of the taking or destroying of the property attached thereto, the measure of damages should be the difference between the value of the land before and its value after the injury. 8 R. C. L. 485, and cases there cited. The only fair construction that can be placed on the claim of the defendant for damages on account of the injury to its boiler house, as set forth in the petition in this case is that damages are sought for the destruction of the building itself, and not for an injury to the freehold by reason of the destruction of the building. This being true, the court erred in giving to the jury the measure of damages complained of and above set forth in full."

In Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun (1902) 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9, an action for damages caused by injuries to a building due to an explosion of dynamite while excavating a tunnel, the jury were instructed that the proper measure of damages was the cost of repairing the building so that it would be in as good condition as it was before the injury. Holding that the instructions were correct, the court, on appeal, said: "The instructions advised the jury to adopt as the measure of damages the cost of repairing the building so that it would be in as good condition as it was before it was damaged by the explosions. It is insisted the proper measure of damages was the depreciation in value of the property resulting from the injuries. We think the cost of repairing the building and restoring it to its proper condition was the true measure of the damages. It was so held in Hide v. Thornborough (1846) 2 Car. & K. (Eng.) 250, and in Shrieve v. Stokes (1848) 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 453, 48 Am. Dec. 401, in which cases the injuries were occasioned by excavations made on adjoining lots, to those on which the buildings injured were situate. Mr. Sutherland, in his work on Damages (vol. 3, § 1018), says: 'And that valuation should be adopted which will be most beneficial to the injured party, for he is entitled to the benefit of the premises intact and to the value of any part separated. The damages for injury done to a house are measured by the cost of restoring it to its previous condition.'"

In Cooper v. Kankakee Electric Light Co. (1911) 164 Ill. App. 581, an action to recover damages for the partial destruction of a building by fire, caused by currents of electricity being allowed to escape, evidence was admitted as to the rental value of the property. This was objected to on the ground that the true measure of damages was the cost of repairing and restoring the building to the condition it was in before the injury. The court held that, for an injury to property which might be readily repaired or reproduced, the measure of recovery was the cost of repairing it, together with the value of its use while that was being done, saying: "Appellants insist 'that the plaintiff should not have been permitted to testify as to the rental value of her property, as the true measure of damages in a suit for injuries to a building is the cost of repairing and restoring the building to the condition it was in before the damage,' and rely upon Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun (1902) 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 85 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9, affirming (1901) 94 Ill. App. 533, as authority for their contention. In that case the measure of damage is said to be the cost of restoring the house to its previous condition. The loss of the use of the building while being repaired was not claimed or referred to. The question of a recovery for loss of rental was not involved; the injury there sued for did not prevent the use of the building while it was being repaired. It cites § 1018 of Sutherland on Damages as authority for the recovery of the cost of repairs. In this case the house was only partially destroyed, and was not and could not be used while it was being repaired. For an injury to property, such as a house, that may readily be repaired or reproduced, the measure of recovery has been held to be the cost of repairing it, together with the value of its use while that was being done."

In Watson v. Mississippi River Power Co. (1916) 174 Iowa, 23, L.R.A. 1916D, 101, 156 N. W. 188, 13 N. C. C. A. 873, in an action for damages to a building caused by blasting rock, it was said: "The court instructed the jury that, if found entitled to recover, the plaintiff's measure of damages was the reasonable cost of restoring the injured buildings to the condition they were in immediately before the injury thereto. This is said to be an incorrect statement, and that the true measure is the difference between the fair value of the property immediately before and immediately after such injury. The measure of damage for injury to real property is not invariable, and there may be circumstances under which either of the rules stated would be applicable. The rule stated by appellant is more often applied where the damage is permanent, or cannot well be expressed in specific items of injury capable of easy repair or remedy, but does affect in some substantial degree the value of the entire property as a unit. But where the injury is susceptible of remedy at moderate expense, and the cost of restoring it may be shown with reasonable certainty, the rule given the jury by the trial court is entirely proper."

In Graessle v. Carpenter (1886) 70 Iowa, 166, 30 N. W. 392, it appeared that an owner of a piece of property had entered on adjacent property without the owner's consent, and laid water pipes through it to his property. The house on the adjacent property was thereby injured. The court held that where a building has been injured by a wrongful act, but the injuries are not permanent or incapable of being repaired, the owner is entitled to recover an amount sufficient to put the property in as good a condition as it was prior to the injuries.

In Freeland v. Muscatine (1859) 9 Iowa, 461, an action to recover damages sustained by the removal of soil or earth below the established grade, whereby the plaintiff's house was injured, the court held that there was no error in instructing the jury that, in estimating the damages, the cost of rebuilding or repairing was proper to be taken into consideration.

In ADAMS v. SENDEL (reported herewith) ante, 268, it was held that the proper measure of damages to a building injured by blasting operations was a sum sufficient to restore the property to substantially the condition it was in prior to the injury.

In Kentucky Traction & Terminal Co. v. Bain (1914) 161 Ky. 44, 170 S. W. 499, the jury were instructed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover such sum in damages as it would have reasonably cost her, immediately after the accident, to have placed the house in as good a condition as it was before. The court held that, where the injury to the building is such that it can be repaired and placed in as good a condition as before, such is the rule.

In Lexington & E. R. Co. v. Baker (1913) 156 Ky. 431, 161 S. W. 228, it appeared that while constructing a roadbed of a railroad dynamite and other explosives were used. Large quantities of rock were thrown on the plaintiff's residence and barn. In an action to recover damages for the injuries, the court instructed the jury that the measure of damage was the difference between the value of the house and barn before and after the injury. The court held that where the injury is not permanent the measure of damages is a sum sufficient to restore the property to the condition it was in prior to the injury, and such further sum as would compensate for the diminution in the value of the use of the property during the continuance of the injury.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Falconer (1906) 30 Ky. L. Rep. 152, 97 S. W. 727, it appeared that three frame houses were destroyed by fire caused by flying cinders from locomotives. In an action to recover damages the court held that if the property was injured, but not destroyed, the measure of damages would ordinarily be that sum which would restore the property to its former condition, if it was susceptible of being repaired, saying: "The defendant insists that the measure of the plaintiff's damages is the difference between the value of her lot on which the buildings stood, as it was just before the fire, and its market value immediately afterward. Market value is not always the measure of damage to property. The Century Dictionary defined the term 'damages' as 'the value in money of what is lost or withheld; the estimated money equivalent for detriment or injury sustained; that which is given or adjudged to repair a loss.' Compensation is the bottom principle of the law of damages. To restore the party injured, as near as may be, to his former position, is the purpose of allowing a money equivalent of his property which has been taken, injured, or destroyed. If the thing taken or destroyed can be replaced in the market, then obviously that sum of money which will buy another like it will repair the injury. So if property is injured, but not destroyed, ordinarily the measure of damages, where the property can be repaired so as to be as it was before, is that sum that will restore the former condition."

In Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Foster (1904) 117 Ky. 389, 78 S. W. 150, it appeared that a telephone company sank a log anchor for the support of its poles and wires on the plaintiff's lot, adjacent to her brick building, whereby the natural lateral support of the wall was weakened, causing the foundation to give way and the walls to crack. In an action for damages, the jury returned a verdict of $400, based on the testimony of the builders that it would cost between $400 and $600 to repair and restore the building to its former state. The defendant introduced testimony that it could be restored for $50. The court held that the award of $400 was not excessive, saying: "As to the first ground, it is sufficient to say that all the witnesses for appellee testified fully and intelligently as to the nature and extent of the injury to her building. Some of them were the builders of the house, and many of them testified that the cost of repairing and restoring it to its former state would amount to $600, and others to not less than $400, the sum allowed by the jury. And practically all of them agreed in their testimony as to the fact that the work of appellant's servants in digging the hole and placing the anchor near the foundation of the building had produced the injury complained of. It is true that the witnesses introduced in behalf of the appellant testified to the effect that the building was defectively constructed, and that its defective construction, together with a violent windstorm, caused the injury complained of; furthermore, that the cost of replacing it would fall far short of the amount fixed by the appellee's witnesses. In fact, some of appellant's witnesses fixed the cost of repairing the building as low as $50. It will be seen, therefore, that the evidence was conflicting. But it was the province of the jury to reconcile it, and to determine the weight and effect to be given to the testimony of each set of witnesses, or any one or more of them; and, besides, they were permitted to view the building and premises in charge of an officer of the court, whereby they were the better enabled to arrive at a correct verdict. But while the evidence was conflicting as to the cause of the injury to appellee's building, there can be no doubt that it was injured to such an extent as to render it unsafe for occupancy."

In Hopkins v. American Pneumatic Service Co. (1907) 194 Mass. 582, 80 N. E. 624, an action for damages to certain land and a building, caused by the digging of a trench on adjoining land, whereby the building settled, thereby damaging it and depreciating it in value, it appeared that evidence of the cost of restoring the building to its condition prior to the injury was introduced. The court held that while such evidence was ordinarily not a true criterion for measuring damages, it might be resorted to in some cases, saying: "The cost of restoration of the property to its former condition does not necessarily furnish a true criterion for determining damages. Sometimes to make such a restoration would be an uneconomical and improper way of using the property. It might involve a very large and disproportionate expense to relieve from the consequences of a slight injury. In many cases the cost of repairs would be an accurate measure of the damages. To incur the cost is often the best way of dealing with the property. In the present case evidence was introduced of what this cost would be, and the jury were permitted to consider it in determining the diminution of the market value."

Likewise, in Brown v. Werner (1874) 40 Md. 15, an action to recover damages for injuries done to a building by the careless and negligent manner in which the adjoining house was improved, the court held that plaintiff was entitled to recover such damages as would be sufficient to reinstate the wall and house in as good condition as they were prior to the injury. It was said: "The action was for a tort, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover for all damages naturally or necessarily flowing from the wrongful acts of the defendants; and if his house was injured by the careless and negligent manner in which the appellants improved the adjoining house, he was entitled to recover such damages as would be sufficient to reinstate the wall and the house in as good condition as they were prior to the injury."

In Knoche v. Pratt (1916) 194 Mo. App. 300, 187 S. W. 578, the evidence showed that it would cost $1,034.70 to restore a wall which fell, owing to the entry of the defendant on the plaintiff's property and the excavation of a part thereof. The court held that a verdict of $950 was not excessive, it being conceded that the proper measure of damages was the reasonable cost of restoring the plaintiff's building to substantially the same condition it was in before the wall fell.

In Slavin v. State (1897) 152 N. Y. 45, 46 N. E. 321, the board of claims awarded the plaintiff an amount sufficient to compensate him for his actual outlay only. The plaintiff's building had been damaged by reason of water from a canal leaking through its walls and running into the cellar. The court held that where there was an injury to a building which admitted of reparation at a reasonable cost, and this would be the ordinary method of remedying the injury, the cost of such reparation was the measure of compensation.

In Barrick v. Schifferdecker (1890) 123 N. Y. 52, 25 N. E. 365, reversing (1888) 48 Hun, 355, 1 N. Y. Supp. 21, the action was to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of an adjoining landowner using the building on his premises as an ice house, whereby plaintiff's residence was rendered damp and the building damaged. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the rental value and the necessary cost of repairing the building, and also a sum necessary to put it in a condition which would prevent future injuries.

In Helbling v. Allegheny Cemetery Co. (1902) 201 Pa. 171, 50 Atl. 970, it appeared that the plaintiff's house was injured by water which, during rainstorms, accumulated at the opening of a sewer. This accumulation and flooding of water were caused by the act of the defendant in allowing large quantities of brush, weeds, and cut grass to flow into the sewer, thereby causing the crib to become clogged. The court held that, as the injury was not permanent, the proper measure of damages was the cost of restoring the property to its former condition.

In Anderson v. Miller (1896) 96 Tenn. 35, 31 L.R.A. 604, 54 Am. St. Rep. 812, 33 S. W. 615, the jury were instructed that the measure of damages would be the reasonable cost of restoring property which had been partially destroyed by fire, communicated to it by a fire on adjoining premises, to its former condition. The court held that the instructions were correct, since they meant that the building, as replaced, should be of equal value to that destroyed, taking into consideration depreciation due to age. It was said: "In regard to the measure of damages, the charge of the court was correct in directing the jury that it would be the reasonable cost of restoring the property to its former condition. This does not mean, as argued by counsel, that it was the cost of a new building, the same as that destroyed, and the jury could not have so understood it, but the proper construction was that the building, as restored, should be of equal value to that destroyed, taking age and depreciation into consideration."

In Hide v. Thornborough (1846) 2 Car. & K. (Eng.) 250, it appeared that a part of a house fell, owing to an excavation on adjoining land. In an action for damages caused thereby, the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to an amount sufficient to put him in the same state he was in prior to the injury, since he should not be given a new house for an old one.

In Newcastle v. Broxtowe (1832) 4 Barn. & Ad. 273, 110 Eng. Reprint, 459, in an action to recover damages for the partial demolition of plaintiff's castle, the court held that the proper measure of damages was that sum of money which would repair the injury done, and would replace the house in the same condition as before the injury. It was said: "This question is peculiarly for the consideration of a jury, and nothing has been said to induce us to think that they have proceeded on an erroneous principle of calculation; certainly, if that principle had been pursued which was contended for by the learned counsel who moved for the rule, it would have been so; for the jury would have done wrong to take into their consideration whether the castle was an ancient possession of the noble family of the plaintiff, or not, whether the plaintiff was likely to reside there, and whether the neighborhood was suitable to such a residence. The true question is, What sum of money will repair the injury done by the mob? What will replace the house in the situation and state in which it was at the time of the outrage committed, as nearly as practicable?"

If the municipal requirements at the time of repairing the injured building provide for a larger size brick than that used originally, in building the kind damaged, the defendant cannot object to evidence of the cost of repairing the building according to such requirements, since the municipal ordinances must be obeyed. Jesel v. Benas (1913) 177 Mo. App. 708, 160 S. W. 528. In that case the action was to recover for damage to a wall from the piling of lumber so as to cause rain and melting snow to be discharged on and against the wall. Testimony which tended to show the cost of building a new wall made of a different brick than the old wall, but required by a city ordinance, was admitted. It was also shown that the brick which was to be used would not cost more than the other. The court held that the evidence was admissible, as the wall would necessarily have to be built according to municipal requirements. It was said: "The first assignment is to the admission in evidence, over the objection and exception of appellant, of the testimony of a witness as to what would be the cost of building a new wall on the north of respondent's buildings, the wall to be rebuilt 18 inches thick and of new pressed brick, whereas the old wall was only 9 inches thick and of handmade brick. It is true that that witness testified that to rebuild the wall he would use new brick, and that the wall he was figuring on was a 13-inch wall. His attention being called to the fact that the old wall was a 9-inch wall of handmade brick, he stated that the city ordinances do not allow the construction of a brick building of the height of the one in controversy with a wall of less than 13 inches in thickness. He further testified that it would cost as much to replace it with old brick as with new brick, provided you could get old brick, which was not always the case. We see no error in the admission of this testimony, to the prejudice of appellant. Necessarily the wall, if rebuilt, would have to be in conformity with the requirements of the city ordinances, and we know of no rule of law that would require plaintiff to replace old brick with old brick, assuming that they could be had. This is especially so when, according to this witness's testimony, one could not always obtain old brick, and if they did manage to secure them, they would cost as much as new brick, he testifying that it did not cost any more for the 13-inch than the 9-inch brick, because to lay the 9-inch would cost more than for laying the 13-inch brick."

The cost of restoring an injured building to the same condition it was in before the injury is the proper measure of damages, when the injuries can be repaired for less than the amount of depreciation in value. Bates v. Warrick (1909) 77 N. J. L. 387, 71 Atl. 1116. In that case testimony relating to the probable cost of repairs to a house which was damaged by the falling of a tree against it was admitted. The court held that where injuries to a building could be repaired without greater expense than the amount of depreciation in value would be if no repairs were made, the cost of restoring the building to the same condition it was in prior to the injury would be the measure of damages. It was said: "The defendant also complains of the admission of testimony tending to show the cost of further repairs, the plaintiff not having completed the repairs required to put the building in the same condition in which it was at the time of the injury, because it did not appear that the plaintiff intended to make such further repairs. There is nothing in this objection, nor does appellant undertake to support it by any authority. The plaintiff would be entitled to the damage she suffered if she never made any repairs, for it is a question of damage, not of restoration. The defendant also insists that the evidence of cost of repair should not have been admitted, because the true measure of damage is the depreciation in value resulting from the trespass. We are of opinion that, in a case like this, where manifestly the injury to a building can be repaired without greater expense than the amount of depreciation in value would be if no repairs were made, the cost of restoring the house to the same condition it was in before the injury would be the measure of damages (Hale, Damages, 359), but aside from this, the probable cost of repairs required to restore the building to its former condition was a proper element to be considered in ascertaining the diminution in value of the realty. The injury in the present case was slight, and there is no pretense that the repairs enhanced the property beyond its value at the time of the injury, and it also appears that the building was not available without the repairs. Under such conditions the cost of the repairs was some evidence of depreciation in value."

Likewise the cost of the repairs must not exceed the value of the property. Keats v. Gas Co. (1906) 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 480, wherein it was held to be error for the court to charge the jury that the damages were merely the cost of remedying the injury to the real and personal property, as the true measure of damages, when the injury was not permanent, was the cost of restoring the property to its former condition, together with proper compensation for the loss of its use, unless such costs would exceed the value of the property when such value was the proper measure. The court said: "The defendant presented several points for charge, all of which were practically affirmed, with the exception of the first and second, the second being: 'Second, the measure of damages to plaintiff's premises, the injury not being shown to be permanent, is the cost of restoring it to its former condition, together with compensation for the loss of its use.' This point was negatived by the court. It is practically admitted by the appellee that it could properly have been affirmed, as containing the proper measure of damages, but it is averred that practically the same rule as to the measure of damages was laid down in the general charge, and that the appellant was not injured, because the point was not read, and that, therefore, the jury was not informed in any way as to the character of the ruling. We do not agree with this contention. It is not necessary to argue that the point contained the proper measure of damages, nor is it necessary to cite authorities upon the subject. In this charge the trial judge, in commenting upon the province of the jury, finished the paragraph by saying: 'The cost of remedying the injury to the real and personal property is the true measure of damages.' This is the only reference to the subject, which was a vital question and called for specific instructions. Whilst the remark of the trial judge was correct so far as it went, it did not cover the entire subject, nor was it emphasized in such a way as to call the particular attention of the jury to it. The true rule, as laid down in 13 Pepper & L. Dig. col. 22, 773, is: 'Where an injury to a house is not of a permanent character, the measure of damages is the cost of restoring the property to its former condition, together with compensation for the loss of its use, unless such costs should exceed the value of the building, in which case such value would be the measure of damages.'"

Where the building is old, dilapidated, or in a weakened condition, and the new building would be better than before the injury, the cost of repairing or rebuilding is not a proper criterion of the damage from the injury. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Davis (1898) 78 Ill. App. 58. In that case, an action of trespass on the case for damages sustained by the destruction of a building by fire, it appeared that the building was old and in a dilapidated condition. The admission of evidence of the cost of new material and the cost of construction was held to be error, the court saying: "Complaint is made as to the admission of so-called expert testimony as to the value of the building destroyed. The plaintiff did not claim to own any portion of the building which stood on the railroad right of way, even if it be conceded he owned that part which stood on his own land, which is disputed by appellant. It is clear, therefore, he could not recover for the loss of the building as a whole, and he only insisted upon a right to recover for the value of that portion he claimed to own. Yet the witnesses were allowed to make and testify to their estimates on the cost of new lumber, and also to include in their estimates the cost of labor in construction. This was error. The proofs show the building was old and dilapidated, having stood for an ice house for some twenty-two years, that it was in a tumbling-down condition, and a preponderance of the competent evidence is that it was worth no more than it would cost to take it down. Evidence as to the cost of new material, and the cost of construction, based upon the estimates of witnesses, some of whom did not know the building, could not fail to be highly injurious to appellant, and was certainly calculated to mislead the jury and enhance the damages. We think it was error to admit this evidence."

In Shrieve v. Stokes (1848) 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 453, 48 Am. Dec. 401, it appeared that the wall of a building fell because of the removal of the earth from an adjoining lot. In an action to recover damages, evidence of the probable cost of rebuilding the wall was admitted in evidence. The court held that inasmuch as the fallen wall was exceedingly weak and defective, and as the erection of a new wall would put the house in a better condition than before, the cost of a new wall could not be a criterion of the amount of damage, saying: "The evidence of the probable cost of rebuilding the wall was admissible as one of the elements which might be taken into consideration in estimating the damages sustained by the plaintiff from the falling of the old wall, if the loss of the wall was not otherwise supplied. But as the old wall was exceedingly weak and defective, and as, by the erection of a new wall, the house would be put in a much better condition than before, it is clear that the cost of a new wall could not form the proper criterion, nor in fact any criterion, for determining the loss of the plaintiff. The court, therefore, erred in the remarks to the jury on this subject, importing that there could not be a better criterion, under the circumstances, to ascertain how much it would take to put the plaintiff in as good a condition as before. And moreover, if in point of fact the plaintiff's house was put in as good or a better condition than before, without the cost of building a new wall, but by the use of the defendant's wall, as is estimated by the evidence, the cost of a new wall had nothing to do with the estimation of the damages, but rather the cost, if any, of the accommodation afforded by the defendant. The error on this point is deemed substantial and prejudicial."

If a lessee by the terms of his lease has the right to make alterations, "provided the same did not injure the premises," the proper measure of damages in an action against the lessee for the making of injurious alterations is not the cost of restoring the premises to their former condition, but the diminished value of the premises. Agate v. Lowenbein (1875) 6 Daly (N. Y.) 291.

In that case an instruction to the jury that they might take into consideration the decrease in the rental value and the reasonable cost of restoring the premises to their former condition, in an action against lessees for damages on account of injuries to the leased premises, caused by the removal of certain walls, partitions, gas fixtures, etc., was held to be erroneous, the court saying: "The charge was erroneous in respect to permitting the jury to take into consideration the value or the expense of restoring the premises to their former condition. The lessees and their assignees, the defendants, had the right, under the lease from plaintiff, to make any inside alterations to said premises, as he and they may think proper, 'provided the same did not injure the premises.' The defendants had the right to make alterations, so that in no event were they bound to deliver up the premises at the expiration of their term in the same state and condition and shape as when the term began, and they cannot be held liable for the cost of restoring the premises to their former condition. The lease contains no such provision, but a license, on the contrary, to make inside alterations. The premises were originally fitted up as a hotel or lodging house, the upper floors being divided into many apartments and closets by partitions with doors; the defendants tore down and destroyed all these partitions and doors, throwing each whole floor into one large loft or apartment for the purposes of a printing business, electrotyping establishment, etc. But as the lease containing the license for alterations restricted them to such as should not injure the premises, defendants became liable to respond in damages for any injury to the property inflicted by making such changes."

Evidence of the cost of repairs as estimated, two years after the injury, is incompetent unless considered with other testimony. Keats v. Gas Co. (1905) 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 480. In that case, an action to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's dwelling house caused by the overflow of a stream across which a dam was formed by debris being carried downstream against the gas pipe of defendant, which crossed the stream beneath a bridge which spanned it, evidence as to the cost of repairs necessary to restore the property to its former condition was given by a witness who had made the estimate two years after the flood. The court held that, while such evidence was incompetent of itself, it was competent when taken in connection with other evidence, saying: "The first is as to the admission of the testimony of a witness of the plaintiff who testified as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff, based upon the cost of the repairs necessary to restore the property to its former condition. The testimony of this witness would, of itself, have been incompetent, inasmuch as he made the estimate after the repairs had been made, and two years from the time of the flood had elapsed. Taken in connection, however, with the testimony of the plaintiff, we think it was competent. The testimony was submitted in connection with that of the plaintiff. The jury could, therefore, first determine whether the testimony of the plaintiff as to the condition of the property after the flood was credible, and, assuming it to be true, whether or not the testimony of the witness, based upon information furnished by her, was to be believed. Full opportunity for cross-examination was given, and upon a careful examination of the testimony we can see no error in its admission."

2. Minority rule.

In a few jurisdictions, however, the cost of rebuilding or repairing is not a proper element to be considered in the measurement of damages to a building. Morton v. Washington

Light & Water Co. (1915) 169 N. C. 468, 86 S. E. 294; Ulrick v. Dakota Loan & T. Co. (1891) 2 S. D. 285, 49 N. W. 1054; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Lasker Real Estate Asso. (1891) 81 Tex. 81, 16 S. W. 792.

In Ulrick v. Dakota Loan & T. Co. (1891) 2 S. D. 285, 49 N. W. 1054, an action to recover damages caused by an excavation on the defendant's property, whereby a building on contiguous property was damaged, the court held that the proper measure of damages was the diminution of the value of the building, and not the cost of repairing it. It was said: "The negligence of appellant in making such excavation being established, the court adopted and gave the jury the proper rule as to damages, to wit, the diminution of value of the property injured as the direct and legitimate result of such negligence and want of care. Where the excavation is made carefully, and with proper regard for the rights of the adjoining owner, and injury ensues, the measure of damages is the diminution of the value of the land in consequence of such excavation, not the cost of restoring the lot to its former condition. 3 Sutherland, Damages, 878; McGuire v. Grant (1855) 25 N. J. L. 356, 67 Am. Dec. 49; Gilmore v. Driscoll (1877) 122 Mass. 199, 23 Am. Rep. 312, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 37. And where, in consequence of the added element of negligence in making the excavation, the damages recoverable extend to buildings as well as soil, we think the rule of damages should be the same, to wit, the diminished value of the property injured, and not the cost of repairing it."

In Morton v. Washington Light & Water Co. (N. C.) supra, an action for damages for the destruction of a building by fire because of an insufficient supply of water to extinguish same, the defendant contended that the plaintiff had erected since the fire a more valuable building than the old one, and therefore he was not damaged by the fire. The court held that the cost of the new building could be used neither to enhance nor to reduce the damages. It was said: "Exceptions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8 and 9 are to the admission by the court, of evidence contrasting the value of the new building with the old. Exception 16 is to the charge of the court, which submitted to the consideration of the jury a contrast of the value of the two buildings based upon the above evidence. It seems to us that these exceptions are well taken. The plaintiff was suing for damage to the building that was destroyed by fire. The defendant's theory, based on the above evidence and charge, was that the plaintiff had erected on the lot since the fire a more valuable building than the old one, and that therefore he was not damaged by the fire. The cost of doing this was irrelevant. If the plaintiff had seen fit to erect in the place of the old building a cheaper one, this would not have enhanced the plaintiff's damage. Nor could the fact that he had erected a more valuable one, if he did so, reduce the damages. It may be that he made a good bargain in getting the new building erected cheaply, or a bad bargain in getting it erected at too great a cost. The insurance company, or the defendant, might have put back the building. Not having done so, the sole question is, 'What was the value of the building that was destroyed?'

In Pacific Exp. Co. v. Lasker Real Estate Asso. (Tex.) supra, an action for the recovery of damages caused by the partial destruction of a building by fire due to negligence on the part of the defendant's servant, the court instructed the jury that the proper measure of damages was an amount sufficient to restore the building to its condition immediately preceding the fire. Holding that this was erroneous, the court said: "The house was not entirely destroyed, and over defendant's objection the court permitted a witness to state what sum, in his opinion, it would have been necessary to expend in order to place the house in as good condition as it was before the fire. The court found that the negligence of appellant's servant was the cause of the fire, and that it would take $750 to place the house in the same condition it was before the fire, and for this sum, with interest, rendered a judgment. On the measure of damages the court found as follows: 'The measure of damages which plaintiff is entitled to recover is the amount which would have been necessary at the time and place of the damage to restore said house to its condition immediately preceding the fire, with interest on such sum at 8 per cent per annum from the date of damage to date of trial.' The evidence objected to was introduced for the purpose, evidently, of enabling the court to apply the measure of damages which the court assumed was the true measure. There was no evidence tending to show the value of the property before its destruction, other than that showing what it would cost to erect such a house, and we are of the opinion that the measure of damages applied by the court was not the correct one. The purpose in every case is to compensate the owner for the injury received, and the measure of damages which will accomplish this in a given case ought to be adopted. In the case before us there was no evidence on which the court could assess the damages according to any other measure than that adopted, and the burden of producing such evidence as would enable the court to properly assess the damages was on the plaintiff. Cases may arise in which the measure of damages adopted by the court would be equitable, but this would not be so in all cases. If a house was old it would be difficult to apply this measure, for in addition to the deterioration in value of the material in such a case there would necessarily be much dilapidation in the structure itself, and it would be impracticable, in the nature of things, to reconstruct in the same form and dimensions, without betterment, both in material and structure, and the cost of this would fall on a defendant. A business house, residence, or house adapted to any other purpose, when erected in a given locality, may then have a value by reason of the adaptation of the place where it is built to the use for which it is intended, which it ceases to have in after time by the change of business, residence, or other centers, whereby, at the later period, the property could not be sold with the land on which it stands for one fourth of what it would cost to reconstruct it, if destroyed. In such a case, to give to the owner of a house what it would cost to rebuild it, if partially or entirely destroyed, would be to give to him more than would be just compensation. In this time of rapid improvement in means of transportation and in all other directions, it is no unusual thing for a town to spring up rapidly at a place which for a time is the terminus of a railway, and for persons engaged in trade to erect expensive houses for business purposes, but in a short time the railway is constructed beyond that point and business goes with it, and then comes depreciation in value at the point which has ceased to be a business center; and houses then will not sell for anything like what it would cost to rebuild or repair if partially or wholly destroyed. In such a case the measure of compensation applied in this case would be manifestly unjust."

But in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ware (1887) 67 Tex. 635, 4 S. W. 13, an action for injuries to a house caused by the flow of water upon the premises due to the improper construction of a railroad, the court held that plaintiff was entitled to recover such sum as would be reasonably necessary to put the house in as good condition as it was before the overflow, saying: "The right to recover for any injury to the house caused by the negligence of the appellant, and the measure of damages, were fixed by facts existing long before the storm came which destroyed it, and the appellee would have been entitled to recover such sum as would have been necessary to put the house in as good condition as it was before the overflow, with reasonable compensation for any interruption in its use while in course of repair, or to the difference between the value of the house before and after it was injured, with compensation for any deprivation of its use necessarily suffered while it was being repaired."

And in Hooper v. Smith (1899) —

Tex. Civ. App. —, 53 S. W. 65, an action to recover damages for the injury to plaintiff's house, the court held that the rule of damages applicable to the injuries to the house was the reasonable cost of repairing the injuries.

Likewise in Highland v. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 65 S. W. 649, an action for the recovery of damages because of the destruction of a barn and other property by fire, set out by the defendant's engines, the plaintiff testified as to the cost of a new building of like character as the one destroyed, and the extent to which the old building had deteriorated by reason of age and usage. The court held that the jury could determine the intrinsic value of the building in the absence of market value, from the facts testified to by plaintiff, saying: "Plaintiff also complains of the part of the main charge in which the court limits the recovery by plaintiff for the destruction of his barn to the difference between the market value of the real estate on which it was situated immediately before and immediately after the fire. The point made is that the evidence showed, without dispute, that the real estate had no market value, and the jury were thus left with no measure by which to determine the amount of damage as to that particular item. We notice this assignment and one other only in view of another trial, as, in our opinion, the error did not influence the verdict rendered; the jury having decided in favor of the defendant on the question of general liability. It is disclosed by the record that there was no proof of the market value of the real estate, and it was fairly shown that it had none. Facts and circumstances as to the costs of a new building of like character as the one destroyed, and the extent to which the old building had deteriorated by reason of age and use, were testified to by plaintiff; and from these the jury could have fairly determined the extent of his intrinsic loss, in the absence of market value. That measure of damage should be adopted in each case which will most nearly compensate for the loss sustained, and where the existence of a market value before and after the loss is shown, the measure given by the court for the guidance of the jury was the proper one. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Lasker Real Estate Asso. (1891) 81 Tex. 81, 16 S. W. 792. But to allow this measure to control in a case like the present one would be to deny to plaintiff compensation for his loss, however clearly the liability of the defendant might be made to appear. Damages to real estate for which there might happen to be no market would be an irretrievable loss, however grave the wrong which caused the injury. Upon a like state of the evidence upon another trial, the court should allow recovery for the intrinsic loss in case liability in other respects is established."

IV. Original cost and cost of repairing or replacing considered together.

The original cost of an injured or destroyed building, and the reasonable cost of repairing or restoring it to the same condition it was in just prior to the injury, may be considered together, in the measurement of damages. State Ins. Co. v. Taylor (1890) 14 Colo. 499, 20 Am. St. Rep. 281, 24 Pac. 338; Wall v. Platt (1897) 169 Mass. 398, 48 N. E. 270; Dammann v. St. Louis (1899) 152 Mo. 186, 53 S. W. 982; Kilgore v. Lyle (1912) 30 Okla. 596, 120 Pac. 626; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Galvin (1915) — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917A, 365, 158 Pac. 1153.

In State Ins. Co. v. Taylor (Colo.) supra, it appeared that a building and its contents were insured against loss by fire. While the policy was still in force the building was destroyed by fire. In an action to recover such loss the court held that in order to assist the court in ascertaining the amount of loss, the original cost, the cost of constructing a like building at the time of the trial on the same land, and the difference in value between the building destroyed and a new one, were all proper elements to be taken into consideration. It was said: "It follows that the original cost of the building, the cost of constructing a like building at the time of trial, on the same land, and the difference in value between the building destroyed, by reason of its age and use, and a new one, were all proper inquiries to assist the court in arriving at a just conclusion in regard to the loss sustained; and the admission of evidence upon these points was not erroneous, as supposed by appellant."

In Wall v. Platt (1897) 169 Mass. 398, 48 N. E. 270, an action against the receivers of a railroad for damages for setting fire to the plaintiff's building, the auditor assessed the amount of damages in regard to the buildings by taking into consideration the original cost, the depreciation due to the use, the condition, and the cost of replacing them. The court held that, in the assessment of damages to buildings destroyed by fire, it was correct for the auditor to take into consideration the original cost of depreciation due to usage, age, and other like causes, and the cost of replacing, saying: "The supplemental report states the amount of damages if the rule of market value is to be applied, and how it was arrived at in the case of the buildings. In the report the auditor states that, in estimating the value of the buildings, he has 'taken into consideration the original cost, the depreciation consequent upon the use to which they had been put, the condition in which they were, and also the cost of replacing them by other buildings of the same character, with a proper allowance for the differences between new buildings and the condition of the buildings in question on the day of the fire,' and on that basis he finds the damages to be $5,250. Their fair market value in connection with the land he finds to be $3,250.

... Ordinarily, in determining the market value of buildings, they are valued either for the purpose of removal, or, as was the case here, in connection with the land on which they stand. The first manifestly would not afford just compensation in the present instance. In the second case, the value depends on the location and other considerations entering into the value of the land, and therefore would not necessarily constitute a just criterion of the loss actually sustained by the destruction of the buildings.

Sutherland, Damages, § 821. Buildings adapted to the land on which they stand are not bought and sold in the market separate from the land. We think that the manner in which the auditor arrived at the damages approaches more nearly the correct rule in cases like the present. We understand him to have assessed them according to the real value of the buildings at the time of the fire, and to have ascertained that by taking into account the original cost and the cost of replacing them, and making such allowance as depreciation from use, age, and other like causes, and the condition in which they were, required. We think that this was correct."

In an action for damages caused by the collapse and fall of plaintiffs' house due to the bursting of a water main in front of the house, testimony relating to its cost and the condition it was in at the time of the accident was admitted. Evidence was also admitted which tended to prove how much it would cost to restore the building to its original condition. The court held that there was sufficient evidence on which to predicate a charge given by the trial court to the effect that the measure of damages was the difference in the value of the building before and its value after the injury. It was said: "The objection to instruction number 3, given for the plaintiffs, is that there was no evidence tending to show the value of the building immediately before, and immediately after the accident, and hence there was no evidence upon which to base this instruction. No objection is made to the standard laid down in this instruction for the measurement of plaintiffs' damages, and while no expert witness was called to give his opinion as to the value of the building just before and just after the accident, yet it appeared from the evidence that the building was erected some time after March 11th, 1893, and at the time of the accident could not have been more than two years old. It further appeared how and of what materials it was constructed, what it cost, and in what condition it was at the time of the accident, the effect of the accident upon it and the condition in which it was left afterward, and evidence tending to prove how much it would cost to restore the building to its original condition. Surely here was evidence upon which to predicate this or any other proper instruction as to the measure of plaintiffs' damages." Dammann v. St. Louis (1899) 152 Mo. 186, 53 S. W. 932.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Galvin (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917A, 365, 158 Pac. 1153, an action for the recovery of the value of a building which was destroyed by fire, testimony relating to the cost of replacing the building was admitted. The court held that when evidence as to the cost of replacing a building destroyed by fire was admitted, further evidence must also be admitted to show the original cost of the building and its depreciation, due to age, usage, and other causes, saying: "The principal assignment of error relates to the admission of certain testimony as to cost of rebuilding the destroyed house. A witness for plaintiff testified that the actual cash value of the building, on the date of its destruction, was $900. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Farmers' Gin Co. (1913) 89 Okla. 162, 134 Pac. 448. There is no objection raised to the qualification of this witness or the admission of his testimony on this point. But another witness was permitted to testify that it would cost $1,200 to rebuild the destroyed building with new material, and it is against this testimony that the main claim for reversal is predicated. This witness testified as to the cost of rebuilding only, and defendant insists that such testimony, standing alone, was incompetent, and that in order to make the same competent there must have been further testimony as to the original cost of the building and as to its depreciation from use, age, and other causes. This contention seems to be supported by all the authorities. Sutherland on Damages, 3d ed. vol. 4, p. 2967, says: "The real value of a building is to be ascertained by taking into account the original cost, and the cost of replacing it, and making allowance for depreciation from use, age, and other like causes.'"

In Kilgore v. Lyle (1912) 30 Okla. 596, 120 Pac. 626, in an action by a landlord against a tenant to recover damages because of the wrongful removal from the land of certain fixtures, which consisted of a windmill, fences, guttering around the house, and lightning rods erected by the tenant, evidence as to the cost of the fixtures was introduced. The court held that the measure of damages for a destroyed or damaged building is the value of the building, and that the real value of a building should be ascertained from the original cost, and the cost of replacing it, making proper allowances for depreciation by reason of age, usage, and other causes. It was said: "The court admitted evidence tending to show the value of the fixtures removed, and in so doing evidence of their cost was introduced. The defendant claims that this was erroneous in two respects—one in that the measure of damages was the difference between the market value of the land before and after the fixtures were removed; and the other in that, if the value of the fixtures was the proper measure of damages, then it was incompetent to show their cost, but that the testimony should have been limited to their value at the time of their removal. We think the defendant is wrong in both particulars. In 4 Sutherland on Damages, 3d ed. ¶ 1015, p. 2967, it is said: 'If the thing destroyed, although it is part of the realty, has a value which can be accurately ascertained without reference to the soil on which it stands or out of which it grows, the recovery may be of the value of the thing thus destroyed, and not for the difference in the value of the land before and after such destruction. By value, in such a case, is meant the actual, not the market, value. The real value of a building is to be ascertained by taking into account the original cost and the cost of replacing it, and making allowance for depreciation from use, age, and other like causes, as the condition in which it was required.' In such cases evidence of the cost of improvements is competent as a means of ascertaining their value, as is indicated by the quotation from Sutherland on Damages, just made."

While, when the original cost of a building injured or destroyed, and the cost of replacing or repairing, is taken into consideration, allowance should ordinarily be made for depreciation due to age, usage, and other like causes, when the building or that part of it destroyed is practically new, and the deduction for wear and tear would be small or nominal, the wear and tear need not be shown.

Hearn v. McDonald (1911) 69 W. Va. 435, 71 S. E. 568. In that case evidence was given showing what it would cost for new roofs to replace same which were greatly damaged by reason of rocks being cast on them from blasting. There was no evidence given as to the amount to be allowed for wear and tear. The court said: "The only point involved in the case is this: The plaintiff gave evidence showing what new roofs for the houses would cost, and gave no evidence to show what amount should be allowed for wear and tear of the roofs during the three or four years of their life, and claimed that a recovery of the cost of new roofs, without abatement for use and wear, is erroneous. The argument is that recovery could be only for the value of the roofs at the time of their destruction; that it should have been shown what was the depreciation from the cost of new roofs owing to wear and tear; that from the cost of new roofs there should have been proven a specific sum for such wear and tear, and that deducted from the cost of new roofs; and on this basis the claim is there was no measure of damages fixed. We do not deny the legal proposition that where a building is destroyed the value is to be ascertained by taking into account the original cost and the cost of replacing it, and making an allowance for depreciation from use, age, and other like causes as the condition in which it was required. Sutherland, Damages, 2967; Wall v. Platt (1897) 169 Mass. 398, 48 N. E. 270. But upon the evidence in this case we find that the roofs were as good as new, practically, that they had been on but a short time, and had been well preserved by being kept painted, and were practically as good as new. Under the evidence such deduction would be small or nominal. It seems a small matter upon which to reverse a decree and protract litigation." R. C. L.

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, denying its motion for an injunction pendente lite to restrain defendant from inducing an employee of complainant to breach his contract of employment with it. Affirmed.

Statement by Learned Hand, District Judge:

Appeal from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for an injunction pendente lite. The jurisdiction of the court depended upon diverse citizenship. The plaintiff is a Virginia corporation engaged in manufacturing, distributing, and exhibiting moving pictures, and on the 26th day of March, 1917, entered into a contract with one William S. Hart, of Los Angeles, California. By this contract the plaintiff engaged Hart as an actor, to perform in motion picture productions, "which are to be manufactured by the employer under the supervision of Thomas H. Ince." Hart accepted the employment "under the supervision of the said Thomas H. Ince." The contract recited that it was intended to be superseded by one in more elaborate form, and both parties acknowledged that Hart could not be replaced. It concluded as follows: "This contract is made upon the condition and with the understanding that the employee will be supervised in his acting and work hereunder by Thomas H. Ince." On the day mentioned Ince was in the employ of the plaintiff as manufacturing producer at its studio in Culver City, California, and held an interest in its stock, but on June 12, 1917, he sold out all this interest and severed his relations with it. Hart, upon learning these facts, terminated his relations with the plaintiff, and both Hart and Ince went into the employ of the defendant. It may be assumed that the defendant offered to take Hart in, and, indeed, that it persuaded him to accept. It may also be assumed that the defendant knew of the contract between the plaintiff and Hart. Ince, however, violated no contract between himself and the plaintiff in selling out his stock interests in it, or terminating his relations, nor is there undisputed evidence that, having done so, he attempted to dissuade Hart from continuing in the plaintiff's employ.

Argued before Rogers and Hough, Circuit Judges, and Learned Hand, District Judge.

Messrs. Alfred S. Barnard and Walter N. Seligsberg for appellant.

Messrs. Elek John Ludvigh and Harold M. Pitman for appellee.

Learned Hand, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case depends either on Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; 118 Eng. Reprint, 749, 22 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 463, 17 Jur. 827, 1 Week. Rep. 432, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 706, or upon a strangely misconceived extension of that doctrine. Lumley v. Gye, supra, a wholesome and widely accepted case, we not only accept on principle, but we should in any case be bound to treat it as law upon authority. Bitterman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 207 U. S. 205, 52 L. ed. 171, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 91, 12 Ann. Cas. 693; Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 55, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240. And in that aspect the case stands upon the question whether Hart violated his contract. He so clearly did not that we hardly feel justified in any discussion of the question. He had, in substance, stipulated that his term should not last beyond Ince's connection with the plaintiff, and no one suggests that Ince had no right to sell out his interest and leave. Assuming, then, that the defendant did induce him to leave, it did not run counter to the doctrine of Lumley v. Gye, supra.

Realizing the danger of such a conclusion, the plaintiff then stands upon another leg, which is this: The reasonable expectation of an employer that his employees will continue with him is a part of his

"good will," as we say, and anyone who hurts him in that "good will" does him an "injury," even though there be no contract broken and the employee might leave at pleasure. Lord Bowen put the doctrine as well as anybody in Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 598, 613, that intentional damage to one's property or trade without "just cause" is actionable. Moreover, the Supreme Court in Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 60 L. ed. 131, L.R.A. 1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283, and Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell (December 10, 1917) 245 U. S. 229, 62 L. ed. 260, L.R.A. 1918C, 497, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 65, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 461, has said that in such cases there may be a right of action, though the person persuaded does not break a contract in leaving.

Yet it is clear that the real question turns upon what is "just cause" ("Privilege, Intent, and Malice," Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., 8 Harvard L. Rev. 1), and that in effect it makes slight difference whether one asks in respect of what "cause of action" the plaintiff suffered his damage, or whether the defendant had "just cause" for inflicting the damage, though it does make a good deal of difference in the development of the law. Nobody has ever thought, so far as we can find, that, in the absence of some monopolistic purpose, everyone has not the right to offer better terms to another's employee, so long as the latter is free to leave. The result of the contrary would be intolerable, both to such employers as <sup>Injunction—</sup> could use the em- <sup>against enticing</sup> <sup>employee.</sup> ployee more effectively and to such employees as might receive added pay. It would put an end to any kind of competition.

That such a doctrine should be supposed to follow from Truax v. Raich, supra, or Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, supra, somewhat surprises us. In the first case the defendant had threatened to use illegal means to induce the employer to discharge the plaintiff. In the second, a labor union had determined to compel a mine to operate as a closed shop, and that, too, by fraud. It was held that, since the union was not seeking to redress wrongs of which any of the plaintiff's employees complained, but intervened only for the purpose of preventing any open shops which might compete with closed shops elsewhere, they had no "just cause" for the ensuing damage. That purpose—i. e., to compel the whole industry to operate closed shops—was held to be illegal, and the illegality depended upon the supposedly meddling character of the intervention. That nobody in his own business may offer better terms to an employee, himself free to leave, is so extraordinary a doctrine, that we do not feel called upon to consider it at large.

The order is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right to hire one who violates no contract in leaving another's employment.

- I. In general, 305.
- II. Hiring after expiration of contract, 306.
- III. Hiring employee engaged on piece work, 306.

I. In general.

One who hires a person who is in the employment of another, but violates no contract in leaving that employment, is held in the reported case (TRIANGLE FILM CORP. v. ARTCRAFT PICTURES CORP. ante, 303) to be acting within his legal rights, and cannot be held liable therefor. In that case it appeared that the employee was relieved of his obligations under the contract, by the failure of the employer to carry out the terms thereof, and it was consequently held that the defendant was acting within his legal rights in hiring the employee.

The three following cases, while not within the scope of this note, contain dicta directly in point: In the much cited case of Walker v. Cronin (1871) 107 Mass. 555, the court said: "Thus everyone has an equal right to employ workmen in his business or service; and if, by the exercise of this right in such manner as he may see fit, persons are induced to leave their employment elsewhere, no wrong is done to him whose employment they leave, unless a contract exists by which such other person has a legal right to the further continuance of their services." In Beekman v. Marsters (1907) 195 Mass. 205, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201, 122 Am. St. Rep. 232, 80 N. E. 817, 11 Ann. Cas. 332, it was said: "If a defendant by an offer of higher wages induces a laborer who is not under contract to enter his (the defendant's) employ in place of the plaintiff's, the plaintiff is not injured in his legal rights." And in Driver v. Smith (1918) 89 N. J. Eq. 339, 104 Atl. 717, the court said: "And it is likewise true that an employee at will may at any time leave his employer, and that a stranger may, by an offer of higher wages, induce him to leave his employment and become employed with the stranger. A stranger may not, however, interfere with the employment for no justifiable reason."

But in Salter v. Howard (1871) 43 Ga. 601, the court, while considering the contract of employment as incomplete, decided that, since the employees were at work in pursuance of the agreement, such relationship of master and servant was constituted thereby as might not be interfered with.

In Peters v. Lord (1846) 18 Conn. 337, where the plaintiffs sought to hold the defendant liable for enticing and harboring their servant, a minor, it appeared that the servant had left the service of the plaintiffs two weeks before he was employed by the defendant, who was consequently held not liable. The court said by way of dictum: "Had the defendant seduced the minor from the service of the plaintiffs, they might, according to the cases, have treated him as their servant de facto, and recovered of the defendant."

And in Cox v. Muncey (1859) 6 C. B. N. S. 376, 141 Eng. Reprint, 503, it was sought to hold the defendant liable for enticing an apprentice, but it was held that there was no valid contract of apprenticeship. The court, however, said obiter: "But we incline to think that, if the action had been brought on the footing of the youth being the servant of the plaintiff, the defendant would have been liable, there being evidence of enticement."

In each of the following cases, wherein it appeared that one in the service of another left that service without the violation of a contract, the defendant was charged with, but not held liable, for enticing the servant of the plaintiff, and it was not shown that the defendant hired or attempted to hire the servant, so that the cases are not strictly within the scope of this note: Parsons v. Trask (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 473, 66 Am. Dec. 502; Campbell v. Cooper (1856) 34 N. H. 49; Poston v. Lyerly (1916) 105 S. C. 37, 89 S. E. 392. See also Morgan v. Smith (1877) 77 N. C. 37; Trebilcock v. Burton (1904) 3 Ont. Week. Rep. 314. Compare Duckett v. Pool (1890) 33 S. C. 238, 11 S. E. 689.

II. Hiring after expiration of contract.

One may lawfully hire the employee of another, provided the service is not to commence until after the expiration of the prior employment. Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney (1827) 4 Pick. (Mass.) 425; Nichol v. Martyn (1799) 2 Esp. (Eng.) 734, 5 Revised Rep. 770.

In Nichol v. Martyn (Eng.) supra, "it was suggested in the course of the cause, that the defendant," who was intending to engage in business for himself similar to that of the plaintiff, "had seduced some of the servants of the plaintiff to quit their service, and to enter" his own. The court said "that seducing a servant, and enticing him to leave his master while the master by the contract had a right to his services, was certainly actionable; but that to induce a servant to leave his master's service at the expiration of the time for which the servant had hired himself, although the servant had no intention at the time of quitting his master's service, was not the subject of an action."

In Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney (Mass.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiffs had in their employ certain workmen who were not under contract with them, but might leave on a fortnight's notice, and that the defendants had employed certain of these men, who were to begin work for them only after the expiration of the term, after notice given. The plaintiffs charged the defendants with enticing their servants, but the court said: "The defendants had a legal right to make a contract with the plaintiff's laborers, to take effect after the expiration of their term of service with the plaintiffs."

III. Hiring employee engaged on piece work.

The English courts seem to hold that one who hires the employee of another is liable therefor, though the employee is not bound by contract for a certain period, but is engaged on piece work. Anonymous (1774) Loft, 493, 98 Eng. Reprint, 764; Hart v. Aldridge (1774) Cowp. pt. 1, p. 54, 98 Eng. Reprint, 364; Gunter v. Astor (1819) 4 J. B. Moore (Eng.) 12, 21 Revised Rep. 733.

In Anonymous (1774) Loft, 493, 98 Eng. Reprint, 764, an action wherein it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant on the ground that the defendant had enticed and hired a shoemaker who had been employed by the plaintiff to work by the piece, Aston, J., said: "If a servant be retained for any special work, and departs from this unfinished, an action will lie against any who seduces him to depart."

In Gunter v. Astor (1819) 4 J. B. Moore (Eng.) 12, 21 Revised Rep. 733, it appeared that the plaintiff was a piano manufacturer, employing a number of workmen who worked by the piece, and whom the defendant enticed away and hired. The jury awarded the plaintiff damages in the amount of £1,600, two years' profit, and this finding was upheld by the court.

In Hart v. Aldridge (1774) Cowp.

pt. 1, p. 54, 98 Eng. Reprint, 964, it appeared that two journeymen shoemakers, who had been employed by the plaintiff to work by the piece, had been persuaded by the defendant to leave plaintiff's service while some work was yet unfinished, and to enter the service of the defendant. The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant in an action of trespass on the case for enticing away his servants. Lord Mansfield considered that the gist of the action was "that the defendant had enticed a man away who stood in the relation of servant to the plaintiff, and by whom he was to be benefited," and that the men were "attached to this particular master." And Ashton,

J., said: "It is clear that a master may maintain an action against anyone for taking and enticing away his servant, upon the ground of the interest which he has in his service and labor. And even supposing, as my Lord has stated, that the servant did live in his own house, if he were employed to finish a certain number of shoes for a particular person by a fixed time, and a third person enticed him away, I think an action would lie. If not, it might be of very bad consequence in trade. He is a servant quoad hoc, and though the seducer and enticer is much the worse, yet the law inflicts a penalty upon workmen leaving their work undone." R. S.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland (Rose, District J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of his intestate alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent, wrongful, and unlawful act. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Pritchard, Knapp, and Woods, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. M. M. Neely and William L. Marbury, for plaintiff in error:

The sheriff under proper circumstances has the right and duty to use all the force or violence necessary to effect the arrest of a party charged with felony, but not so in the case of a misdemeanor.

Evans, 110 C. C. A. 156, 188 Fed. 6.

Woods, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 27, 1917, Donald P. Davis, sheriff of Mineral county, West Virginia, in the execution of a warrant he held for the arrest of the defendant Peter Weissengoff, stepped upon the running board of defendant's automobile as he was driving through the town of Piedmont, West Virginia. The car was not stopped, but continued in somewhat rapid motion until it struck an abutment of the Potomac bridge between Piedmont, West Virginia, and Westernport, Maryland, and killed Davis. In this action for damages for his death, brought by the administrator in the district of Maryland, the question on the merits was whether the accident was due either to the defendant's unlawful resistance of arrest or attempt to escape after arrest, carried into effect by refusal to stop the car and relinquish its actual control to the sheriff, or by running it at a reckless or dangerous rate of speed; or to wanton and unlawful conduct of Davis in seizing the wheel and struggling with the defendant for the control of the car, and in the struggle moving the accelerator and increasing the speed, and pulling on the wheel so as to drive it against the bridge.

A demurrer to the jurisdiction was overruled, and the jury found a verdict of $10,000 for the plaintiff. In support of the demurrer to the jurisdiction defendant relies on Ash v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 72 Md. 144, 20 Am. St. Rep. 461, 19 Atl. 643, holding that the statute of West Virginia, conferring a right of action for wrongful death, is not enforceable in the court of Maryland, the Maryland statute on the subject being similar, but not identical. That case was decided in 1876, and it does not seem that the court of Maryland has been called on since to review the question. But it is now settled beyond debate by the Supreme Court of the United States that, when the statute of one state takes away the common-law obstacle to a recovery for an admitted tort, an action for the tort committed in that state may be maintained in any state where the statute of the state in which the cause of action arose is not in substance inconsistent with the statute or public policy of the state in which the right is sought to be enforced. The question is one of general law, and the decisions of the Supreme Court are binding in this court. Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 978; Stewart v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 168 U. S. 445, 42 L. ed. 537, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105; Farrugia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 233 U. S. 353, 58 L. ed. 996, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591.

Conflict of laws—enforcement of action for death in other state.

The defendant knew the sheriff had a warrant for his arrest for the misdemeanor of selling liquor in West Virginia. There was testimony on behalf of plaintiff that Davis stood in front of the moving car in which the defendant had four of his children, and waved to defendant to stop, telling him he had a warrant for him and that he was under arrest; that defendant refused to stop, and increased the speed of the car, saying to Davis he would see him some other time; that Davis jumped on the running board of the car, and again said, "Pete, you are under arrest." The defendant denied that Davis signaled him to stop or said anything until he jumped on the running board; but he knew Davis had a warrant for him, and the evidence leaves no doubt that defendant knew that Davis by his action meant to arrest him. The defendant gave this account: "Front of the bank building and I passed down this way, and he just jumped on my car, and this way, some way (indicating), and grabbed that wheel, and I guess pushed that throttle on, and the machine started to zigzag. I hold, and children scared, one fall down on my feet, and another grab me (indicating) and hollering, 'Papa, Papa.' Machine come close to sidewalk, and I hold on as I could so get in road and find myself on bridge, and that is all I know. This throttle stand here (indicating). Stick out, like you jump and grab with left hand wheel, and then grab that right-hand wheel (indicating), and shove my hands down on bar. I had my hands on bar, and he had his hands on top, and started gas, and the machine started to run fast."

Other testimony on behalf of defendant was to the effect that he and Davis were struggling for control of the wheel, and talking loudly to each other, about 275 yards from the bridge, and that the struggle and loud talking continued until the car struck the bridge—Davis pulling one way and defendant the other. One of the witnesses testified that Davis gave a pull on the wheel toward the girder post before the car struck.

The distance from the bank building where Davis got on the machine, to the bridge, is 820 feet. The car was driven at a speed of 20 to 25 miles an hour from the bank to the bridge, and turned in its course two curves, one very sharp. This turn, it seems, would have been impossible if Davis had been then seriously interfering with the course of the car. Two other facts are evident from the testimony, beyond reasonable controversy: Defendant alone had access to the brakes, and could have stopped the car at once; defendant continued to run the car in defiance of the sheriff's authority, to escape arrest by getting into Maryland.

The case turns on the soundness and applicability to the evidence of the following request of defendant, refused by the district judge: "The jury are further instructed that the offense with which the defendant stood indicted at the time when it is alleged that the sheriff, Donald P. Davis, attempted to arrest him, is a misdemeanor, and that in making an arrest for the committing of a misdemeanor the sheriff, or other officer of the law, is not justified in taking human life, or in employing any method or means in making such arrest as will expose the person to be arrested, or those accompanying him, to serious risk or deadly injury, unless the party whom such officer is attempting to arrest resists such arrest in some manner more serious than by attempting to run away from such officer; and even if the jury believe from all the evidence that the defendant attempted to avoid arrest at the hand of the sheriff by simply fleeing from said sheriff, and that said sheriff attempted to make such arrest of the defendant in such a reckless manner as not only greatly to endanger the life of the defendant and his four children, who were in the defendant's automobile, but in such a reckless manner that the automobile in which the defendant was then and there riding was wrecked as a result of such recklessness on the part of the said sheriff, thereby causing the death of said sheriff, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this case, and the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant."

The law of the case was given to the jury in these two propositions—the first at request of plaintiff, and the second at request of defendant:

(1) "The jury are instructed that, under the uncontradicted evidence in this case, Donald P. Davis, deceased, on the 27th day of June, 1917, was sheriff of Mineral county, West Virginia, and had in his possession a warrant for the arrest of the defendant, and on said date saw the defendant driving on Child's avenue, in the town of Piedmont, West Virginia, in his motor car, and the said defendant then and there knew that the said Donald P. Davis had a warrant for his arrest; and if the jury believes from the evidence that the defendant understood that the said Donald P. Davis then and there wanted to arrest him, and that the said defendant while driving said car on Child's avenue saw the said Donald P. Davis approach his car, as he believed, for the purpose of arresting him, but that the said defendant then and there made an effort to escape from arrest by speeding up his automobile, and further find that the said Donald P. Davis thereupon stepped on the running board of the said automobile in order effectually to place said defendant under arrest, and further find that the said defendant then and there had his car under control, and could have stopped his car, but, on the other hand, increased the speed of the said automobile for the purpose of escaping from arrest, and further find that in his effort to escape arrest the car of the said defendant was driven at a dangerous, reckless, and unlawful speed by the defendant, and so negligently and recklessly that the said car was run against one of the iron supports of the bridge leading from Piedmont, West Virginia, to Westernport, Maryland, and that as a result thereof the said Donald P. Davis was so seriously injured that from the effects thereof he died soon thereafter, then the verdict of the jury shall be for the plaintiff."

(2) "The jury are instructed that unless they shall find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, in a wilful attempt to escape arrest, intentionally increased the speed of his automobile with a view of escaping from the state of West Virginia, or, with such intent, failed to use means (if such were accessible to him) which a reasonably prudent and law-abiding person would, under the circumstances, have used to stop the car, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

We think this was a fair statement of the law applicable to the facts, and that the request refused was <sup>Arrest—right to kill to effect.</sup> not applicable. A sheriff may not kill or imperil life in the effort to arrest a person charged with a misdemeanor or to prevent his escape after arrest. 2 R. C. L. 471; Thomas v. Kinkead, 55

Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 68, 18 S. W. 854; Brown v. Weaver, 76 Miss. 7, 42 L.R.A. 423, 71 Am. St. Rep. 512, 23 So. 388; State use of Johnson v. Cunningham, 107 Miss. 140, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1179, 65 So. 115.

In this case there can be no doubt that the act of the sheriff in stepping on the car by the side of defendant with his warrant indicat-

—how effected. ed to defendant the purpose to take him into custody as distinctly as if the sheriff had walked up to him on the street and touched him on the shoulder with the announcement of arrest, and was a complete arrest. 2 R. C. L. 445; Rhodes v. Walsh, 55 Minn. 542, 23 L.R.A. 632, 57 N. W. 212. The arrest not only conferred legal control and custody of the body of the defendant, but, as a necessary incident, the legal custody and control of the automobile in which he was riding. The fallacy in the request refused was in assuming that defendant had legal control of the car, and asking the submission to the jury of the question whether the defendant was resisting the arrest in some manner no more serious than by simply attempting to run away and attempting to avoid arrest by simply fleeing from the sheriff. The conduct of defendant was much more than a mere attempt to escape. It was aggressive resistance. After the sheriff stepped on the car and made the arrest, the struggle for —struggle to resist arrest.

control of the machine between him and the defendant was an unlawful struggle, initiated not by the officer, but by the defendant, to wrest the machine from lawful control, asserted and taken by the officer. By initiating and persisting in the effort to wrest the control of the car from the sheriff, the defendant took the risk of his unlawful and aggressive action. It was the duty of the sheriff to overcome this active resistance by force proportionate to it. Hawkins v. Com. 61 Am. Dec. 161, note; State v. Evans, 84 Am. St. Rep. 696, note;

State v. Krakus, 5 Boyce (Del.) 326, 93 Atl. 554; Leger v. Warren, 51 L.R.A. 215, note; 2 R. C. L. 470. The principle stated has been applied in analogous cases.

After demanding the opening of the doors of a man's dwelling house, it is the duty of an officer with a warrant charging a misdemeanor to break the doors, and if the accused resists, and in the struggle injures or kills the officer, he is a wrongdoer. 5 C. J. 426; Farmer v. Sellers, 89 S. C. 492, 72 S. E. 224.

An officer has the right to stop a train or stagecoach to effect an arrest. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. v. Hunt, 60 Vt. 588, 1 L.R.A. 189, 6 Am. St. Rep. 138, 15 Atl. 186; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Ponder, 117 Ga. 63, 60 L.R.A. 713, 97 Am. St. Rep. 152, 43 S. E. 430, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 254. Inevitably it follows that if, in the exercise of the duty to stop the train and make the arrest, the officer steps on the engine, and the engineer initiates a struggle with the officer to wrest the temporary control of the engine from him, he is liable for the consequences of the struggle. It would hardly be disputed that if defendant, after arrest, had pointed a gun at the sheriff as a means of effecting his escape, and in the struggle for the possession of the gun it had been accidentally discharged and killed the sheriff, the defendant would be civilly liable. It is true that, if in such a struggle initiated by the defendant the officer does a wanton or malicious act resulting in injury to the defendant, he, and not the defendant, would be responsible. 2 R. C. L. 470; 5 C. J. 424. But in this case, even if the sheriff, in the excitement of the struggle initiated by the defendant, did so move the wheel that the car struck the bridge, it would be beyond all reason to say that the jury could find he maliciously or wantonly ran a car going 20 to 25 miles an hour against the bridge, when he knew that the impact would almost certainly result in his own death or serious injury.

Death—caused by resisting arrest—liability.

The overwhelming presumption is against such an inference. Viewing the testimony most favorably to the defendant, the only reasonable inference is that the defendant, after his arrest and after the sheriff had assumed legal control of the car, undertook to wrest it from the sheriff's legal custody, and in consequence of the struggle thus begun by the defendant the car was unintentionally driven against the bridge.

Davis was an officer of the state of West Virginia, executing its warrant for the arrest of the defendant. His duty to enforce that warrant and the duty of the defendant not to resist within that state fall within the principle thus forcefully laid down by Justice Bradley in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717:

"Why do we have marshals at all, if they cannot physically lay their hands on persons and things in the performance of their proper duties? What functions can they perform if they cannot use force? In executing the processes of the courts, must they call on the nearest constable for protection? Must they rely on him to use the requisite compulsion, and to keep the peace, whilst they are soliciting and entreating the parties and bystanders to allow the law to take its course? . . .

"The argument is based on a strained and impracticable view of the nature and powers of the national government. It must execute its powers, or it is no government. It must execute them on the land as well as on the sea, on things as well as on persons. And, to do this, it must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace; and no person or power in this land has the right to resist or question its authority, so long as it keeps within the bounds of its jurisdiction."

Under these circumstances the first request of the defendant granted by the court was as favorable as the defendant had the right to ask, especially when it is considered with the conditions of recovery set out in plaintiff's first request.

The defendant had been tried in the state court under a criminal charge of responsibility for the death of Davis. By stipulation, "that either the plaintiff or the defendant may read from a copy of the record in said criminal case as testimony, to the jury, the evidence of any of the witnesses who testified in said criminal case, from the record in said criminal case, without the personal attendance of any of the said witnesses, and said testimony, when read to the jury, is to have the same effect as if the said witnesses were present in court and so testified, so far as the same may be admissible in evidence." Under this stipulation the defendant offered, as tending to prove that defendant was not attempting to escape, the statement of Mr. Whitworth, one of defendant's counsel in the state court, which had been offered in the criminal trial there, but rejected as incompetent. This statement was to the effect that, under Mr. Whitworth's advice, defendant was ready to give bond for his appearance, and thus avoid formal arrest by the sheriff under the warrant held by him. As this was not the evidence of any witness who testified in the criminal case, it is not covered by the stipulation. But, waiving that, its exclusion was harmless, in view of the conclusive evidence that defendant was trying to escape.

ANNOTATION.

Civil liability for killing or injuring one who was attempting to make an arrest.

The question considered in the reported case (WEISSENGOFF v. DAVIS, ante, 307), of civil liability for killing an officer or person attempting to make an arrest or to execute a search warrant, seems to have arisen in only a few cases. Damages for death under these circumstances were recovered in the WEISSENGOFF CASE, and also in Young v. Young (1910) 141 Ky. 76, 132 S. W. 155, and Farmer v. Sellers (1911) 89 S. C. 492, 72 S. E. 224.

In Farmer v. Sellers (S. C.) supra, damages were recovered for the killing by the defendant of a constable who was attempting to enter the defendant's house to search for contraband liquor, the questions considered being whether the constable was an officer whose authority to execute a search warrant the defendant was bound to respect, or was a mere trespasser, and whether the search warrant was sufficient. The court stated that the defendant asked the court to lay down as the law the utterly untenable proposition that the defendant could treat the constable as a mere intruder in the office of constable and a bald trespasser on his premises, because of certain alleged irregularities in his appointment and qualifications as a constable. It was held also that the delay of forty-eight days in serving the warrant was not sufficient, as matter of law, to destroy its force, but that the question whether the execution of the warrant had been unreasonably delayed had been properly submitted to the jury. And this conclusion, the court said, made unnecessary the consideration of the question whether the defendant would not have shot at his peril in resisting an officer demanding admittance under a search warrant, even after the expiration of a reasonable time from the date of its issuance.

The questions considered in Young v. Young (1910) 141 Ky. 76, 132 S. W. 155, where a lunatic shot and killed a deputy sheriff who was attempting to take him into custody, are not entirely peculiar to the subject under consideration. It was held that the fact of lunacy would not relieve from civil liability for death on the theory that the lunatic was not responsible for his acts, or on the ground that the statute could not apply to him in that it gave to the widow and minor child of the person killed by "the careless, wanton, or malicious" use of firearms, not in self-defense, an action against the person who committed the killing. The court said that while it might be true that carelessness or malice could not be imputed to a lunatic, the word "wanton" applied aptly to the facts of the case. It was held also that allegations in the petition were sufficient that the killing was "unlawful and wrongful," and not in self-defense.

RE ESTATE OF JOHN A. McNAMARA, Deceased.

JOHN HAMILTON McNAMARA, by Guardian, Respt.,

v.

MARY JEANETTE McNAMARA et al., Appts.

(— Cal. —, 183 Pac. 552.)

Bastard — exceptional period of gestation — presumption of legitimacy.

1. The conclusive presumption of legitimacy does not prevail where a child was born an exceptional time after separation of husband and wife, although the period was a possible one.

[See note on this question beginning on page 329.]

Appeal — rehearing — time of allowance.

2. That an order granting a rehearing was not filed within the time allowed by the Constitution for granting rehearings is immaterial if the order was actually passed within the required time.

— correction of record.

3. The date upon an order granting a rehearing on appeal will be corrected to make it speak the truth, where it indicates that the order was not within the time allowed by the Constitution.

Bastardy — presumption of intercourse.

4. Upon the question of bastardy, intercourse between husband and wife when they were last together with opportunity for intercourse will be conclusively presumed.

— weighing of probabilities between husband and another.

5. In cases where only usual or normal periods of gestation are involved, there will be no guessing or weighing of probabilities as to the fatherhood of a child, where the husband and another person both had access to the mother during such period.

Evidence — judicial notice — period of gestation.

6. The court may take judicial notice that 304 days is greater than the usual or normal period of gestation, and for that purpose may seek information outside the records in the case before it.

7. The statutory presumption that children born within 10 months after dissolution of a marriage are legitimate is merely prima facie.

8. A statutory declaration that children born within 10 months after dissolution of a marriage shall be presumed to be legitimate does not declare a policy which will require the court to make the presumption conclusive.

Bastard — statutory presumption of legitimacy — months.

9. The 10 months mentioned by a statute raising a presumption of legitimacy of children born within 10 months after dissolution of a marriage must be taken to be months of 30 days.

Evidence — presumption of legitimacy — overcoming.

10. The prima facie presumption of legitimacy of every child born in wedlock can be overcome only by clear and satisfactory evidence.

— bastardy — sufficiency.

11. A finding of bastardy is supported by evidence that a woman left her husband and cohabited with another, had a full menstrual period after so doing within a normal period after which the child was born, but after an abnormal period after the separation, and that all parties concerned regarded the child as that of her paramour.

Parent and child — adoption — sufficiency of evidence.

12. Sufficient acknowledgment of an illegitimate child to constitute adoption is shown by the father's signing the birth certificate, acknowledging the child to be his, and receiving the child into the father's family, caring for it as his child.

— family — establishment.

13. A man may establish a family consisting of himself, a woman with whom he is living without marriage, and their illegitimate child, so as to effect the adoption of the child by caring for it in such family.

[See 3 R. C. L. 742.]

Evidence — of wife — nonaccess of husband.

14. A wife may testify to nonaccess by her husband after separation from him, in a controversy over the legitimacy of her child, under statutes permitting evidence of facts from which those in dispute are logically inferable, and making all persons, without exception, who can perceive and make known their perceptions to others, witnesses.

— declarations of paternity.

15. Declarations of a man that he is father of a child are admissible for the purpose of proving acknowledgment and adoption of it.

—declarations of pedigree.

16. Declarations of one since deceased that he was father of a child are admissible on the question of pedigree.

[See 1 R. C. L. 502-504; 3 R. C. L. 735.]

—absence of negative evidence of paternity.

17. Evidence of declarations of a man that he was father of a child born to another man's wife after the parties had separated is not inadmissible, because it had not been shown that the husband was not the child's father.

(Melvin, J., dissents.)

—declarations as to destination of husband.

18. Upon the question of paternity of a child born to a woman who has separated from her husband, declarations of the husband after the separation that he was going to a certain place, where his wife was not, are admissible.

Appeal — admission of inadmissible evidence — nonprejudicial error.

19. A case will not be reversed for the admission of inadmissible evidence if its bearing upon the real dispute is so slight that it is impossible that prejudice could have resulted from its admission.

[See 2 R. C. L. 250.]

APPEAL by objectors from an order of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County (Rives, J.) awarding partial distribution of the estate of John A. McNamara, decedent, to petitioner. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Daniel M. Hunsaker, Boyd C. Barrington, and Hunsaker, Britt, & Edwards, for appellants:

When it appeared by petitioner's evidence that the child was born during lawful wedlock of the Bettencortes, husband and wife, and that there was access of the husband within 10 months next previously, and no proof of his impotency, and hence that, according to the laws of nature, Antonio F. Bettencorte might have been the father of the child, the court should have received no further evidence.

Mr. Joseph L. Lewinsohn also for appellants.

Mr. John W. Carrigan for respondent.

Olney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Preliminary to the discussion of this appeal it is advisable to correct the record of this court regarding it. It was decided by us in department on December 18, 1918. A petition for rehearing in banc was duly filed, and on January 17, 1919, an order was signed by the chief justice and two associate justices directing a rehearing. This was within thirty days after the judgment in department, and therefore within the time prescribed by the Constitution within which rehearings may be granted. It appears, however, that the order was given the date of January 18, 1919, which was thirty-one days after the department decision, and not within the prescribed time. The order was also marked by the clerk as filed on January 18, 1919.

The fact that the paper on which the signed order was written was not marked by the clerk as filed until after the expiration of the period of 30 days from the time of the department decision is not material to the validity of the order. The joint action or concurrence of four associate justices or of the Chief Justice and two associate justices "is the thing required to constitute the action of the court" (Const. art. 6, § 2), and, in contemplation of law, this joint action is taken when the required number of justices "have, in writing, declared their concurrence in the order with intent to make it an order." "The filing of the order in the clerk's office within the prescribed time was not essential to its validity," if it was regularly made within that time by the necessary number of justices. People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 624, 626, 114 Pac. 48, 54; Niles v. Edwards, 95 Cal. 47, 30 Pac. 134; Von Schmidt v. Widber, 99 Cal. 515, 34 Pac. 109. It is therefore unnecessary, as matter of law, to correct the entry as to the time of filing, or to order a filing nunc pro tunc as of January 17, 1919. But as the date of the order makes it appear that it was made after the expiration of the 30 days, contrary to the fact, and might tend to cast doubt on the validity of further action by the court in the case, we deem it advisable to correct the order in that respect.

It is therefore ordered that the order heretofore made in this case vacating the judgment previously entered herein in department, and directing a hearing thereof before the court in banc, be, and the same is hereby, corrected as to its date by striking out the words "January 18th, 1919," as written therein, and inserting instead thereof the words "January 17th, 1919," the same being the true date of the making of said order.

Passing now to the consideration of the appeal itself, it appears that the decedent, John A. McNamara, died May 10, 1916, unmarried and without a valid will. In the course of the administration of his estate, one John H. McNamara, a minor, through his guardian, presented a petition for partial distribution of the estate to him, alleging that he was the illegitimate child of the decedent, and that he had been legitimated by adoption in the manner prescribed by § 230 of the Civil Code. The section mentioned provides for legitimation rather than for adoption in the ordinary sense, and, in order that the petitioner's right of heirship be established, it was necessary for him to show that he was in fact the illegitimate son of the decedent, and also that he had been adopted by the decedent in the manner specified by the Code section. The heirs of the decedent, if the child were not his heir, were two sisters, and these sisters filed objections to the child's petition, and in particular took issue with the allegations of the petition as to both of the two elements required by the Code section for legitimation; that is, as to the petitioner being in fact the offspring of the decedent, and as to his having been adopted by him. There were other issues made, but the two issues mentioned were the real issues and alone need to be considered. The cause was tried without a jury, the lower court found for the child upon both issues, and made an order of partial distribution in his favor. From this order the sisters appeal, and urge that the findings of the lower court in the child's favor is not supported by the evidence as to either issue. Certain rulings in the admission of evidence are also complained of. The chief contention is over the finding of paternity, and will be first considered.

The salient facts are that the petitioner is the child of a Mrs. Bettencorte. She was quite a young woman, and had married one Antonio F. Bettencorte in July, 1913, and lived with him, occupying the same apartment, up to and through the night of December 23d of the same year. On the morning of the following day she went with her husband to the city of San Jose, a few miles from where they resided, and there left him about noon to go immediately with McNamara, the decedent, with whom she lived practically continuously thereafter until his death. She never saw her husband again but once, and then under circumstances that preclude the possibility of intercourse between them. As throwing some light on the relations of the parties and the character of the mother, it may be mentioned that she had been engaged to McNamara, had had some quarrel with him, and had immediately married Bettencorte. She seems to have found herself very unhappy in her marriage, never to have lost her affection for McNamara, and in her unhappiness to have turned to him. She had no illicit relations with McNamara prior to her finally leaving her husband, and there is in the record no evidence, in fact no breath of suspicion, that she had illicit relations with anyone but McNamara.

On October 24, 1914, just 10 calendar months, or 304 days, after Mrs. Bettencorte left her husband, the child was born. No question seems ever to have occurred to anyone until after McNamara's death but that the child was his. Certainly no question occurred to him. No physician was present at the birth, and McNamara himself made out and signed the birth certificate, specifying himself as the father. In letters to the child's mother he addresses her as his wife, and speaks of her as such and of the child as their child. He endeavored to make a will leaving his property to "Rosalie A. Bettencorte, the mother of my son, and with whom I have been living as my lawful wife for the past year pending the securing of a divorce by her. She is to have all and everything that I die possessed of for the benefit of herself and her child." He also directs Mrs. Bettencorte, in case of his death, to communicate with his sister, one of the appellants here, saying that she will see that his wishes are carried out. The will failed because not witnessed and not entirely written in McNamara's own hand. The child and the mother lived with him, accompanied him on trips away, and he supported them both. So far as appears, the relations between the three were the usual relations of a family of father, mother, and child.

In addition to the foregoing Mrs. Bettencorte testified (and in view of the court's finding her testimony must be taken as true, if competent) that she had her regular menstrual period commencing December 20, 1913, four days before she left her husband, and ending the day she left, and that she had another regular and full period commencing January 23d or 24th following, and that she had another menstruation, apparently shorter, in February. She also testifies that she first suspected she was pregnant in March or April. It also appears that the child when born was a fully developed and normal baby. It was not weighed, but the mother testified that her mother said at the time it was born that it weighed about 11 pounds. Another witness testified that it weighed 8 or 9 pounds. If the child did in fact weigh 11 pounds at birth, it was exceptionally large, and this fact might be a slight indication of a prolonged pregnancy. But estimates as to the weight of a new-born baby are proverbially unreliable, and the most that can be said is that the child was full sized. On the other hand, there was no unusual circumstance accompanying either the pregnancy or the birth, and the fact of the mother's safe delivery without a physician may be a slight indication that the child was not of unusual size. The only medical evidence introduced was that of a physician called by the appellants, who testified that a period of gestation of 304 days or more was possible and not very unusual.

Upon the foregoing facts and evidence the point most strongly urged upon us on behalf of the appellants is that the question of the child's paternity is determined by a conclusive presumption of legitimacy. It is urged that it appearing that Mrs. Bettencorte and her husband were together on the night of December 23d, it must be presumed, as a matter of law, that intercourse took place between them at that time, and it further appearing that a child was born of Mrs. Bettencorte 304 days thereafter, and that this period is within the period of possible gestation, there is a conclusive presumption of law that the child is legitimate; that is, is the offspring of Mrs. Bettencorte's husband and not of the decedent.

That it must be assumed, as urged by appellants' counsel, that the husband and wife had intercourse on the night of December 23d, when they were together, cannot be doubted. That such is the rule in cases where the issue of legitimacy is involved is established in this state by Re Mills, 137 Cal. 298, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175, 70 Pac. 91. The question, therefore, presented by appellants' contention is this, Is there a conclusive presumption of legitimacy when it appears that the mother has had intercourse with her husband 304 days before the birth of the child, but not subsequently?

The presumption of legitimacy is discussed in Re Walker, — Cal. —, 181 Pac. 792. It is there said that if it appear that it is possible by the laws of nature for the husband to be the father of the child,—that is, if he had intercourse with his wife during the period of possible conception,—he is conclusively presumed to be the father, that the law will permit no guessing or weighing of probabilities as between the husband and some other man, when both have had intercourse with the mother during the critical time, and either may in fact be the actual progenitor. This rule in cases where only a usual and normal period of gestation is involved is thoroughly well established, and the reasons of policy upon which it is based are so strong that it is the rule of both the civil and the common law. There was, however, no attempt in the Walker Case to do more than state the rule in a general way. Nothing more was necessary, as the evidence of intercourse with the husband there relied on to prove legitimacy was of intercourse during the time when, according to the usual operation of the laws of nature, the children involved must have been conceived. The applica-

between husband and

tion of the rule to such a case is not open to doubt.

But in the present case it appears conclusively that the husband did not have intercourse with his wife for a period of 304 days preceding the birth of the child. This period, if not exceeding, at least approaches an exceeding of the usual and normal period of gestation. Two questions, therefore, present themselves, neither of which was presented in the Walker Case or there determined. The first of these is, Is the period of 304 days greater than the usual or normal—not merely the average—period of gestation,—that is, is it contrary to the usual operation of the laws of nature? This is a pure question of fact. The second question is one of law, namely, Does the conclusive presumption of legitimacy apply where the period of gestation necessary in order that the husband be the father is not an impossible one, but is yet exceptional, and not according to the usual operation of the laws of nature?

The first question, while one of fact, is one as to the operation of natural laws, and therefore as to a fact of which the court may take judicial notice, and as to which it is not confined to the evidence in the record, but may seek information elsewhere, and in particular in published technical works and articles by those recognized as authorities in this branch of human knowledge. An examination of recent medical text-books and articles leaves no doubt as to two points: First, that 304 days is a possible period of gestation; and, next, that it is quite an exceptional one. While the average period of gestation is generally taken as 280 days, there are instances vouched for by reputable authorities where the period has exceeded 330 days, and there are instances, too well authenticated apparently to admit of reasonable question, where the period has exceeded 320 days. See, for instance, the case reported by

Dr. Taussig in his monograph on Prolonged Pregnancy, appearing in XLIV. American Journal of Obstetrics, 519. In this same article also Dr. Taussig compiles (page 524) a list of well-authenticated cases which would seem to justify his conclusion that "in this total of sixty-one reliable cases of partus serotinus (delayed birth) we have a mass of evidence that should make even the most conservative acknowledge that this condition occurs in the human race, just as it has long since been proved to exist in the lower animals." See also Cragin, Practice of Obstetrics, pp. 156-164; Edgar, Practice of Obstetrics, p. 128; 2 Witthaus & B. Med. Jur. pp. 507-520; 3 Wharton & S. Med. Jur. pp. 30-39.

On the other hand, a reading of these same authorities makes it plain that any period in excess of 300 days is quite exceptional, and that with each day over 300 the exceptional character of the case is much intensified. Dr. Taussig in his article endeavors to compile all well-authenticated cases where the period exceeded 300 days, and accepts but sixty-one as falling within reasonable certainty within this class. This small number strongly evidences the exceptional character of such cases, as does also the fact that those investigating the subject concern themselves with every case where the period may be supposed to exceed 300 days. This would not be true if such cases were not looked upon as quite exceptional, and therefore worthy of note and investigation. A number of authorities (see page 514 of 2 Witthaus & Becker) fix 300 days as the extreme limit, a conclusion which apparently must be abandoned in the light of more recent information; but the fact that such an opinion could be held at all by capable modern investigators indicates that instances of more than 300 days are entirely beyond the usual order of things. That this is the common experience of mankind is also indicated by the fact that in other countries 300 days has been adopted by statutes as the limit of the presumptive period of gestation. French Civ. Code, art. 315; McNeely v. McNeely, 47 La. Ann. 1321, 17 So. 928. Dr. Edgar quotes Von Winckel (2 Witthaus & Becker, 575) as saying that "in 6.8 per cent [of cases] the duration is over 300 days." But the article in which this statement was made was published in 1890, and in 1900 or 1901 Von Winckel published the results of his examination of 30,500 cases, in which, as best we can judge from the references to the article, he found but thirty-one cases, or less than  $\frac{1}{10}$  of 1 per cent, wherein it was reasonably certain the period was 302 days or more. We can but conclude that the period involved in this case, 304 days, is quite exceptional, and not according to the usual and normal operation of the laws of nature.

This conclusion makes necessary a consideration of the second question, Is the conclusive presumption of legitimacy applicable to such a case? This is not determined by any statutory provision. Section 1962, subdivision 5, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "The issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband, who is not impotent, is indisputably presumed to be legitimate." Read literally, this section would apply only where the wife is cohabiting with her husband at the time of issue; that is, of birth. This was not the fact in the present case. But putting upon the section the meaning it undoubtedly should have, namely, that issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband at the time of conception must be indisputably presumed legitimate, it yet does not determine the present case, for it still leaves open the very question involved, of when was conception or during what period must it be presumed to have taken place?

Section 194 of the Civil Code provides: "All children of a woman who has been married, born within ten months after the dissolution of the marriage, are presumed to be legitimate children of that marriage."

—statutory presumption of legitimacy.

This presumption is but prima facie. Re Walker, 176 Cal. 402, 408, 168 Pac. 689. It is urged, however, in effect, that it is a statutory declaration of policy that 10 months is to be taken by the law as not exceeding the reasonable or normal period of gestation, so that all the incidents of birth within the normal period, such as the conclusive presumption of legitimacy, attach. There are several answers to this, but two will suffice. The presumption of the Code section is but prima facie, and the reasons of policy which would justify or induce a prima facie presumption in such a case are very different from those which would justify or properly induce a conclusive presumption. The legislature might well deem it wise to provide that a child born within 10 or 11 or even 12 months after separation of husband and wife, as was actually done in Pennsylvania, should be presumed legitimate in the absence of any other evidence, when it would be wholly unwilling to make such presumption apply contrary to all other evidence.

In the next place the 10 months mentioned by the statute must be taken to be months of 30 days. No other construction will give it a reasonable operation. It is dealing with the working of natural laws, where any proper measure of time must be an absolute and regular one, such as days or hours, not an irregular one, such as calendar months. If this be not so, the legitimacy of a child might depend on the purely fortuitous circumstance that the marriage of its mother was dissolved in one month of the year instead of another. The long months occur irregularly during the year, and more of them accumulate in one period of 10 months than in another. For example, if the child were born 306 days after the dissolution of its mother's marriage, it would be presumed legitimate if the dissolution had happened to occur on any day in April prior to the 29th, while, if the child were so unfortunate as to have had the dissolution of its mother's marriage occur in any day in February, it would not be presumed legitimate by the statute unless it were born within 303 days thereafter. Such arbitrary and unreasonable inconsistencies and distinctions affecting so vital a matter would make the law ridiculous, and are to be avoided if by reasonable construction of the statute they can be. The word "month," when spoken of as a regular and constant measure of time,—each month having the same length,—as is not infrequently done, is commonly conceived of as having 30 days. The statute is applying the measure of months to something which should be measured by a constant and regular standard, where each month must have the same length, and the reasonable construction is to put upon the word "month" as so used the meaning which it commonly has when used in that manner, that is, a month of 30 days, so that the 10 months' period specified is one of 300 days. We believe that the necessity for this meaning is so plain that it is one "apparent from the context" within the language of § 14, Civil Code. This construction we are the more willing to put upon the statute in view of the fact that in those countries where there is a presumptive period of gestation it is more usually this time.

Other than the two Code sections mentioned, there is no statutory provision which bears upon the question. Nor is much assistance to be derived from previous decisions. So far as the question has been presented to the courts at all, the trend is apparently to the view that the conclusive presumption does not apply where the period of gestation required, in order that the husband be the father, is an exceptional, although a possible, one.

The point was presented in the Gardner Peerage Case (Le Marchant's report). There the child was born 311 days after the wife left the husband to join her paramour, with whom she continued for some time. There was much testimony pro and con as to this time being a possible period of conception, and counsel for the child urged strongly that the testimony showed it was a possible period, and that, this being the fact, a conclusive presumption of legitimacy followed. The House of Lords determined that the child was illegitimate. The decision, however, cannot be given much weight here, for the reason that the evidence that 311 days was a possible period was strongly controverted, and the two lords delivering opinions put them briefly on the ground that they were convinced of the fact of illegitimacy without stating anything more. It may fairly be said that they may have believed 311 days was not a possible period, and have reached their conclusion for that reason.

In Burnaby v. Baillie, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 282, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 842, 61 L. T. N. S. 634, 38 Week. Rep. 125, the period between the separation of husband and wife and the birth of the child was 279 days. The child was found to be illegitimate. There was a good deal of testimony as to the ordinary period of gestation, and Judge North, who decided the case, in his opinion says that, "having regard to the normal or usual period of gestation," he is unable to come to a positive conclusion, and finally puts his decision on the ground that he was satisfied the parties had not had intercourse for some time before their separation. The inference from the decision, but it is only an inference, is that the conclusive presumption was applicable in the court's mind only in the case of intercourse by the husband within the usual period of gestation.

79, comes nearest to being directly in point. The facts are practically identical with those of the case at bar, except that the period intervening between separation of husband and wife and the birth of the child was but 277 days. The medical testimony introduced was to the effect that the normal time of gestation was from 270 to 275 days, and that a longer time, although not unknown or even uncommon, was exceptional. The case was left to the jury, which found the child illegitimate. On review the very argument here urged upon us was urged upon the court. It was contended that, it appearing that the husband and wife had occupied the same apartments up to 277 days before the birth, it must be presumed that intercourse was had between them as late as 277 days before birth, and that, such time being within the period required for gestation, a conclusive presumption of legitimacy followed. This contention was overruled and the verdict of the jury upheld. The case may, therefore, be fairly considered as directly holding in opposition to the contention of appellants here. It is not entitled to particular weight, however, because of the unsatisfactory reason given, which is that one presumption cannot be built upon another, a proposition which we do not believe applicable to such a case.

People v. Case, 171 Mich. 282, 137 N. W. 55, may perhaps be considered as tending the other way. It was there held in a bastardy proceeding that a child born only 253 days (8 months and 13 days) after the husband's liberation from jail and a renewal of relations with his wife must be conclusively presumed legitimate. The decision was based on evidence that the maximum period of gestation was 300 days and the minimum 240. The point under discussion here, however, was not considered or apparently suggested.

So far as we are aware, the foregoing are all the authorities which can be said to have any real bearing on the question. We are therefore compelled to treat it as one of first impression. So approaching it, it is apparent at the outset that the conclusive presumption of legitimacy must either be extended to apply to every case where the period of gestation necessary in order that the husband be the father is a possible one, no matter how exceptional or extraordinary such period may be, or else it must be limited in its application to those cases where the period necessary to make the husband the father is within normal or usual limits. There is no middle ground. It is apparent also, from what has already been said, that the facts with which the law has to deal in this regard are that while the average period of gestation is 280 days there are exceptional and rare instances where it exceeds 320 days, and it is probable that there are instances where it exceeds 330 days. The situation therefore is either that a child born 320 days after separation of husband and wife, and probably a child born 330 days or more after, must be conclusively presumed to be legitimate, regardless of what the evidence may show as to the mother having intercourse with another man than her husband during the normal period of conception and the entire absence of any symptoms of prolonged pregnancy, or else the conclusive presumption must be limited to cases where the husband has had intercourse with the wife during the normal period of conception. The mere statement of this proposition involves its answer. The conclusive presumption cannot be applied to such extreme and exceptional cases. To do so would be wholly unreasonable, and would be contrary to the legal presumption which exists in this state, that "things have happened according to the ordinary course of nature." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 28.

Nor is there any reason of public policy which requires such extending of the conclusive presumption. The prima facie presumption of legitimacy, which requires clear and satisfactory proof for its overcoming, is founded on the policy of protecting the integrity of the family, of preventing the bastardizing of issue born in wedlock except upon clear and certain evidence. The reason for going beyond this prima facie presumption, and applying a conclusive presumption wherever the husband has had intercourse with the wife during the time when the child must normally have been conceived, although others as well may have had intercourse with her during the same period, is the impossibility of determining under such circumstances who is the father. As was said in Com. v. M'Carty, 2 Clark (Pa.) 356, the process of conception is a hidden one, and the organs perform their appropriate functions without the volition of the female and without her being conscious that the process is going on. Where she has had intercourse with more than one man at about the same time, and a child has resulted, neither she nor anyone else can say with reasonable certainty which is the father. Any weighing of probabilities under such circumstances is but guessing, and, where the husband is one of the possible fathers, he must bear the burden of his relation to the woman and be taken to be the father of her child.

There is one class of cases where it is recognized, in this country at least, that the husband is not to be taken as the father of the child, even though he had intercourse with his wife during the normal period of conception. That instance is where the husband and wife are of the same race, as for instance white, and it appears that the wife has had intercourse with a man of another race, as for instance a negro, and the child is of mixed blood. Watkins v. Carlton, 10 Leigh, 560; Bullock v. Knox, 96 Ala. 198, 11 So. 339; Wright v. Hicks, 12 Ga. 161, 56 Am. Dec. 451; Cross v. Cross, 3 Paige, 139, 23 Am. Dec.

778. The reason why the conclusive presumption is not applied in such instances is that the element of indeterminability which is the reason for the presumption in the ordinary case is absent. It is clear that the husband is not the father. The actual fact, in other words, is capable of definite determination, and for this reason the conclusive presumption which is a substitute for such determination is not properly applicable.

The same element of indeterminability is lacking in the class of cases under consideration where, in order that the husband be the father, the period of gestation, while a possible one, is exceptional and contrary to the usual course of nature. The actual fact as to paternity can be determined with reasonable certainty, if the probative facts capable of being known are made to appear. The courts must reason in accordance with the usual operation of the law of nature, and where it appears that the child was born at such a time that the husband might possibly be the father, but only in case of a very exceptional departure from the usual operation of the laws of nature, and it also appears that the wife has had intercourse with another at the time when, by the usual operation of these laws, he would be the father, the conclusion that the latter is the father is, in the absence of any symptoms or circumstances indicating an exceptional period of pregnancy, well-nigh irresistible. Nor is there any reason why this conclusion should not be followed in this class of cases as in other cases where the fact that the husband is not the father is capable of being shown clearly and satisfactorily and is so shown. The courts are reluctant to reach the conclusion of illegitimacy in any case, but, reaching it, there is no hesitation, and should be none, in giving it effect. Our conclusion in the present case is that the issue of paternity is not determined by any conclusive presumption of legitimacy.

It does not follow that the prima facie presumption of legitimacy is not applicable. That presumption applies in every case of a child born in wedlock and can be overcome only by clear and satisfactory evidence. Re Walker, 176 Cal. 402, 408, 168 Pac. 689. It remains to consider whether the evidence in the present case is of that character.

The circumstances in evidence leave no room for reasonable doubt. In addition to the fact that the child was born at a time much exceeding the normal period, if the husband were the father, we have the further circumstances that during all the time when normally it would have been conceived the mother was cohabiting with McNamara; that in January, nearly a month after leaving her husband and after conception must have taken place if he were the father, she had a full menstrual period,—something which may occur after conception, but ordinarily does not; that computing from the commencement of this menstrual period as that preceding conception, as is usually done, the period of gestation was 274 days, or only 6 days removed from the average period of 280 days, and wholly within the limits of normal variation; and, finally, that everyone concerned—McNamara, the girl, the girl's family, and so far as appears Bettencorte himself—believed without question that the child was McNamara's.

—sufficiency.

The combined force of these circumstances is sufficient certainty to justify the finding of fact of the lower court as to paternity.

The evidence is likewise fully sufficient to sustain the finding on the issue as to adoption. The requirements of the Code (Civ. Code, § 230) for legitimation by adoption are two: First, that the father must publicly acknowledge the child as his; and, next, that he must treat it as if it were legitimate, and in particular must receive it into his own family as his child. The evidence is ample on both points. A more public acknowledgment than the act of McNamara in signing the child's birth certificate, describing himself as the father, it would be difficult to imagine. In addition the child was with him and its mother most of the time after its birth, and the evidence shows that the relation openly assumed by him was that of father. His statements and his actions were both a public acknowledgment of the child as his, and a consistent treatment of it as if it were legitimate. It was also received into his family within the meaning of the Code. It has already been decided by this court that the word "family," as used by the Code in this connection, does not necessarily mean relations, but may mean the family in which or as part of which the father abides. Re Gird, 157 Cal. 542, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, 108 Pac. 499; Re Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 135 Pac. 288. In this sense the only family McNamara had after the birth of the child was the child and its mother, with whom he abided, with occasional absences, until his death, with full assumption of the relation of father, mother, and child. It is worthy of note in this connection that while McNamara was so living with Mrs. Bettencorte and her child, his sister, one of the appellants, visited and stayed with them for some days. The relation between McNamara and Mrs. Bettencorte was, to be sure, unlawful, but this does not negative the plain fact that the family relation existed. It is attempted to distinguish this case from Re Jones, supra, where the facts establishing an adoption were much weaker, on the ground that McNamara had no fixed habitation. The parties did change their abode several times, but it was a change of abode. They were not mere wanderers or travelers.

—establishment.

Where they were, they made their home. When they finally moved to the place where McNamara died, they did not rent the place, but actually arranged to purchase it.

The alleged errors in the admission of evidence are three: First, the admission of testimony by Mrs. Bettencorte that she left her husband on December 24, 1913, and, except on one occasion immaterial here, did not see him again, in other words, testimony by a wife tending to show nonaccess by her husband; second, the admission of evidence of declarations by McNamara that he was the father of the child; and, third, the admission of testimony as to a declaration of Bettencorte at the time (December 26, 1913) he left the residence of Mrs. Bettencorte's parents, where he and she had been residing, that he was going to Redding, in the northern part of the state.

The admission over objection of testimony by Mrs. Bettencorte, tending to show nonaccess by her husband, presents a question on which the courts are in hopeless confusion. So far as rulings in this state are concerned, it was held in Re Mills, 137 Cal. 298, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175, 70 Pac. 91, that testimony by a wife that she did not have intercourse with her husband at a time when she was cohabiting with him was not competent on an issue as to the legitimacy of her child. This ruling is a necessary result of our Code provision that the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband is indisputably presumed legitimate. It not being permitted to dispute the presumption of legitimacy under such circumstances, evidence disputing it is, of course, incompetent. Further than this our decisions have not gone. Mrs. Bettencorte's testimony does not come within the rule of Re Mills, supra, for she did not testify, nor was it claimed, that she did not have intercourse with Bettencorte as long as they cohabited. Her testimony was as to a separation between them and that she did not meet him afterwards.

A reading of our Code sections would seem to settle the question. Section 1870, Code of Civil Procedure, reads: "In conformity with the preceding provisions, evidence may be given upon a trial of the following facts: 1. The precise fact in dispute; . . . 15. Any other facts from which the facts in issue are presumed or logically inferable."

Section 1879, Code of Civil Procedure, reads (the italics are ours): "All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses."

The next two sections (§§ 1880 and 1881, Code of Civil Procedure) purport to set forth the instances in which a person having direct knowledge of the facts is yet not competent as a witness. Testimony by a wife showing, or tending to show, nonaccess by her husband, is not mentioned in either section. More explicit language could not well be devised, and these sections are in our judgment controlling. It is true that they were considered in Re Mills, and it was there said, in effect, that they do not abrogate the rule of the common law on this particular point. But this statement was not necessary for the decision, which could have been rested solely on the ground that the evidence there presented was inadmissible, because material only to dispute an indisputable presumption. Even if the Code sections were not controlling, from which conclusion we see no escape, the fact that any such rule of incompetency as is contended for by appellants actually exists at the common law has been seriously questioned, and the reasons of policy advanced to justify it severely criticized. See 3 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 2063 and 2064.

Our conclusion on this branch of the case is that the rule of Re Mills, supra, should not be extended further than it was actually there set down and applied,—that is, to evidence by either wife or husband of nonintercourse between them at a time when they were cohabiting together,—the evidence being offered on an issue as to the legitimacy of a child born to the wife; and that the rejection of the evidence in that instance is justified, not so much because it is incompetent, as because it is immaterial, being offered to dispute an indisputable presumption. Within this rule the testimony of Mrs. Bettencorte does not come.

The next objection is to the evidence of declarations by McNamara that he was the father of respondent. The objection made is not so much that such evidence was wholly incompetent as that it was incompetent until it had been shown the husband, Bettencorte, was not the father. As to its

competency generally there can be no doubt. It was clearly competent for the purpose of proving the acknowledgment of paternity by McNamara and his adoption of the child in the manner required by the Code for legitimation. Being competent and material upon that issue it was, of course, admissible. Furthermore, McNamara being deceased, his declarations as to the relationship of the child to him were also admissible under the familiar pedigree rule. On this latter point § 1870, subdivision 4, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that evidence may be given of "the act or declaration, verbal or written, of a deceased person in respect to the relationship, birth, marriage, or death of any person related by blood or marriage to such deceased person." See also § 1852, Code Civ. Proc.; Re Heaton, 135 Cal. 385, 67 Pac. 321.

—declarations

As to the point that the evidence was incompetent until it had been shown that Bettencorte was not the child's father, this, in the first place, was a matter of the order of proof, and almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court. In the next place, such evidence is not incompetent on the issue of paternity, which is the point really made on behalf of the appellant. Hargrave v. Hargrave, 9 Beav. 552, 50 Eng. Reprint, 457, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 280; Morris v. Davies, 5 Clark & F. 163, 7 Eng. Reprint, 365; The Aylesford Peerage, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 1, 11 Eng. Bul. Cas. 523. The real point of the authorities cited by appellants' counsel in this connection is either that declarations by the putative father are not alone sufficient to overcome the presumption of legitimacy, or else that, where nonintercourse between husband and wife is not shown, such declarations are wholly immaterial. Both of these propositions are true, but neither has application here.

The final objection of appellants is to the admission of declarations by the husband, Bettencorte, immediately after his wife left him, that he was going to Redding. These declarations were made at the time he left the residence of his wife's parents, where he had been residing, and in connection with his actual departure. The fact that he went to Redding, where his wife was not, was material on the question of their separation. The fact that he departed, and that he intended to go to Redding, is some evidence that he did go, and it is well established that declarations of intention are admissible under such circumstances. For a quite notable case where, on this particular point, the facts are almost identical with those presented here, see Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 36 L. ed. 706, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 909.

Melvin, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The policy of the law has always been to favor legitimacy, and to prevent, except upon the most convincing proof, the bastardization of a child born to a married woman. I believe the opinion of Mr. Justice Olney, in which all of my other associates concur, forsakes this oft-declared policy, and is, moreover, against the letter of our statute. I believe this decision, as a result of which a woman is permitted successfully to attach the stigma of illegitimacy to her little boy, will stimulate many similar efforts on the part of others who desire to spend the money left by deceased bachelors.

The presumption arising because of the ancient policy of the law, to which I have referred above, is well set forth in an opinion written by the learned author of the prevailing opinion in this case. I refer to Re Walker, — Cal. —, 181 Pac. 792, at page 794. In the opinion in that case I find the following language: "There is no doubt but that the presumption of legitimacy goes at least to this extent: That if it appear that by the laws of nature it is possible that the husband is the father (that is, if it appears that the husband had intercourse with the mother during the period of possible conception), legitimacy is conclusively presumed, and no guessing or weighing of probabilities as to paternity because of relations between the mother and other men will be permitted."

In the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Victor E. Shaw upon the former appeal in that case (Re Walker, 176 Cal. 402, 168 Pac. 689) he quoted approvingly the following language from Powell v. State, 84 Ohio St. 165, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255, 95 N. E. 660: "Public policy requires that the status of a child born or begotten in lawful wedlock should be fixed and certain, and the immediate exigencies, or even the apparent justice, of any particular case, will not justify a departure from the rule so necessary and salutary to the best interests of society. The law is not willing that a child shall be declared a bastard to suit the whim or purpose of either parent, nor upon evidence merely that no actual act of intercourse occurred between husband and wife at or about the time the wife became pregnant."

Continuing, Mr. Justice Victor Shaw used the following language: "Before such a child can be adjudged a bastard, the proof must be clear, certain, and conclusive, either that the husband had no powers of procreation, or the circumstances were such as to render it impossible that he could be the father of the child."

The court cited the following authorities: Dennison v. Page, 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644; Kraus v. Kraus, 98 Mo. App. 427, 72 S. W. 180; Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 4 L.R.A. 434, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159, 21 N. E. 430; Egbert v. Greenwalt, 44 Mich. 245, 38 Am. Rep. 260, 6 N. W. 654; Ewell v. Ewell, 163 N. C. 236, 79 S. E. 509, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 373. (It is to be noted that, through a printer's error, the last quoted sentence, as appears on page 410 of 176 Cal., is erroneously credited to the opinion in Powell v. State, supra.) It is true that the old English rule, known as the "quatuor maria rule," which conclusively assigned legitimacy to a child born to a married woman while the husband was within the four seas, except upon proof of his impotence, has been modified by modern decision. Generally, courts have adopted the rule laid down by Lord Langsdale to the effect that "the presumption may be wholly removed by proper and sufficient evidence showing that the husband was impotent; entirely absent, so as to have no intercourse or communication of any kind with the mother; entirely absent at the period during which the child must, in the course of nature, have been begotten; or present only under such circumstances as afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse." 3 R. C. L. 727. This rule, however, is still based upon the presumption arising from the policy of the law in favor of legitimacy. That policy was in existence when subdivision 5 of § 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, was adopted. That subdivision declares that "the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband, who is not impotent, is indisputably presumed to be legitimate." Read in view of the policy of the law in favor of legitimacy, it seems to me that this subdivision means that the issue of a wife born within the possible period of gestation, after proved access of her husband, he being not impotent, is indisputably presumed to be legitimate. Mr. Justice Olney, in the prevailing opinion, concedes that the subdivision applies to the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband at the time of conception. Let us suppose that in the present case the period of separation of the spouses instead of 10 months had been 9. It seems to me that under the logic of the opinion the child would be conclusively presumed legitimate, for the case would then be like that of a husband living with his wife during all of the usual period of gestation. In such a state of facts I take it the paternity might not be impeached by a showing that the infant was small and probably a child born 8 months after conception. What reason is there for preventing inquiry in possible cases of subnormal pregnancy and permitting it in instances of that which may be abnormal? I can see none.

Undoubtedly, in the operation of subdivision 5 of § 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, some children who are actually bastards will be held legitimate without power on the part of anyone to attack their standing in that regard. But that is in accord with the policy of the law, which looks not to the possible foisting of a child upon a husband who might not have been the father, but seeks to prevent all possibility of a legitimate child having the stain and sorrow of illegitimate birth unjustly attributed to it as a sinister inheritance.

Does the unquestionable presumption of legitimacy cease with the period of 280 days after the last cohabitation of man and wife, that being, as we are informed, the average period of gestation? If not, when does the whole matter become open to the court's inquiry? Is it open to full inquiry on the 281st day or any day thereafter on which a child shall be born to the woman? Would this court sustain a finding that the child in this case was illegitimate if, instead of a little more than 3 weeks, the birth had passed the average period by only a day? If not, when would the passage of time become sufficient to justify such a finding? Would it be 1 minute after 300 days, since we are told that instances of pregnancy of more than 300 days are "entirely beyond the usual order of things?" Is the period covered by the indisputable presumption subject to the guessing of each judge of the superior court who may have a problem of this sort, he to be governed, not by the testimony of experts, but by such knowledge of the laws of nature as he may be able to acquire from medical works to which he may have access? These are questions no one of which is answered by the prevailing opinion.

Suppose, for illustration, a case exactly like this, except that instead of being true to one lover, after deserting her husband, the woman had possessed half a dozen to whom she had yielded herself very soon after the desertion.

According to the logic of the opinion, it would then be the duty of the court to guess whether the husband, the deceased lover, whose estate was sought, or some one of the living but possibly impecunious Don Juans, was the father, or as some one jestingly said at the oral argument, whether or not the baby was "of the progeny of a syndicate." It seems to me that many evils must flow from the announced rule of this court, and that the wisdom of extending the presumption of the statute to the utmost possible period of gestation is enforced by the illustration.

If the matter of legitimacy or bastardy is one purely of fact, to be drawn from the evidence adduced as in any other case, then the presumption of intercourse from possible access should be abolished; but this court upholds the doctrine of Re Mills, 137 Cal. 298, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175, 70 Pac. 91, and by it supports the conclusion that the husband and wife had sexual relations on the last night on which they were together, which is founded, as was declared in the opinion in that case, upon "good morals and public policy." To allow cohabiting married people thus to impeach the legitimacy of children born in wedlock would be, as well stated in the opinion in Re Mills, "to allow evidence which shocks every sense of decency and propriety." Yet in the case at bar evidence quite as shocking was permitted, namely, the statement of

Mrs. Bettencorte, regarding her alleged menstrual periods. This is the sort of testimony which may be manufactured without fear of contradiction. Its admission puts a premium upon perjury. In the case at bar it is evident that one of the controlling elements of the finding of the probate court was the testimony of the woman regarding her menstrual periods. Such testimony should have been excluded under what I believe to be the true interpretation of subdivision 5 of § 1962, Code of Civil Procedure.

All of these considerations make me adhere to the doctrine now repudiated by this court, but expressed so clearly and forcibly by Mr. Justice Olney in the opinion in the Walker Case that I venture to quote it here a second time (following the pious example of clergymen who sometimes emphasize a text by repetition): "There is no doubt but that the presumption of legitimacy goes at least to this extent: That if it appear that by the laws of nature it is possible that the husband is the father (that is, if it appears that the husband had intercourse with the mother during the period of possible conception), legitimacy is conclusively presumed, and no guessing or weighing of probabilities as to paternity because of relations between the mother and other men will be permitted." #### I. Introductory.

The courts uniformly concede that a child born during wedlock is presumed to be the child of the mother's then husband. The difficulty has been in determining how far this presumption is conclusive; i. e., to what extent is it a positive rule of substantive law defining the legal quality of legitimacy. Here there have been stages of doctrine. The early rule is stated in 3 R.C.L. 726, as follows: "It was a maxim of the Roman law, and one which the common law copied, that the presumption is that he is the father whom the marriage indicates, and Montesquieu, alluding to it, observed that 'the wickedness of mankind makes it necessary for the laws to suppose them better than they really are. Thus we judge that every child conceived in wedlock is legitimate, the law having confidence in the mother as if she were chastity itself.' D'Aguesseau laid it down that 'whilst the birth of children can be ascribed to a legitimate source, the law will not suppose criminality.' The early common-law rule in England was that if a wife had issue while her husband was within the four seas, that is, within the jurisdiction of the King of England, such issue was conclusively presumed to be legitimate, except upon proof of the husband's impotence; and even if he was beyond the four seas he must have been away for so long a period before the birth of the child as to make it a natural impossibility that he could be the father. To such an absurd length was the principle carried that it was solemnly decided by a court of the highest jurisdiction that a child born in England was legitimate, although it appeared on the fullest evidence that the husband resided in Ireland during the whole time of the wife's pregnancy, and for a long while previously, because Ireland was within the King's dominion. In another instance, where the husband resided in Cadiz, the child was held to be a bastard; not because Cadiz was at a greater distance, but because it was beyond the four seas."

In the time of Edward II. the Countess of Gloucester bore a child one year and seven months after the death of the duke, and it was pronounced legitimate. In the reign of Henry VI. Mr. Baron Rolfe expressed the opinion, with apparent gravity, that a widow might give birth to a child seven years after her husband's death without injury to her reputation. See Dickinson's Appeal (1875) 42 Conn. 491, 19 Am. Rep. 553.

But after a gradual relaxation during five centuries the conclusiveness of the presumption has been gradually removed, so that, with a few exceptions, which are set out in the note, it now appears that it may be explained away or rebutted by evidence to the contrary, but is conclusive in the absence of such evidence. It is the design of this note, therefore, to include those cases wherein it appeared that the husband did not have access to the wife, either during the entire gestation period, or at the time the child must have been begotten. Cases where the husband and wife were present under circumstances when access was impossible are included. Access is taken to mean sexual intercourse. The note does not include cases of antenuptial conception, nor does it include the question of the competency of the witnesses nor the admissibility of the evidence to show legitimacy. On whom rests the burden of proof and who may dispute the presumption, except under the rule in Louisiana, are also excluded.

II. Where there is no opportunity for intercourse.

The presumption that a child born in wedlock is legitimate is rebutted by satisfactory proof that the husband was absent during the entire period in which the child must have been begotten. Re Gird (1910) 157 Cal. 534, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, 108 Pac. 499; Bruce v. Patterson (1897) 102 Iowa, 184, 71 N. W. 182; Cross v. Cross (1832) 3 Paige (N. Y.) 139, 23 Am. Dec. 778; Com. v. Shepherd (1814) 6 Binn. (Pa.) 283, 6 Am. Dec. 449; Pittsford v. Chittenden (1885) 58 Vt. 49, 3 Atl. 323; Re St. George's Parish (1705) 1 Salk. 123, 91 Eng. Reprint, 115; Pendrell v. Pendrell (1732) 2 Strange, 925, 93 Eng. Reprint, 945; Rex v. Bedall (1737) 2 Strange, 1076, 93 Eng. Reprint, 1042; Head v. Head (1823) 1 Sim. & Stu. 150, 57 Eng. Reprint, 61, Turn. & R. 188, 37 Eng. Reprint, 1049, 1 L. J. Ch. 105; Rex v. Maidstone (1810) 12 East, 550, 104 Eng. Reprint, 215; Hargrave v. Hargrave (1846) 9 Beav. 552, 50 Eng. Reprint, 457; Re Saye (1848) 1 H. L. Cas. 507, 9 Eng. Reprint, 857; Gurney v. Gurney (1863) 1 Hem. & M. (Eng.) 413, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 456, 9 Jur. N. S. 514, 8 L. T. N. S. 380, 11 Week.

Rep. 659; Burnaby v. Baillie (1889) L. R. 42 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 282, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 842, 61 L. T. N. S. 634, 38 Week. Rep. 125.

Since the relaxation of the early rule of quatuor maria, there seems never to have been any doubt but that proof of the impossibility of access by the husband during the normal period of gestation satisfactorily rebutted the presumption of legitimacy.

Thus, in the early case of Re St. George's Parish (1705) 1 Salk. 123, 91 Eng. Reprint, 115, it was held that where a separation has taken place between husband and wife, the children shall be taken to be legitimate, and so deemed until the contrary be proved, for access shall be intended; but if the special verdict finds that the husband had no access, that the children shall then be deemed illegitimate.

And in Pendrell v. Pendrell (1732) 2 Strange, 925, 98 Eng. Reprint, 945, wherein it appeared that after a separation of three years, the wife gave birth to a child, the court, on strong evidence of nonaccess by the husband, overruled the presumption of legitimacy, and the jury found the plaintiff illegitimate.

A child born of a married woman is in the first instance presumed to be legitimate. The presumption thus established is not to be rebutted by circumstances which only create doubt and suspicion, but it may be wholly removed by proper and sufficient evidence showing that the husband was absent at the time when it must, normally, have been begotten, so as to have no intercourse or communication of any kind with the mother. Hargrave v. Hargrave (1846) 9 Beav. 552, 50 Eng. Reprint, 457.

And see the dictum in Wright v. Hicks (1852) 12 Ga. 155, 58 Am. Dec. 451, wherein the court said: "Where the husband and wife reside at a distance from each other, so as to exclude the possibility of sexual intercourse, there it is admitted that the presumption of legitimacy is at once rebutted."

In the case of Re Gird (1910) 157 Cal. 534, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, 108 Pac. 499, it appeared that the wife separated from the husband in 1881, and only saw him once afterwards, and that time at a distance. Four years later she gave birth to a child. In 1895 the wife gave birth to a second child. On these facts the court said: "The evidence very clearly establishes that Mrs. Bennett's husband was not the father of Nellie. It must also be taken as establishing that he was not the father of Stephen. The only evidence as to the year of the marriage was to the effect that it occurred in the year of 1880, and there was no evidence to contradict that given to the effect, that Bennett and Alice separated not later than the year 1881, and never thereafter cohabited or even saw one another until long after the birth of Nellie, except on one occasion when Alice saw him at a distance, saving and excepting evidence to the effect that Alice had on several occasions admitted to others that Stephen was Bennett's child. The evidence was clearly of such a nature that we cannot say that the jury and court were not warranted in concluding that Stephen was not Bennett's child."

So, where it was satisfactorily proved that the husband had been absent from the wife during a period of two years prior to the birth of the child, the court held that the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted. Bruce v. Patterson (1897) 102 Iowa, 184, 71 N. W. 182.

In Cross v. Cross (1832) 8 Paige (N. Y.) 139, 23 Am. Dec. 778, it appeared that husband and wife had been separated for several years prior to the birth of a child. It further appeared from the testimony of the complainant's mother, who lived in the house with him during all that time, that the defendant never called at the house more than two or three times after the separation, and then only for a few minutes in the daytime, when the witness was present; that for eighteen months prior to the birth of the child, the defendant had lived in another town, and had not even been to the complainant's house during that time; and that the husband had entirely broken off all intercourse with the wife from the time of their first separation. On this testimony the court held that the presumption of legitimacy was satisfactorily rebutted.

In Com. v. Shepherd (1814) 6 Binn. (Pa.) 283, 6 Am. Dec. 449, the alleged father of the child was under an indictment for fornication with a married woman. It appeared that the husband had left his wife, and resided in another city for several years prior to the birth of the child. The court held that, since no evidence had been adduced to disprove the presumption of nonaccess resulting from the husband's absence, the presumption of the legitimacy of the child was effectually rebutted.

So, in Pittsford v. Chittenden (1886) 58 Vt. 49, 3 Atl. 323, wherein it appeared that the husband left the wife three years prior to the birth of the child, and had never returned, it was held that the presumption of legitimacy was effectually overcome.

Similarly, in Re Saye (1848) 1 H. L. Cas. 507, 9 Eng. Reprint, 857, the court held that the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted where it appeared that a child was born three years after the separation of the husband and wife, and it was proved that there had been no opportunity of access.

And where it appeared that the husband was absent for seven years prior to the birth of the child, it was held that the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted by the proof of nonaccess. Rex v. Bedall (1787) 2 Strange, 1076, 93 Eng. Reprint, 1042.

Similarly, where it appeared that the wife separated from the husband in December, 1859, and did not live with him afterwards, and in May, 1861, the wife gave birth to a child, it was held that the presumption of legitimacy was effectually rebutted. Gurney v. Gurney (1863) 1 Hem. & M. (Eng.) 418, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 456, 9 Jur. N. S. 514, 8 L. T. N. S. 380, 11 Week. Rep. 659.

In Rex v. Maidstone (1810) 12 East, 550, 104 Eng. Reprint, 215, it appeared that the husband was away with his regiment during a period of two years prior to the birth of the child. The court held that the conclusion was irresistible that the child was a bastard.

Failure to admit testimony to prove nonaccess on the part of the husband is reversible error. Thus, in Mebane v. Capehart (1900) 127 N. C. 44, 37 S. E. 84, it appeared that the lower court excluded evidence tending to prove that the husband did not have access to his wife for twelve months prior to the birth of the child, where the paternity was in dispute. On appeal the court held that the failure to admit the testimony was reversible error.

But access must be affirmatively denied. Thus, in Herring v. Goodson (1871) 43 Miss. 392, it appeared that the defendant charged that the child was a bastard because the father did not have access to the mother during the period of thirteen months immediately prior to the birth of the child. The paternity of the plaintiff was not affirmatively denied. On a question whether or not the paternity of the plaintiff was in issue by the pleadings, the court held that, since the defendant did not deny the paternity of the plaintiff, except by the affirmative allegation of nonaccess to the mother, that therefore the issue was not in the pleadings, to the extent claimed, and that the onus of the proof was on the defendant.

Likewise, where it appears that the husband was entirely absent at the period during which the child must, in the course of nature, have been begotten, the presumption of legitimacy is overcome. Dean v. State (1868) 29 Ind. 483; Rex v. Luffe (1807) 8 East, 193, 103 Eng. Reprint, 316.

Thus, in Dean v. State (Ind.) supra, wherein it appeared that the husband was absent from his wife from January until June, and a child was born on the 6th day of November of the same year, the court held that the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted.

And where it appeared that the husband had access to the wife only a fortnight prior to the birth of the child, it was held in the case of Rex v. Luffe (Eng.) supra, that the presumption of legitimacy was effectually overcome.

So, where the husband after a long absence did not join his wife until November, and she gave birth to a full-grown child the following May, the court held that the presumption of legitimacy was rebutted. Heathcote's Divorce Bill (1851) 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. (Scot.) 277.

III. Where there is opportunity for intercourse.

a. View that intercourse may be disproved.

The weight of authority is to the effect that intercourse need not be shown to have been impossible, and where an opportunity for sexual intercourse is shown, the presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted by proving that intercourse did not, in fact, take place. Goss v. Froman (1889) 89 Ky. 318, 8 L.R.A. 102, 12 S. W. 387; People v. Case (1912) 191 Mich. 282, 137 N. W. 55; Rhyne v. Hoffman (1862) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 335; Kleinert v. Ehlers (1861) 38 Pa. 439; Goodright ex dem. Tompson v. Saul (1791) 4 T. R. 356, 100 Eng. Reprint, 1062; Banbury Peerage Case (1811) 1 Sim. & Stu. 153, 57 Eng. Reprint, 62; Cope v. Cope (1838) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 604; 1 Moody & R. 269; Morris v. Davies (1837) 5 Clark & F. 215, 7 Eng. Reprint, 385, 1 Jur. 911; Reg. v. Mansfield (1841) 1 Q. B. 444, 113 Eng. Reprint, 1203, 1 Gale & D. 7, 10 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 97, 5 Jur. 505; Plowes v. Bossey (1862) 2 Drew. & S. 145, 62 Eng. Reprint, 576, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 681, 8 Jur. N. S. 352, 7 L. T. N. S. 306, 10 Week. Rep. 332; Atchley v. Sprigg (1863) 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 345, 10 Jur. N. S. 144, 10 L. T. N. S. 16, 12 Week. Rep. 364; Bosville v. Atty. Gen. (1837) L. R. 12 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 177, 56 L. J. Prob. N. S. 97, 57 L. T. N. S. 88, 36 Week. Rep. 79. And see the reported case (RE McNAMARA, ante, 313).

In England the case of Goodright ex dem. Tompson v. Saul (1791) 4 T. R. 356, 100 Eng. Reprint, 1062, was the first to hold that impossibility of access by the husband was not necessary to prove nonaccess by the husband.

The Banbury Peerage Case (1811) 1 Sim. & Stu. 153, 57 Eng. Reprint, 63, contains apparently the first statement of the sufficiency of the evidence necessary to overcome the presumption of legitimacy. In that case the court said "that the presumption of legitimacy of a child born in lawful wedlock, the husband not being separated from his wife by a sentence of divorce, can only be legally resisted by evidence of such facts or circumstances as are sufficient to prove, to the satisfaction of those who are to decide the question, that no sexual intercourse did take place between the husband and wife at any time when, by such intercourse, the husband could, by the laws of nature, be the father of such child. Where the legitimacy of a child, in such a case, is disputed, on the ground that the husband was not the father of such child, the question to be left to the jury is whether the husband was the father of such child, and the evidence to prove that he was not the father must be of such facts and circumstances as are sufficient to prove, to the satisfaction of a jury, that no sexual intercourse took place between the husband and wife at any time when, by such intercourse, the husband could, by the laws of nature, be the father of such child."

In Head v. Head (1823) 1 Sim. & Stu. 150, 57 Eng. Reprint, 61, the court said: "The ancient policy of the law of England remains unaltered. A child born of a married woman is to be presumed to be the child of the husband, unless there is evidence which excludes all doubt that the husband could not be the father. But in modern times the rule of evidence has varied. Formerly, it was considered that all doubt could not be excluded, unless the husband were extra quatuor maria. But, as it is obvious that all doubt may be excluded from other circumstances, although the husband be within the four seas, the modern practice permits the introduction of every species of legal evidence tending to the same conclusion. But still the evidence must be of a character to exclude all doubt; and when the judges, in the Banbury Peerage Case, spoke of satisfactory evidence upon this subject, they must be understood to have meant such evidence as would be satisfactory; having regard to the special nature of the subject. It is to be deduced, as a corollary from the opinions of the learned judges in that case, that whenever a husband and wife are proved to have been together, at a time when, in the order of nature, the husband might have been the father of an after-born child, if sexual intercourse did then take place between them, such sexual intercourse was, prima facie, to be presumed; and that it was incumbent upon those who disputed the legitimacy of the after-born child, to disprove the fact of sexual intercourse having taken place, by evidence of circumstances which afford irresistible presumption that it could not have taken place; and not by mere evidence of circumstances which might afford a balance of probabilities against the fact that sexual intercourse did take place. In the present case, the husband and wife are proved to have been together at a time when, if sexual intercourse did take place between them, the husband might, in the order of nature, have been the father of the plaintiff; and the circumstances given in evidence on the part of the defendant not only do not afford irresistible presumption that sexual intercourse did not actually take place, but leave the balance of probabilities in favor of the fact that sexual intercourse did take place between them."

In Cope v. Cope (1833) 1 Moody & R. (Eng.) 269, 5 Car. & P. 604, it was held that if there has been an opportunity of access, the circumstances of the case may still be relied on to show that no intercourse took place.

In Morris v. Davies (1837) 3 Clark & F. 215, 7 Eng. Reprint, 385, it appeared that the husband and wife separated under an agreement, but continued to live within such distance as afforded them opportunities for sexual intercourse. It did not appear that they were hostile towards each other. It was shown that the wife was suspected of familiarity with one Austin, who remained in her employ after the separation. It further appeared that the husband and wife later visited a Mrs. Lloyd, who testified that "they passed the evening and the night at her house, and she supposes they slept together." But servants of Mrs. Lloyd testified that the husband and wife occupied separate bedrooms during that visit. A short while after their separation the wife appears to have gone to the house of her husband and to have passed several days there, but a witness gave evidence that the wife, although she passed several days at the house, slept in a distinct and separate part of the house, and did not pass the night with the husband. Several years later the wife became pregnant. When the child was born it was concealed and grew up under another name. On a question as to its legitimacy, it was claimed that the presumption of legitimacy was conclusive because it was shown that the husband and wife had an opportunity for sexual intercourse. The court held that the presumption in favor of legitimacy was rebutted, not only by the proof of nonaccess by the husband, but also by the evidence of the adultery of the wife, and the concealment of the child.

In Atchley v. Sprigg (1863) 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 345, wherein it appeared that the husband had not had access during the normal period of gestation, the court said: "Now, the question is, Does this evidence convince my mind that Cole was not the father of this child, and that Palmer was? In other words, that Cole had not, at the period when the child was procreated, generative access to his wife. Now, the child was born on the 11th October, 1834, and assuming the ordinary period of gestation, the period of procreation would be about the 11th January, 1834; at all events between that date and the 11th March, in case it were a seven months' child. Cole and his wife had not lived together for nine years; she had never had a child by him. This child was born nineteen years after their marriage, and though not physically impossible for a wife to have a child by her husband for the first time after nineteen years, it is at least improbable. In 1824 they separated, and from that time their separation continued complete, unless there were stolen interviews; and the evidence satisfied me, that they never again lived together as husband and wife in the same house. We have the evidence of all the living persons who can give any information; and though the evidence of the persons interested in the issue must be taken with jealousy, every person who can confirm their evidence does so as far as they are capable; and Cole was never seen or heard of near the house, except on the two occasions I have mentioned. Where he was, we do not know; but we have every reason to conclude that during the whole of that period he never had communication with his wife under the circumstances which would enable him to be the father of that child. Of course, nobody can say where Mrs. Cole went when she was out of doors; but, Cole being her husband, what was to prevent his coming to the house, if he and his wife were desirous of it? The fact being to my mind satisfactorily proved, that he did not come openly to the house, why am I to assume she is to go out, and have stolen interviews, to gratify that conjugal feeling which she manifested in no other manner? That theory, then, has no reasonable grounds; and unless I adopt the rule which once prevailed, that, in order to overcome the presumption of legitimacy, there must be impossibility of access, access here was so improbable that I cannot suppose it. I am convinced in my own mind that from 1824 down to the death of Cole, no such communication took place; and, therefore, the child is illegitimate."

In Bosvile v. Atty. Gen. (1887) L. R. 12 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 177, 56 L. J. Prob. N. S. 97, 57 L. T. N. S. 88, 36 Week. Rep. 79, it was admitted that the husband and wife occupied the same bedroom up to the date of their separation. Exactly 277 days (or 276 days counting the commencement of labor of the preceding day) after she left her husband, the child was born. It appeared that immediately after the separation the wife engaged in adulterous intercourse. It was held that the question of legitimacy was properly submitted to the jury, and a finding of illegitimacy was sustained.

Likewise, where satisfactory evidence is adduced to show that the husband had been present during the period of gestation, only under such circumstances as afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse, the presumption is rebutted. Goss v. Froman (1889) 89 Ky. 318, 8 L.R.A. 102, 12 S. W. 387; Burnaby v. Baillie (1889) L. R. 42 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 282, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 842, 61 L. T. N. S. 634, 38 Week. Rep. 125.

Thus, in Burnaby v. Baillie (Eng.) supra, it appeared that the husband and wife lived together in the same house up to July 21st, 1884, but prior to that time had occupied separate bedrooms, and it was the habit of the wife to lock her bedroom each night to exclude him. It was proved that in speaking of him she used expressions of hatred. It further appeared that in the second week in July, 1884, the wife's monthly period occurred, but was over before the date of her departure on July 21, when she left her husband and remained away until the 17th of September. It also appeared that the husband was away from home during this period, but the evidence showed that he was not with his wife at any time. The husband returned on the 24th of September. They remained together in the same house until the 15th of December, living on the same terms as before. On that date she left the husband and never returned. A child was born on April 26, 1885, which was 279 days after July 21, 1884. On a question as to the legitimacy of this child the court held that while the child was born within 280 days after her departure from her husband, nevertheless their living together under circumstances that disproved access by the husband rebutted the presumption of legitimacy.

Similarly, in Goss v. Froman (Ky.) supra, it appeared that the wife left her husband in April and did not return until after his death in June. It further appeared that the wife said, time and again, that the husband could not have intercourse with her and that they had ceased, for at least a year prior to his death, to perform the sexual act. Evidence was adduced to show that the husband was physically unfit to have sexual intercourse within the period of gestation. It was held that nonaccess by the husband was satisfactorily proved, and the presumption of legitimacy arising from marriage was rebutted.

But the presumption becomes conclusive if the evidence is insufficient to disprove access during the normal period of gestation.

Thus, in Plowes v. Bossey (1862) 2 Drew. & S. 145, 62 Eng. Reprint, 576, it appeared that on December 23, 1833, the husband was taken to a lunatic asylum, where he remained until his death. In December, 1835, the wife gave birth to the claimant. It appears that the asylum officials were enjoined not to allow the husband and the wife to be left together alone, but it was shown that it was not impossible that the husband and wife had been alone during one of her visits. It also appeared that the husband had been seen in the town before the birth of the child. Commenting on the evidence the vice chancellor said: "The evidence adduced to rebut the presumption of legitimacy may be considered as bearing on two distinct propositions: One, that there was not during the period within which the child must have been begotten any intercourse whatever between the husband and wife; using the term 'intercourse' in the sense of their being in each other's presence; the other, that if there was such intercourse, it was under circumstances which did not admit the possibility of sexual intercourse;" and after a review of the facts said that he was not "judicially convinced," that intercourse had not taken place, and therefore, since the evidence failed to overcome the presumption of legitimacy, that therefore the child must be taken to be legitimate.

And in Reg. v. Mansfield (1841) 1 Q. B. 444, 113 Eng. Reprint, 1203, it appeared that the wife was deserted by her husband. Several years later she was married again by banns, her husband still living, and afterwards had two children. In disposing of the case Patterson, J., said: "From these facts alone we are called upon to infer that there was no access of the husband to his wife, though during any part of the time he may have been living at the next door; I think we cannot form any such conclusions."

So, where a child was born two years after the separation of the husband and the wife, but it appeared that within the period of gestation the husband and wife had opportunity for sexual intercourse, it was held, in the absence of proof of nonaccess, that the issue was legitimate. Kleinert v. Ehlers (1861) 38 Pa. 439.

And where a child was born six months after a divorce a vinculo matrimonii on account of adultery, but it appeared that there was an opportunity for sexual intercourse during the time at which the child must, according to the laws of nature, have been begotten, it was held that the child was legitimate. The court said that the child must "be taken to be legitimate, unless it be proven, by irresistible evidence, that the husband . . . did not have sexual intercourse with his wife." Rhyn v. Hoffman (1862) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 335.

In People v. Case (1912) 171 Mich. 282, 137 N. W. 55, a bastardy proceeding, a married woman charged that she was gotten with child by the respondent on September 30th, 1910. At this time her husband was in jail, but was released October 15th, 1910. The child was born June 25th, 1911, or 253 days after the husband received his liberty. It did not appear that the husband returned to the wife, but it was shown that after his release he worked at several places and was absent from work from time to time. It was held that since nonaccess was not proved, the presumption of legitimacy controlled.

In Bury v. Phillpot (1834) 2 Myl. & K. 349, 39 Eng. Reprint, 977, the court said: "Access is such access as affords an opportunity of sexual intercourse, and where the fact of such access between a husband and wife, within a period capable of raising the legal inference as to the legitimacy of an after-born child, is not disputed, probabilities can have no weight; and a case ought never to be sent to a jury. There is here nothing against the evidence of access, except evidence of the adulterous intercourse of the wife with Hughes, which does not affect the legal inference; for if it were proved that she slept every night with her paramour from the period of her separation from her husband, I must still declare the children to be legitimate. The interest of the public depends upon a strict adherence to the rule of law."

At least two jurisdictions adhere to the rule that the question to be presented to the jury is not whether the husband and the wife did in fact have intercourse, but whether the bare possibility of intercourse presented itself to them at any time. If it did, then, unless impotency can be shown, the presumption is conclusive. Powell v. State (1911) 84 Ohio St. 165, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255, 95 N. E. 660; Scott v. Hillenberg (1888) 85 Va. 245, 7 S. E. 377; Bowles v. Bingham (1811) 3 Munf. (Va.) 599, 5 Am. Dec. 497.

In Powell v. State (1911) 84 Ohio St. 165, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255, 95 N. E. 660, it appeared that the wife separated from the husband on February 22, 1904, and denied having intercourse with him after that date. It further appeared that on the 12th day of January, 1905, the wife was delivered of a child, and the defendant was charged with being its father. Evidence was adduced to show that the husband remained in the same town until the 21st day of July. The court said: "Public policy requires that the status of a child born or begotten in lawful wedlock should be fixed and certain, and the immediate exigencies or even the apparent justice of any particular case will not justify a departure from the rule so necessary and salutary to the best interests of society. The law is not willing that a child shall be declared a bastard to suit the whims or purposes of either parent, nor upon evidence merely that no actual act of intercourse occurred between husband and wife at or about the time the wife became pregnant.

The proof must be such as to show the impossibility of access, and this evidence not only fails to prove that, but on the contrary it does show that access was a physical possibility at all the time from the date that she claims there was a final separation up until the time the divorce was granted, or at least up until the 21st of July, after which time there is some proof, very vague and uncertain however, that he was in distant parts."

In Scott v. Hillenberg (1888) 85 Va. 245, 7 S. E. 377, it was contended that the husband was a soldier in the Confederate Army, and that he was not at his home in the year 1864, and that during that year his wife did not visit him; that his wife became pregnant during the summer or fall of 1864 and gave birth to a child in May, 1865. The evidence was conflicting as to whether there had been an opportunity for access, and it was held that unless the proof clearly established nonaccess, the child must be taken as legitimate.

See also Bowles v. Bingham (1811) 3 Munf. (Va.) 599, 5 Am. Dec. 497, wherein the court said: "With respect to procreations during marriage the presumption is that all persons born during marriage are legitimate. This presumption can be destroyed only by contrary proof, demonstrating that the child is not the child of the husband; which again can only be by showing that from his continued absence from his wife, at or about the time of procreation, or from the impotency of his body, it is impossible that he should be the father. This presumption in favor of legitimacy is so strong, and the exceptions thereto are held under such strictness, that where a man was divorced from his wife, propter perpetuam generandi impotentiam, and then married another woman, who had issue during the marriage, that issue was holden to be his, on the ground that a man may be habilis et inhabilis deversis temporibus. Bury's Case (1600) 5 Coke, 98, 77 Eng. Reprint, 207. It is not, therefore, a mere circumstance of probability that will operate in this case to bastardize the issue. Such issue will be held to be legitimate, unless it be conclusively shown that a person other than the husband must necessarily and unavoidably have been the father."

In Louisiana, where a child is conceived and begotten in wedlock and is not disavowed by the husband in the mode prescribed by law, the status of legitimacy is fixed, and the presumption of legitimacy is conclusive.

See also Eloi v. Mader (1842) 1 Rob. 581, 38 Am. Dec. 192; Dejol v. Johnson (1857) 12 La. Ann. 853.

In Ezidore Cureau (1904) 113 La. 839, 37 So. 773, it was said obiter: The right to disavow and repudiate a child born under the protection of the legal presumption, pater est, is peculiar to the father, and can be exercised only by him, or his heirs. And if the father renounce the right, expressly or tacitly, it is extinguished and can never more be exercised by anyone.

So, in Saloy's Succession (1892) 44 La. Ann. 433, 10 So. 872, the court said: "The onus is on the state to show by strictly legal proof that they have procured it by fraudulent representations and practices, and the question reduces itself as to whether the state has at her command the evidence exclusively permitted in such cases, in which children born during marriage are gravely charged with being adulterous bastards, incapable of inheriting under the law. . . . There is no doubt that a husband, although he be presumed by law to be father of the children born from his wife, during the existence of their marriage, has the indisputable right to repudiate them when they have not been begotten by him and are the spurious fruits of the adulterous intercourse of his wife with another man, but the cases in which he is permitted to go into the scandalous doings of his depraved consort, reeking with the odor of adultery, are specified with precision, and his action, and, in his default, that of his heirs, are to be asserted within a limited delay. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 184-192 inclusive. The proceeding must be conducted contradictorily with the wife and with the child or children whose character and status are involved. The law has made him the sole judge of the propriety of engaging in such a course, with a reserve of the right to his heirs of doing so, in the event of his death within the delay. He is the only one who perhaps can know that he is not the father. When, aware of the circumstances under which he might have exercised the right of repudiation, the husband, who is the sovereign arbiter of his honor, fails to do so, the door is forever closed and no one can afterwards assert a right strictly personal to him."

See also the dictum in Eloi v. Mader, supra, to the effect that the father, if he intends to dispute the legitimacy of the child, must do so within one month after the birth, or two months if absent when the birth occurs, or he shall be barred from ever making the objection. Civ. Code, arts. 188, 191.

In Tate v. Penne (1829) 7 Mart. N. S. 548, it appeared that the mother was married in 1806 and the defendant was born in 1809. The evidence was conflicting as to the date of the separation of the mother and her husband. On a question as to the legitimacy of the defendant the court said: "This is all the evidence. It creates a presumption of absence and non-access; but that will not do in cases like this. The legal presumption of the husband being the father, and of access being presumed in cases of voluntary separation, can only be destroyed by evidence bringing the parties within the exception the law has created to the rule, namely, the physical impossibility of connection—moral will not do. Now that physical impossibility can only be shown by proving the residence of the husband and wife to be so remote from each other that access was impossible. The proof here wholly fails in establishing it. The evidence of the husband's residence is only negative. He was not on the east side of the lake. Where the wife was, the proof is silent. How can we tell from the evidence that they did not meet and cohabit?"

And in Vernon v. Vernon (1851) 6 La. Ann. 242, it appeared that the wife left the husband about 1793 and did not return until about 1800. On her return she brought back two children, born during her absence, one having the appearance of being about six years of age, and the other about four years of age, of whom the plaintiff was one. It appeared that the plaintiff had been brought up in the house, but had never been considered as the son, of the deceased. In holding that the Banbury Peerage Case was the rule as to the condition of the plaintiff, which was fixed by the law in force in South Carolina, it was remarked by the court: "It is obvious that these facts do not establish the impossibility of access and cohabitation of these parties. The evidence on this point is not at all satisfactory. There is no proof, other than that stated, as to where Mrs. Vernon went, or was at any time from 1793 to 1800. . . . We assume that the rule established by the judges in the Banbury Peerage Case would control the condition of the plaintiff at the time of his birth. He was born during marriage; and the marriage having been proved, nothing is allowed to impugn his legitimacy, short of the proof of facts showing it to be impossible that the husband of his mother could be his father. . . . We understand that, to rebut the presumption of legitimacy resulting from marriage, the evidence against it ought to be distinct, clear, and conclusive. It is sufficient to state that the evidence adduced in this case is not of that character. It is, at best, conjectural; and at this distance of time it would be equally unjust and dangerous to deprive a man of his status of legitimacy by any evidence short of that which the law and public policy require to be administered in order to destroy the effect of a civil institution upon which society rests for its security."

But without proof of cohabitation between spouses since the separation from bed and board, the legitimacy of the child born of a wife 300 days after the separation may be contested. McNeely v. McNeely (1895) 47 La. Ann. 1321, 17 So. 928; Ledet's Succession (1908) 122 La. 200, 47 So. 506.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF COLORADO.

(— Colo. —, 184 Pac. 375.)

Contempt — by grand juror — conspiracy to violate oath.

1. A grand juror who, before taking his oath that he will present no person through malice, hatred, or ill will, has entered into an agreement or conspiracy to violate it and as grand juror is engaged in consummating the agreement, is guilty of contempt.

[See note on this question beginning on page 345.]

— refusal to testify.

2. A refusal to testify in a judicial investigation of general public concern is a direct criminal contempt of court which may be punishable summarily.

[See 6 R. C. L. 497.]

— recital of facts in judgment.

3. The purpose of reciting the facts in the judgment itself in a proceeding to punish a criminal contempt which may be punished summarily is to set them forth so fully in the record that accused may have the cause reviewed.

— charging corruption in drawing grand jury.

4. To publish that a sheriff drew a prejudiced grand jury to make a partisan investigation of a governmental department of a city is a contempt of court.

Grand jury — charge against — statutory provision.

5. A statutory provision that when it becomes necessary to investigate the conduct of a grand juror with reference to any charge, he shall be excused from further attendance, has no relation to a charge as to his competency to act as a grand juror.

— effect of prejudice.

6. Neither bias nor prejudice of a grand juror nor interest other than pecuniary in the prosecution, nor the fact that he has expressed an opinion, will invalidate an indictment returned by him.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1022.]

Witness — refusal to testify — grounds.

7. A witness may not refuse to testify because he considers the matter inquired about as his private, confidential, and personal business.

Courts — power to investigate truth of charge of prejudiced jury.

8. The court may, upon receiving notice of a publication charging the sheriff with corruption in drawing a prejudiced grand jury to investigate a department of a city government, call witnesses to testify to the truth of the charge, and punish for contempt those refusing to testify.

ERROR to the District Court for El Paso County (Sheafor, J.) to review a judgment adjudging defendant guilty of contempt in refusing to testify in certain proceedings. Affirmed.

Statement by Burke, J.:

January 13, 1919, in the district court of El Paso county, a grand jury theretofore in session filed its report and was discharged. One of the matters undisposed of, for lack of time, was the investigation of the department of public safety of the city of Colorado Springs. February 27, 1919, another grand jury was impaneled, and among other things given it in charge was the completion of this investigation. On March 7, 1919, while this grand jury was sitting, there appeared in a certain newspaper, the Labor News, published in the city of Colorado Springs, the following article.

Curious Coincidences.

Isn't it a curious coincidence that the leaders of the county Republicans should boast, after their victory last fall, "We will now proceed to clean out the city hall?" Isn't it a curious coincidence that a Republican sheriff, when drawing a grand jury to investigate a city department presided over by a Democrat, should happen to find so many jurors who had made their boast of what they would do to that department if they had the chance? Isn't it a curious coincidence that all of the jurors save one belong to one party? And isn't it a curious coincidence that when this lone Democrat was discovered that a way was discovered to have him resign? Isn't it a curious coincidence that justice should be called blind when she has such a keen vision as that?

March 22, 1919, there was filed in the district court of El Paso county, "In the Matter of Grand Jury, January Term, 1919," a petition, signed by the foreman of the grand jury, setting up the article above quoted, showing to the court that it constituted "a direct charge as to the competency of members of the grand jury," and asking that an investigation be immediately had by the court "to determine the truth or falsity of the charges made as aforesaid, in order that any members of said grand jury who may be found disqualified to act may be removed therefrom." This petition further prayed that plaintiff in error, as the reputed editor and owner of the newspaper, be summoned as a witness and examined concerning the charges made in the article in question.

This petition was presented to the court, and a subpoena ordered issued for the said Joslyn, returnable at 2 P. M. on said date. In response thereto Joslyn appeared in person and by counsel, who objected to the calling of the witness to testify and to the hearing. This objection was overruled, and exception saved. Thereupon the witness testified that he was the owner of the Labor News; that he was acquainted with the article in question; that he understood the department referred to therein was the department of public safety of the city of Colorado Springs; that he knew nothing which would disqualify any member of the grand jury from acting; that he knew of none of them having made a boast such as was referred to in the article. He was then asked if he wrote the article, to which his counsel objected, saying: "He should first be warned by the court, or somebody, if it might in any manner tend to incriminate him."

The court replied that the objection would have to come from Mr. Joslyn. The question was reread and the witness answered: "I decline to answer that question, for the reason it is private, confidential, and personal business."

After some further colloquy between court and counsel, a continuance was granted until 2 P. M. March 24th following, when the witness again appeared in person and by Mr. Kriger and Mr. Kinsley, his counsel. The proceedings of March 22d were read, argument had, and authorities cited. Thereupon Mr. Kinsley stated that the "witness refuses to take the stand, and refuses to answer any further questions in the proceeding, for the reason that the court is without jurisdiction, and the order commanding him to take the stand and answer further questions is and would be void."

In answer to the court's inquiry of the witness if he still declined to answer the questions, he said: "My counsel has made the statement for me which I indorse. On advice of my counsel, I refuse to take the stand and answer questions."

Thereupon the witness was adjudged in contempt and sentenced to be imprisoned in the county jail until he answered the questions submitted to him, "or until the further order of the court."

From this judgment the witness brings error. A stay of execution was granted, and the matter is now before us on application for superseas.

Messrs. Samuel H. Kinsley and John W. Kriger, for plaintiff in error:

The court had jurisdiction to make the investigation and to pass upon the petition filed, and in refusing to take the witness stand and answer the questions propounded, defendant was clearly guilty of a direct criminal contempt, which having been committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, it had full power to summarily punish the defendant without notice, hearing, or rule to show cause.

Burke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two contentions are made in behalf of plaintiff in error: First, that the judgment is defective in form; second, that the court exceeded its jurisdiction.

It is unnecessary to dwell long on the first of these, that the judgment was defective in form. This refusal to

Contempt—

was a refusal to testify in a judicial investigation of general public concern; hence a direct criminal contempt, which might be punished summarily. Lindsey v. People, — Colo. —, — A.L.R. —, 181 Pac. 581, decided by this court April 7, 1919. In such cases the purpose of reciting the facts in the judgment itself is that they may be so fully set forth in the record as to enable the defendant to have the cause reviewed. It is enough to say that this order of commitment, which is made a part of the record and is now before us, sufficiently sets forth such facts.

The question of the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the meaning of the article in question, and its relation to, and probable effect upon, the grand jury and its work. The meaning of the article is not to be determined from what anyone says about it. It speaks for itself. Stripped of all self-evident camouflage, it is a simple statement that the drawing of the grand jury was a piece of chicanery; that the sheriff who drew it violated his oath of office and selected its members for an ulterior purpose; that he intentionally selected men who had not only prejudged the particular matter referred to them by the court, but had prejudged it solely from the standpoint of partisan politics; that they were making no pretension of passing upon its merits, but had openly boasted their determination to do the contrary; that they had entered upon their duties with a fixed intention of violating their oath of office in the discharge thereof; and that, so far as this particular investigation was concerned, the whole proceeding was a farce and a judicial outrage. We think such is the plain purport of this article and the intention of its author. That it was calculated to bring discredit upon the grand jury and its work, and contempt upon the court of which it was an important part, cannot be doubted.

drawing grand

Section 3700, Revised Statutes of Colorado 1908, provides as follows: "In any case where a grand juror has been sworn and it becomes necessary to investigate his conduct with reference to any charge, . . . the district attorney shall briefly set forth such fact in writing to the district judge, who shall excuse such juror from further attendance. . . ."

From this it is contended that the sole duty of the court in the present case was to act thereunder. If so, this would have required a discharge of all of the grand jurors, as the charge was made against all. A similar charge might then have been made against their successors, and it would thus be in the power of one whose conduct was being investigated by a grand jury to effectually block such investigation. This section relates only to a charge pending before the grand jury for investigation. It has no relation to a charge as to the competency of grand jurors as such.

charge against—statutory provision.

An officer charged with the duty of selecting and summoning jurors, who excludes all those acquainted with counsel for the defense solely upon that ground, is guilty of a gross contempt of court, and should be severely dealt with. Harjo v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 590, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013; 98 Pac. 1021. The same is true if the officer were guilty of a similar violation of duty in summoning grand jurors.

Each grand juror is required to take an oath that he "will present no person through malice, hatred or ill will." Colo. Rev. Stat. 1908, § 3699. If before taking such oath he has entered into an agreement or conspiracy to violate it, and as a grand juror he is engaged in consummating that agreement or conspiracy, he is clearly in contempt, and may be punished. United States v. Kilpatrick (D. C.) 16 Fed. 765.

The general rule is that neither the bias nor prejudice of a grand juror, nor his interest in a prosecution (other than a direct pecuniary interest), nor the fact that he has formed, or expressed an opinion, will so disqualify him as to render invalid indictments returned by the grand jury. 20 Cyc. 1300; United States v. Belvin (C. C.) 46 Fed. 381; Com. v. Woodward, 157 Mass. 516, 34 Am. St. Rep. 302, 32 N. E. 939; Rolland v. Com. 82 Pa. 306, 22 Am. Rep. 758. But we know of no authority which goes so far as to hold that this would be true where jurors had determined, through malice or bribery, to violate their oaths. It is the difference between honest error, to which all men are subject, and that wilful corruption which distinguishes the malefactor.

It should be borne in mind that plaintiff in error was not adjudged guilty of contempt for any aspersions cast upon the grand jurors, or upon the sheriff, but for his refusal to answer as a witness in an investigation being conducted by the court to determine the truth of a charge, publicly made, that the grand jury, an important part of the machinery of the court, had been turned into an engine of oppression.

A witness may not refuse to testify because such testimony may influence civil litigation in which he is interested. Radinsky v. People, — Colo. —, 180 Pac. 88. For the same reason he may not refuse to testify because he considers the matter inquired about as his "private, confidential, and personal business."

Witness—refusal to testify—grounds.

It was perfectly clear in the present case that a gross contempt of court had been committed, either by the sheriff and some of the grand jurors, or by the publication of the article in question, or both. It is equally clear, and not denied, that that contempt could have been tried and the guilty parties punished in a direct proceeding against them, or any of them, for that purpose. The question here to be determined is: "Might the court, upon having the matter called to its attention, proceed first to determine the probable truth thereof, and call and examine witnesses for that purpose?"

The primary object of such an investigation was to purge the grand jury of corrupt members, if any such there were. That object was of more vital importance in the administration of justice than the mere punishment of those who had already offended. "It is manifest that, if the jury is insulted and treated with contempt, the court must protect them, for they can render no judgment and are powerless to protect themselves." State ex rel. Crow v. Shepherd, 177 Mo. 205-228, 99 Am. St. Rep. 624, 76 S. W. 86.

So with a grand jury. Suppose the attack had been printed anonymously and widely circulated in the community, and was thus brought to the attention of the court, and, while neither author nor publisher were known, witnesses were at hand who could advise the court of their identity. The grand jury could not summon and examine them, because, being powerless to punish the contempt, they were without jurisdiction to investigate it. But can it be said that the court, which had the duty to protect the grand jury, was also powerless, because, forsooth, the identity of the offender, though easily ascertainable, had not been disclosed?

In an early California case an attorney for one whose conduct was under investigation by a grand jury addressed a letter to the grand jurors, reflecting upon their conduct and integrity, and denouncing them for permitting themselves to be corruptly used by a person of wealth for the purpose of finding indictments to gratify his private malice and oppress and crush his adversary. The offense in that case was less serious than the one here under investigation. That was a mere private letter, which might only come to the attention of one or more of the grand jurors. This was as public in its nature as it was possible for the offender to make it. There the matter arose upon a review of a judgment in contempt against the writer of the letter. The court said: "If the invectives against the person named in the letter, and others, who are accused of having been hired by him to aid and abet him in his design, were founded upon facts, and the petitioner, as an attorney of the court, had suggested them to the court in a regular way, it is not to be doubted that upon such a suggestion judicial inquiry would have been instituted, and that, if there were adduced any evidence at all to sustain the suggestion, prompt action would have been taken to vindicate the law, maintain the respect due to the court, and to protect the court and the grand jury under its supervision and legal control against persons implicated in the attempt to commit, or in the commission of, such criminal acts. . . . And such criminal acts are also punishable as contempts of court, for they taint with suspicion the proceedings which they touch, embarrass, hinder, and delay courts in the exercise of their functions, and, if suffered to pass unrebuked and unpunished by the court whose proceedings are tainted by them, they result in a paralysis of judicial confidence. To prevent, arrest, and punish for such offenses, whether committed or attempted to be committed by or upon any grand juror, is therefore the duty of every court in which such a jury may be sitting in the discharge of its duties; and if guilt should be found to attach to members of the grand jury, the jury should be promptly discharged, and the matters against the members thereof should be referred to another grand jury. . . . It is of the highest importance that jurors and judicial officers should be protected and preserved, not only from all improper influences, but even from the suspicion of such influences. . . . A grand jury should never forget that it sits as the great inquest between the state and the citizen, to make accusations only upon sufficient evidence of guilt, and to protect the citizen against unfounded accusation, whether from the government, from partisan passion, or private malice. But the letter was . . . aimless for any purpose, except to exasperate the jurors, by the aspersions upon their official conduct which it contained, or to deter them from performing their duties by the threats of public clamor which it expressed, or to create a distrust and a want of confidence in any action which might be taken as the result of their investigation, and thus to embarrass the court itself in the administration of justice. That such a communication to a jury sitting in or in connection with a court, of which it is a component part, and while engaged in the exercise of its functions, is a punishable contempt of court, does not admit of doubt. 'Any publication, whether by parties or strangers, which concerns a case pending in court, and has a tendency to prejudice the public concerning the merits, or which reflects on the tribunal or its proceedings, or on the parties, the jurors, the witnesses, or the counsel, may be visited as a contempt.' Bishop, Crim. Law, §

216. It would be strange if, under a government of law, it were otherwise." (Italics are ours.) Re Tyler, 64 Cal. 434, 1 Pac. 884.

In the instant case the foreman of the grand jury suggested that matter to the court. Upon that suggestion the court did institute a judicial inquiry, as was his duty, and if guilt had been found to attach to the jurors, or any of them, he would doubtless have promptly discharged such jurors, as was also his duty.

Any grand jury foreman, who, cognizant of such a publication and acquainted with the duties of his position, should fail to call it to the attention of the presiding judge, would be unfit to be further trusted with his important functions. Any judge who, having such a matter properly called to his attention, should fail to investigate it, and, if found true, discharge the unworthy jurors and direct the institution of proceedings for their punishment and the punishment of the sheriff, or, if found untrue, direct the institution of proceedings for the punishment of their traducers and the protection of the good name and dignity of his court (unless he were powerless to do so), would be unfit to hold judicial office. The simple reason is that if these things were true, or were publicly charged and believed to be true, indictments returned by such grand jury would be mere scraps of paper. Good citizens acting as petit jurors would refuse to convict thereon, and the court itself would be brought into that contempt and detestation in the community which it richly deserved, and rendered impotent for anything but evil.

The fact that the communication, upon which the inquiry was based, may have prayed action which, in the first instance, would have been improper, by no means nullified the investigation or ousted the court of jurisdiction. This was not a proceeding to punish the author or publisher of "Curious Coincidences," nor to adjudge them in contempt for libeling the sheriff. It was an investigation to determine whether a grand jury, then sitting, was composed of upright and law-abiding citizens, honestly endeavoring to keep their oaths and act as "a great inquest between the state and the citizens," making accusations "only upon sufficient evidence of guilt," and protecting "the citizen against unfounded accusations, whether from the government, partisan passion, or private malice," or whether that grand jury was an aggregation of political tricksters, brazenly sitting in the halls of justice in the garb of public functionaries and juggling with the liberties and reputations of men.

For the reasons given, the supersedeas is denied, and the judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Misconduct of officers in selection or summoning of jurors or grand jurors as contempt of court.

There seems to be very little in the books on this subject.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (JOSLYN v. PEOPLE, ante, 339), that an officer charged with the duty of selecting and summoning grand jurors is guilty of contempt of court where he intentionally selects those who have prejudged the particular matter referred to them by the court, and have done so solely from the standpoint of partisan politics.

In Harjo v. United States (1909) 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 590, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013, 98 Pac. 1021, where the court reversed a conviction in a murder case on the ground that the marshal had discriminated against the defendants in refusing to summon men to serve as jurors who were well acquainted with one of the attorneys for the defendant, the court said: "The officer was guilty of gross contempt of court, as well as a violation of a penal statute, and should have been required to make a satisfactory explanation, or have been severely dealt with."

In Richards v. United States (1903) 61 C. C. A. 161, 126 Fed. 105, it was held that the fact that the marshal knew that one of the talesmen whom he caused to be subpoenaed was a friend of the defendant was not in itself evidence sufficient to establish the charge of wilful contempt of court. The court said: "The most that can be said of the evidence against the marshal is that, conceding it all to be true, it presents some circumstances calculated to arouse suspicion, but not sufficient to sustain a judgment of conviction of so grave an offense as that with which he is charged."

In the Richards Case the court reversed an order of the trial court committing the marshal for contempt in summoning talesmen from bystanders, and not from the body of the district as the trial court intended, because of the failure of the evidence to show that the marshal knew of the intention of the court in that regard.

It may be noted that in Keppeler v. Williams (1778) 1 Dall. (U. S.) 29, 1 L. ed. 23, where the plaintiff's attorney demanded the venire of the sheriff, it was held that it would be a contempt to pocket the venire. The court cited Comb. 303, 90 Eng. Reprint, 492, which was the case of Jones v. Montague (1694), holding that it is a contempt for an attorney to take the venire from the sheriff by force and not bring it into court.

It may be observed that the endeavor to induce an officer to summon particular persons as jurors is a contempt. Thus, in Sinnott v. State (1888) 11 Lea (Tenn.) 281, the court said: "The attempt of the defendant to induce the officers of the court to summon as jurors, in the particular case then to be tried, certain persons specified by him in preference to others, or, in common parlance, to 'pack' a jury, was an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court within the purview of said provisions [of the statute], and was a contempt for which he was punishable by the court." The provisions referred to declared that the wilful misbehavior of any person in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct justice is a contempt; and that abuse of, or unlawful interference with, the process or proceedings of the court is also a contempt. CITY OF HENDERSON, Appt.,

ANNIE W. REDMAN et al.

Kentucky Court of Appeals — September 26, 1919.

(— Ky. —, 214 S. W. 809.)

Bonds — municipal — illegal — return of purchase price.

1. A city which receives money for its bonds under the mistaken belief of both parties that they were valid, when the statute under which they were issued is unconstitutional, is bound to return the money received as money had and received to the use of the purchaser, and it is immaterial that it may have paid out the money for improvements for which it was not liable.

(— Ky. —, 214 S. W. 809.)

Appeal — cross appeal — coappellee.

2. Upon appeal by a city against which a judgment for return of money paid for its bonds was rendered in favor of defendant in an action to hold him answerable for the value of the bonds to an assignee, to which the city was made a party by cross petition, no judgment can be secured in favor of the original defendant against the original plaintiff by cross appeal, since a cross appeal will not lie against a coappellee.

3. The right to take an appeal or cross appeal is merely statutory.
[See 2 R. C. L. 27.]

APPEAL by the defendant city from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henderson County in favor of the original plaintiff against the original defendants, cross petitioners, and in their favor against the defendant city in an action, brought to recover the amount of the remaining unpaid purchase price of certain property, in which the original defendants filed a cross appeal against the original plaintiff, coappellee. Cross appeal disallowed. Judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. S. Morris, for appellant:

The act of the general assembly approved March 18, 1912, and entitled, "An Act to Amend the Charters of Cities of the Third Class," is unconstitutional and void, and an ordinance for the improvement of the streets of a city of that class, enacted under the authority of and in pursuance of the provisions of such act, is invalid.

Hickman v. Kimbley, 161 Ky. 652, 171 S. W. 176.

Bonds issued under an unconstitutional statute are invalid.

Henderson v. Lieber, 175 Ky. 15, 192 S. W. 830.

The contract made by appellant with the contractors was one which appellant was wholly without authority to make, and one dealing with a municipality must take notice of provisions imposing a debt limit upon it.

Princeton v. Princeton Electric Light & P. Co. 166 Ky. 730, 179 S. W. 1074; Belleview v. Hohn, 82 Ky. 1; German Nat. Bank v. Covington, 164 Ky. 292, 175 S. W. 330; Pineville v. Pineville Bridge Co. 179 Ky. 375, 200 S. W. 659; Worrell Mfg. Co. v. Ashland, 159 Ky. 656, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 880, 167 S. W. 922.

A municipality, under the laws of this state, cannot exceed its constitutional debt limit.

Knipper v. Covington, 109 Ky. 187, 58 S. W. 498; O'Bryan v. Owensboro, 113 Ky. 680, 68 S. W. 858, 69 S. W. 800.

Messrs. Dorsey & Dorsey and Henderson & Taylor for appellees.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee and plaintiff below,

Annie W. Redman, on March 21, 1913, sold and conveyed to the appellees and defendants below, R. W. Youngblood and wife, a house and lot in the city of Henderson for the consideration of $1,500, a small portion of which was paid in cash, and the remainder with a note for $200, which Youngblood and wife executed to the vendor, and at the same time delivered to the latter eleven bonds of the city of Henderson, of the face value of $100 each, which it is claimed were issued in payment for improving Jackson street in the city, and which work was ordered to be and was done under an ordinance duly passed by the city council pursuant to and under the provisions of § 3459a of the Kentucky Statutes, which is an act passed by the legislature at its 1912 session, and is chapter 118 of the published acts of that session. The title of the act purported to amend charters of cities of the third class, to which Henderson belongs.

The case of Hickman v. Kimbley, 161 Ky. 652, 171 S. W. 176, was one brought by the owner of property abutting on a street, which the city proposed to improve under the plan outlined in the amendment, to enjoin the work upon the ground that the statute and the ordinance enacted pursuant thereto was each unconstitutional. It was held that the amendatory act was unconstitutional.

al, in that the legislature, in enacting it, failed to comply with the provisions of § 51 of the Constitution.

In the later case of Henderson v. Lieber, 175 Ky. 15, 192 S. W. 830, the city endeavored to enforce the collection of bonds which were issued in payment of improvements made to one of its streets, and to enforce a lien against an abutting piece of property, which improvements had been made pursuant to the provisions of the amendment above referred to, and which amendment provided for the lien attempted to be asserted. It was again held that the statute was unconstitutional, and that neither the city nor any holder of bonds issued for such improvements could assert any lien against the abutting property on the improved street.

Some time after the rendition of the two opinions referred to, the plaintiff, Mrs. Redman, brought this suit against Youngblood and wife to recover, not only the note for $200 which they executed in part payment for the purchase of the lot involved, but also to recover eight of the bonds which had been taken in part payment for the lot, three of which had been paid. The right to collect from the vendee the amount represented by the unpaid bonds as stated in the petition is upon the theory that the bonds were void and their delivery to the plaintiff constituted no payment. After the filing of the petition an amendment was filed, making the city of Henderson a party, and its answer denied all liability, relying, of course, upon the two opinions referred to. Youngblood and wife resisted liability upon the ground that neither of them had indorsed any of the bonds, which were made payable to bearer, and that plaintiff possessed the same knowledge of their vice as did defendants, and they were therefore accepted cum onere. The answer was also made a cross petition against the city, and a recovery against it in favor of defendants was asked in the event that plaintiff should recover judgment against them. To this cross petition the city made the same defense that it did to the amended petition. After the issues had been made up and the evidence taken, the cause was submitted, and the court followed the two opinions, supra, and held that the statute and the ordinance enacted pursuant thereto, under which the improvement was made, was each unconstitutional, but rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff against Youngblood and wife, and gave them judgment over against the city for the same amount, on the ground that the payment of the money to it by defendants was without consideration, and to reverse the latter judgment the city prosecutes this appeal, making all of the original parties to the suit appellees.

Since the rendition of the judgment appealed from, this court, in the case of Cohen v. Henderson, 182 Ky. 658, 207 S. W. 4, had before it the question of the liability of the city to a purchaser of a similar bond issued to the contractor in payment for work done under the same unconstitutional amendment, and it was held that the city was not liable to the holder of the bond, nor was it liable to him for the value of the improvement, upon the ground, as urged, that it had the right under the charter, independent of the unconstitutional amendment, to improve its sidewalks and streets, as had been done by the contractor under the invalid statute.

The appellant city, for reversal, relies upon the cases referred to and a long list of others from this court, holding in substance that persons who contract with municipal corporations must at their peril know the rights and powers of the municipality to make it, and the authority of the particular agent with whom it was made. Some of the cases so holding are: Miles Auto Co. v. Dorsey, 163 Ky. 692, 174 S. W. 502; Floyd County v. Owego Bridge Co. 143 Ky. 693, 137 S. W. 287; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Com. 177 Ky. 454, 197 S. W. 940; Prince- ton v. Princeton Electric Light & P. Co. 166 Ky. 730, 179 S. W. 1074; Belleview v. Hohn, 82 Ky. 1; German Nat. Bank v. Covington, 164 Ky. 292, 175 S. W. 330, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 189; Pineville v. Pineville Bridge Co. 179 Ky. 375, 200 S. W. 659; and Worrell Mfg. Co. v. Ashland, 159 Ky. 656, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 880, 167 S. W. 922. But, according to our view, the doctrine of those cases does not apply to the facts before us.

The Cohen Case was not prosecuted upon the theory that the city was liable for money had and received from the plaintiff, for the manifest reason that he had paid to it no money, since he had purchased his bond, not from the city, but from a holder who had received it from the city in payment for work for which the city was not liable. Without going into details, the other cases cited sought to recover from the municipality, either for articles sold to it without it having statutory authority to purchase them, or without authority of the agent who made the purchase to do so, or for services rendered in the construction of improvements or otherwise, the contract for which was illegally made, or beyond the authority of the municipality to make. To illustrate: The city is not liable for the services of attorneys when employed by an agent without authority to do so (Covington v. Hallam, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 128; Owensboro v. Weir, 95 Ky. 158, 24 S. W. 115; District of Highlands v. Michie, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 761, 107 S. W. 216); nor for the repair of a county road under a contract made with the county judge without authority (Floyd County v. Allen, 137 Ky. 575, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1125, 126 S. W. 124); nor for the building of a bridge when the contract therefor was not entered into as the statute required (Floyd County v. Owego Bridge Co. 143 Ky. 693, 187 S. W. 287); nor for materials bought and used by the city clerk without authority (Worrell Mfg. Co. v. Ashland, 159 Ky. 656, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 880, 167 S. W.

922); nor for the purchase of machinery for the use of the municipality by others than those authorized by the statute (J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Com. 177 Ky. 454, 197 S. W. 940). Certainly the municipality would not be liable where the contract, although authorized and duly entered into, would create an indebtedness beyond the constitutional limit.

In each of the cases referred to, and many others which might be cited, the municipality got the benefit of the services, and it was urged that it ought to be made liable on a quantum meruit because of benefits received; but this contention was denied upon the ground that, although the result was harsh, a due regard for the protection of the taxpayer demanded that such corporations should be held strictly to their statutory authority in the making of contracts and the expenditure of public funds. If the doors were once opened for the violation of such authority, the treasury might be depleted, and additional burdens placed upon the citizen in the way of taxes. In other words, it would pave the way for an indiscriminate expenditure of public funds, with a possible failure to obtain value received. Thus, in the Worrell Mfg. Co. Case, supra, quoting from Belleview v. Hohn, 82 Ky. 1, in laying down the reason for denying liability in such cases, this court said: "Courts found it necessary to execute the powers expressly granted, and to refuse to make corporations liable upon implied promises by reason of benefits received. This is done for the protection of the inhabitants of the corporation, and because the only power the corporation has is from the law creating it; and, instead of recognizing a more liberal rule, the courts are inclined to hold corporations and their agents within the letter of their grant."

Further along in the same opinion for the doctrine, it is said: "It may ion, as if to emphasize the reason be that an occasional injustice will result; but it is better that this should be than that the taxpayers of a city, whose burdens are already heavy, should be subjected to an increased burden imposed by unauthorized agents."

Again, in the Cohen Case, supra, it is said: "While the equities of this case greatly weigh in favor of the appellant, and the result seems harsh, the setting aside of the well-established principles of law, to save him from the consequences, cannot be justified, as the evil consequences which would flow from a contrary holding would be unending."

In the former part of the opinion it was shown that the "evil consequences" referred to were those that would operate to the detriment of the taxpayer. Indeed, in none of the cases do we find any other ground upon which to base the doctrine which they announce, the soundness of which we do not question. But, like all other doctrines or rules of law, when the reason for it ceases, its application should also cease.

In the instant case the city, by its council, had authorized the mayor and clerk to issue bonds of the nature purchased by the appellee Youngblood, and to the amount which he purchased. After that he applied to the mayor, and both of them acting under the belief that the bonds were valid (they being duly signed and executed), he issued his check, payable to the city of Henderson, and delivered it to the mayor, receiving therefor the bonds in contest. The check could not be cashed without being legally indorsed by the city, and the fact that the mayor may have wrongfully indorsed the check, or delivered it to one to whom the city was not justly indebted, cannot, according to our view, affect the rights of Youngblood; for if the check was wrongfully disposed of, either by an unauthorized indorsement or an unauthorized delivery, such facts raise questions affecting the city, and not the maker of the check. The facts clearly present a case where both parties were mistaken as to the right of the city to either issue, sell, or deliver the bonds, and one where it obtained $1,100 from appellee without any consideration whatever. In such case, can it be said that it would be a burden upon the taxpayer if the city should be required to rectify this mistake and to give back the wrongfully obtained cash consideration?

municipal—illegal—return
price.

We think not. The difference between this case and those where only services, machinery, or improvements have been rendered or furnished is perfectly apparent. In the latter class of cases no funds went into or were made payable to the treasury of the municipality, and if it were made liable the treasury would be drawn on without a corresponding amount having gone into it, and that, too, in payment for services or articles which the municipality did not have the right to purchase, or, if so, it illegally purchased them. In that case the amount adjudged to be paid would not be paid with a corresponding sum previously paid by plaintiff, but with money furnished by the taxpayer. The difference between the two classes of cases affords ample room for the application of a different legal principle. Suppose the city of Henderson had possessed the authority to issue and deliver the bonds in question, they being free from any taint of illegality, and Youngblood had paid for them, but the city declined to deliver them, either because the bonds were already sold, or for any other reason. Could it then be said that the city could retain the money upon the ground that it could not be held upon an implied contract to refund it, or upon any other ground? Such a contention would be monstrous, and would shock the conscience of enlightened jurisprudence. In that case the transaction would be nothing more than the city agreeing to deliver bonds, and failing to do so after it had received payment therefor.

In the case before us the bonds delivered were in fact no bonds. They were mere scraps of paper, and we are unable to differentiate the case from the one where there was an utter failure to make any delivery. But it is insisted that the Worrell Mfg. Co. Case, and others referred to, hold that a municipality cannot be held on an implied contract, and such seems to be the holding of that opinion; but the expressions therein with reference to it were made in the light of the facts being dealt with, which were entirely dissimilar to those here presented, in that the collection was not sought for money paid to the municipality. However, if the doctrine of that and other cases should be construed to be of universal application, so as to include cases like the one before us, there are still grounds upon which the plaintiff ought to be entitled to recover—they being (a) payment of money by a mistake; and (b) a fraudulent obtention of the money by the municipality for which it should be made liable in tort. Indeed, to so hold is not a departure from the doctrine of the cases relied on and referred to above, for it is recognized therein that the plaintiff, although unable to collect from the municipality, may recover the consideration furnished by him, if he can obtain it either with or without the processes of the court. Thus, in the Owego Bridge Co. Case, supra, referring to the rule as announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, 19 L. ed. 1040, this court said: "The obligation to do justice rests upon all persons, natural and artificial, and if a county obtain money or property of others without authority, the law, independent of any statute, will compel restitution or compensation. Under this rule, Floyd county will not be permitted to retain the bridges and not pay for them. Appellant having declined to pay for the bridges, appellee will be permitted to remove the bridges and all the material which it furnished in their construction."

The same right of the plaintiff is upheld in the cases of Bardwell v. Southern Engine & Boiler Works, 130 Ky. 222, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110, 118 S. W. 97, and Floyd County v. Allen, 137 Ky. 575, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1125, 126 S. W. 124. To the same effect is Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 961; the text being supported by cases from many of the states of the Union.

It will be noticed that the principle last referred to permits the plaintiff to recover the property which his services furnished or created, if obtainable, and it permits him to recover from the municipality "money" which it had obtained from him without authority. We are not without authority from this court holding that money illegally paid, or paid without consideration, to a municipality, may be recovered from it. In the case of Stanford v. Hite, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 386, and reported in full in 11 Ky. Ops. 145, it was held that one who paid to the city money for a license which had been executed under a void ordinance could recover it in a suit against the city, upon the ground that it had been paid by a mistake and without consideration. In the course of the opinion this court, through Judge Pryor, said: "The corporation has no right to this appellee's money. He was under neither a legal nor moral obligation to pay it; and, having received no consideration in any manner by reason of its payment, the corporation was properly required to refund it."

This is in accord with the fundamental principles of justice, and does not come within the rule requiring the court to protect the taxpayer by a strict construction of the powers and authority of the municipality or its agents, since he never had any interest in the fund to be protected, having in no way contributed to it, and we unhesitatingly adopt it as the correct doctrine, in order to carry out the principles of right, justice, and honesty between individuals, whether artificial or natural. But we go no further than to apply the principle herein announced to the facts of this case. The record does not show that the city was indebted beyond the constitutional limit, and this defense cannot prevail, even if it be conceded that this fact could be relied on in a case like this.

Since the pendency of the appeal, a motion has been made in this court by the original defendants for a cross appeal against plaintiff (a coappellee), which motion was sustained, and it is now insisted that plaintiff's petition should have been dismissed in so far as it sought judgment against defendants, Youngblood and wife, for the $800 represented by the unpaid city bonds given as part consideration for the property purchased. We do not think, however, that defendants can in this court question the judgment rendered against them through the prosecution of the attempted cross appeal. A cross appeal is allowable to an appellee against an appellant only, and not against a coappellee. This rule as applicable to practice in appellate courts is without exception so far as we are aware. Indeed, the right of appeal in any case, as well as the right to a cross appeal, is purely statutory, and unless such right is provided for by statute the litigant cannot insist thereupon. 3 C. J. 352. Under this rule the statute may provide for an appeal without providing for a cross appeal, and in that case no cross appeal can be prosecuted. Hence, in the authority just referred to, it is said: "As the right of appeal is purely statutory, where one party takes an appeal, the other party cannot take a cross appeal, unless it is authorized by statute."

Although § 755 of the Civil Code provides for the prosecution of a cross appeal, that section has been construed to confine the right to an appellee dissatisfied with some relief granted against him in favor of an appellant. Smith v. Northern Bank, 1 Met. (Ky.) 575; Gaar v. Louisville Bkg. Co. 11 Bush, 180, 21 Am. Rep. 209; Home Ins. Co. v. Gaddis, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 159; McKay v. Mayes, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 827, 32 S. W. 606; Marion Nat. Bank v. Phillips, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 159, 35 S. W. 910; Asher v. Helton, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 9, 101 S. W. 350; Hessig v. Hessig, 130 Ky. 685, 113 S. W. 851; and Matney v. Edmonds, 179 Ky. 243, 200 S. W. 365. In the case last mentioned this court, in announcing the rule, said: "A cross appeal is only allowable in behalf of an appellee against an appellant; it is not permissible against a coappellee."

The other cases referred to state the rule in equally emphatic terms. If an appellee desires a review of any judgment which a coappellee obtained against him, his only remedy is to prosecute an original appeal, since, under the rule, supra, he may not obtain such review through the medium of a cross appeal. It might be insisted that, the cross appeal having been heretofore granted, it is now too late to deny it; but the same conditions will be found to exist in the cases, supra, wherein the relief by cross appeal was denied on final hearing, although the motion was previously granted. Besides, such a motion, when made in this court, is generally sustained as a matter of course, but when heard upon its merits it will be allowed or disallowed according to the party's right thereto.

In this case there is yet ample time for the prosecution of an original appeal by Youngblood and wife against plaintiff, if such a course is desired. For manifest reasons we therefore decline to express any opinion upon the questions sought to be raised by the attempted cross appeal.

Wherefore the petition for a rehearing is sustained, the former opinion withdrawn, the cross appeal disallowed, and the judgment affirmed.

This note is not concerned with cases dealing with the question of the implied liability of public corporations for services rendered or material or goods furnished a public corporation where the instrument of indebtedness issued therefor is invalid, and hence not enforceable; but, as indicated by the title, the note deals only with cases involving the implied liability of public corporations for money received for invalid and unenforceable instruments of indebtedness.

Generally, public corporations are restricted by statute or constitution in their power to contract indebtedness. These restrictions are for the protection of taxpayers of the corporation from the unlawful acts of its officers. The restrictions or limitations, being primarily protective in their character, are not to be evaded either directly or indirectly by enforcing against the corporation an implied contract. Hence, it follows that in order that an implied liability may be raised against a public corporation by reason of money it has received for invalid securities, it should appear that the enforcement of the implied liability will not fritter away the essential safeguards thus imposed by law as a protection for the taxpayers. Where, however, the invalidity of the instrument is due to the defective execution of the power, or to the fact that while the corporation had authority to borrow money for the purpose for which the instrument was issued, it was without authority to issue an instrument of the character it did issue, and the proceeds of the instrument are actually appropriated to a purpose not ultra vires the general powers of the corporation, then no substantial right of the taxpayers is encroached upon by enforcing against the municipality an implied obligation to account for the benefit accrued to it from the money thus received and appropriated.

The necessity that the corporation shall not only receive the money, but shall actually appropriate it to some purpose for which it had power to contract an indebtedness or borrow money, is emphasized in many of the cases hereinafter considered. In this connection the actual holding in the reported case (HENDERSON v. REDMAN, ante, 346), is not entirely clear. If it is assumed that the court intended to hold that the mere receipt of money by a public corporation for its invalid securities will render it liable upon an implied contract for the money actually received, even though it was used for some purpose for which the corporation had no power to contract, then the case would seemingly be opposed to the majority rule upon the point. Upon the other hand, if the proceeds of the check were actually appropriated to some use with reference to which the corporation had the general power to contract, even though the particular claim paid was itself unenforceable because of some irregularity, the case would seem to be in harmony with the weight of authority on the subject. In this connection it is to be observed that the distinction which the court makes between the rights of the holder of a bond for which money has been paid the corporation, and the rights of one who receives a bond in payment of services rendered or material furnished, is in some respects valid; as, for example, where the bonds are issued for a purpose wholly beyond the power of the corporation, but the proceeds are diverted to some purpose within the power of the corporation. Upon showing this fact, the holder of bonds for which the cash has been paid the municipality may recover; while of course such a showing cannot be made where the bonds are issued in payment of services or material, etc. But where the bonds or the proceeds are actually used for the purpose contemplated, and for such purpose the corporation has general power to contract, then in either case recovery may be had upon implied contract, even though no recovery could be had upon the bonds. In either case, however, the recovery is based upon the ground that the corporation has received a benefit for which it had the general power to contract. And in neither case is the recovery based upon the mere fact that the corporation actually received the proceeds of the bonds. The purpose to which the money was appropriated, and not the mere receipt of the money, is the true criterion of the implied liability.

Of course, if a public corporation has received money for its invalid securities, and the money still remains in the treasury, the obstacles to a recovery which are presented when the money has been expended do not exist, and there is no apparent reason, either in law or equity, why the holder of the instrument cannot recover the money the corporation received for it, and which it retains in its possession.

Upon this point in Reynolds v. Lyon County (1903) 121 Iowa, 733, 96 N. W.

1096, the court said: "The county obtained the money without consideration. . . . During its retention by the county the bondholders might have laid claim to it at any time, and could have enforced its surrender by replevin."

In Valley Falls Co. v. Taft (1905) 27 R. I. 136, 61 Atl. 41, it is held that money paid to a town council under a contract which it was without authority to make is paid without consideration, and may be recovered from the town. In this case the money was paid to be used in helping to construct a highway, but the town did not construct the highway; at least, as an entirety. It is not clear whether or not the money had actually been used. In Dodge v. Memphis (1892) 51 Fed. 165, the rule is stated that a municipal corporation which sells void bonds and receives the money therefor, may be compelled to restore the amount received in an action for money had and received.

In Paul v. Kenosha (1867) 22 Wis. 266, 94 Am. Dec. 598, the court said that the city having had the money and legal scrip for its city bonds, which turn out to be of no value whatever, the case "seems to fall under the general rule of law that where a party sells an obligation which turns out to be valueless, and not of such a character as he represents it to be, he is liable to the vendee as upon a failure of consideration. The city bonds, it appears, were void when the agents of the city sold them to the plaintiff. Is it just and equitable that the city retain the money which it has received for its own worthless bonds? The plaintiff took the bonds upon the presumption that they were valid securities, and paid his money, or its equivalent, to the city for them. They turn out to be void for want of power on the part of the city to issue them; and he seeks to recover back the money paid, as upon a failure of consideration. Can he not recover the amount he has paid the maker of the bonds for its worthless paper? It seems to us unnecessary to go into the authorities upon the question. . . . Upon the ground, therefore, that the amount recovered was paid upon a consideration which has failed, we think the judgment right." In this case, however, the city had apparently used the money for legitimate municipal purposes. See further reference to this case, infra, II. a, 2.

It has been held that in order that the holder of invalid negotiable securities of a public corporation be entitled to recover the amount he had paid the municipality for the same, the money paid must be accurately identified and traced into a fund or property which represents the money in such a manner that it can be reclaimed and delivered without taking other property with it, or injuring other persons, or interfering with others' rights. Litchfield v. Ballou (1885) 114 U. S. 190, 29 L. ed. 182, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820.

II. Where invalidity of instrument is not due to essential lack of power in corporation.

a. Where proceeds are used for purpose within general power of corporation to contract for.

This section deals with cases involving the liability of a public corporation upon an implied contract for money received for invalid instruments of indebtedness where the invalidity is not due to an essential lack of power in the corporation to issue them, and it had general authority to contract an indebtedness for the purpose for which the indebtedness in question was contracted, the money received having been used by the corporation or its officers. It also includes cases where the municipality was authorized to contract indebtedness, but this authority was subject to certain conditions, such as a consenting vote of the people, and it appears that these essential requirements have been complied with, but in nonessential features as to the manner of executing the instrument or the character or form of the instrument, there has been a deviation from the prescribed method, which, however, was of sufficient importance to vitiate the instrument itself. In this regard it is to be noted that statutes empowering public corporations to contract indebtedness for specific purposes, and attaching to the exercise of the power certain conditions precedent as to the procedure, have in view two objects: One is to protect the taxpayer by requiring his consent to the proposed indebtedness; or by requiring competition in making the contracts. These requirements may be regarded as essential features which go to the very existence of the power to contract. The other requirements of the statute relate to the manner of entering into the contract, or the form or character of the instrument of indebtedness, and are principally for the purpose of securing uniformity in the method of entering into such contracts. Innocent deviations from this method, while perhaps rendering invalid the instrument of indebtedness, do not encroach upon or impair the reserved rights of the taxpayer, and cannot be regarded as going to the existence of the power to contract; in other words, the deviation relates to a nonessential requirement.

As hereafter shown, by the great weight of authority the mere fact that a municipality has received the benefit of the proceeds of invalid instruments of indebtedness is not, in and of itself, sufficient ground for raising against it an implied promise to repay the money it received for such invalid instruments. Where, however, a public corporation has the general power to contract an indebtedness for the purpose for which it used the proceeds of invalid bonds or other instruments of indebtedness, it may be held liable upon implied contract for the money thus received and appropriated without reference to the ground of the invalidity; providing, of course, that such invalidity is not due to a violation of public policy or an express statutory inhibition.

It is said in Thomson v. Elton (Wis.) supra, that the implied promise springs into life the instant the money is used as a part of the public funds for a purpose for which public money would otherwise have been used.

In Davis v. Stokes County (1876) 74 N. C. 374, it appeared that a county without authority issued bonds for the purpose of obtaining money to pay an indebtedness it had unlawfully contracted to aid the Rebellion. The money not having been used for a legitimate purpose, it was held not to be recoverable by the holder of the bond. It was, however, conceded that had the county, without authority, borrowed money by issuing bonds invalid for failure to follow the statutory requirements, and had the proceeds been used for a legitimate municipal purpose, the county would have been liable for the money thus received and used.

Where an instrument of indebtedness issued by a public corporation is invalid because in amount it exceeds the limitation placed upon the power of the corporation to contract indebtedness, if a portion of the indebtedness is within the limit, the holders of the instruments are entitled to recover of the corporation the amount it received for the instruments which is within the debt limit. Everett v. Independent School Dist. (1900) 102 Fed. 529, s. c. subsequent appeal (1901) 109 Fed. 697; McPherson v. Foster Bros. (1876) 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215; Reynolds v. Lyon County (1903) 121 Iowa, 733, 96 N. W. 1096. As to prorating this amount between different holders of the instruments, see Everett v. Independent School Dist. (Fed.) supra.

2. Illustrative cases.

In Louisiana v. Wood (1880) 102 U. S. 294, 26 L. ed. 153, it appeared that a city issued bonds to refund certain indebtedness; at the time the bonds were actually issued, the city was without authority to issue them, and attempted to overcome this difficulty by antedating the bonds as of a time when it had authority to issue the same; the bonds were placed in the hands of a broker and sold in behalf of the city, and the proceeds were used by the latter in retiring its valid indebtedness; subsequently the city repudiated the bonds and refused to pay them, on the ground that they were invalid for the reason stated. Conceding this invalidity, it was held that the owners of the bonds were entitled to recover from the city the money they had paid for the bonds, the benefit of which it had received. The court took the position that the money was paid through a mistake due to the fraudulent act of the city, and that the holders of the bonds, being without knowledge of this mistake, and being free from wrong in the matter, were entitled to recover the money thus paid. It is pointed out in this connection that the city had the power to borrow money, but that, in issuing the bonds as it did, it did not follow the lawful method.

In Read v. Plattsmouth (1882) 107 U. S. 568, 27 L. ed. 414, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 208, it is held that a city acting without authority in that regard, having issued bonds to raise funds to build a schoolhouse which it had the power to build, and the bonds having been sold and the proceeds used for this purpose, the act of the legislature of the state in subsequently enacting a statute validating the bonds, is not within the constitutional inhibition against the legislature's passing special acts conferring powers upon public corporations. The court said that since the city received and used the money for valid purposes, it was bound to repay the money which it had received for the bonds, and an act of the state recognizing the existence of this obligation and confirming the bonds themselves was not a special act conferring upon the city any new power within the constitutional provision referred to.

In Gause v. Clarksville (1879) 5 Dill. 168, Fed. Cas. No. 5,276; Gause v. Clarksville (1800) 1 McCrary, 78, 1 Fed. 353, it is held that where a city sold invalid bonds and applied "the proceeds to legitimate purposes, the amount thereof may be recovered by the owner of the bonds in an action as for money had and received.

In Bangor Sav. Bank v. Stillwater (1892) 49 Fed. 721, a city having power to contract for public improvements issued negotiable promissory notes to raise funds therefor. It being without power to issue the notes, and they being therefore invalid, the holders were held entitled to recover from the city the money it had received in exchange for the notes.

In Geer v. School Dist. (1901) 49 C. C. A. 539, 111 Fed. 682, it appeared that a school district was authorized to contract an indebtedness to build a schoolhouse, without limit as to the amount of indebtedness it might contract. There was, however, a limit upon the amount of the bonded indebtedness which the school district might contract, and, because of this limit, the bonds issued by the district in excess thereof to secure funds with which to pay for the construction of the school building were held to be invalid. Notwithstanding this invalidity, the purchaser of the bonds or his assignee was held entitled to recover the amount which the district received and used for legitimate purposes. The court, however, pointed out that this would not have been so had the school district, in contracting for the building, exceeded the debt limit.

In Gilman v. Fernald (1905) 72 C. C. A. 675, 141 Fed. 941, negotiable bonds issued and sold for the purpose of raising money to construct a waterworks system were invalid. The proceeds of the bonds were used for the purpose for which they were issued, but while the town had authority to borrow money to construct a waterworks system, it did not have the authority to issue negotiable bonds for any purpose, and it was upon this ground that the bonds were held to be ultra vires. The township was nevertheless held liable to the assignee of the original purchaser of the bonds for the money which it had received on the bonds and used for a lawful town purpose.

In State ex rel. Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Dickerman (1895) 16 Mont. 278, 40 Pac. 698, warrants issued by a school district were invalid because the law authorizing the issuance of such warrants was not strictly complied with by the trustees; the latter, however, had authority to issue warrants for the purpose and for the amount for which these warrants were issued. It appeared that the school district had received the benefit of the proceeds of the warrants, and the holders having acted in good faith, the district was held liable to repay the amount which it received for the warrants. The court said: "From these authorities it seems clear that if, in making the contract under discussion, the trustees exceeded their authority, still there was created thereby a liability to refund the money advanced by relator under and in pursuance of said contract. The most, we think, that can be said in this case, is that there was an imperfect or defective attempt to comply with the law on the part of the trustees in the issuing of the bonds of the district. They had the authority under the law to issue them for the purpose for which they were issued, but failed to give a sufficient notice of the purpose and conditions thereof in providing for the election to authorize their issuance. Nor is any bad faith or fraud alleged in the issuance of said bonds. If the bonds had been declared void, we think it could hardly be contended that the contract with relator to advance money on them as security for the building of the schoolhouse would have been considered void for want of authority in the trustees to make the same. And, besides, the contract, so far as relator is concerned, has been fully executed, and we think the doctrine of ultra vires can be invoked with less force here than in cases of executory contracts. The school district secured the benefit of relator's money, advanced in good faith; and we think it would be a most inequitable and unjust holding to say that the district assumed no liability on account thereof, and that relator is left without a remedy, under the circumstances of this case."

In Waitz v. Ormsby County (1865) 1 Nev. 370, it appeared that warrants issued by a county to secure funds for county purposes were invalid because the county commissioners were without authority to negotiate the loan. It was, however, held that if the holder or his assignee showed that the proceeds were expended for the benefit of the county in a manner authorized by law, he would be entitled to recover on a count for money had and received.

In Hoag v. Greenwich (1892) 133 N. Y. 152, 30 N. E. 842, it was held that bonds issued by a town were invalid because payable in a less period of time than that authorized by the statute providing for their issuance. It appearing, however, that the town had received the benefit of the proceeds of the bonds, it was held liable for the amount thus received, the amount, however, to be paid in the manner in which it was authorized to negotiate the loan. The court said that it does not follow that even though the bonds were invalid the loan was void or that the borrowing was unlawful,—that the lender lost his money and the town was at liberty to perpetrate a disgraceful robbery by means of the fault or mistake of its own agents. "Treating the four bonds as void, we are required to dismiss them from the transaction, but not to repudiate the transaction itself. They were unlawful incidents of a perfectly lawful transaction, and may be disregarded while the transaction stands. Conceding them to be void, they become nullities, mere blank and worthless paper, to be treated as if they had never existed, and to be appealed to for no purpose; at least, by the party who avoids them. Dismissing them entirely, we may turn to what remains, and I am confident that enough remains to work out that measure of justice which we all feel it to be our duty to attain."

In People's Bank v. School Dist. (1898) 3 N. D. 496, 28 L.R.A. 642, 57 N. W. 787, it is held that where bonds issued by a school district are invalid because made payable within a shorter period of time than authorized by statute, the district is nevertheless liable for the money it received for the bonds. The court said: "While the bonds are void, the holder of them can fall back upon the original transaction and recover. If he has loaned money to the municipal corporation which it had authority to borrow, he can recover it in a proper action. The want of power in such a case merely affects the form of security issued to evidence the loan."

In Ampt v. Cincinnati (1896) 3 Ohio N. P. 184, the rule is stated that where bonds issued by a city are invalid because formalities provided by the statute are not complied with, the purchaser may recover from the city the amount paid for the bonds, of which it received the benefit.

In Rainsburg v. Fyan (1889) 127 Pa. 74, 4 L.R.A. 386, 17 Atl. 678, it is held that where bonds issued by a borough were invalid for failure to comply with the formalities of the statute, a purchaser thereof may recover from the city the amount of the proceeds for which it received benefit.

In New Haven v. Weston (1913) 87 Vt. 7, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 92, 86 Atl. 996, it is held that where the treasurer of a town is without authority to borrow money in behalf of the town, instruments representing loans made to him as treasurer are invalid, but the amount actually paid therefor is recoverable from the town to the extent that the latter received the benefit of the money. The court said that if it appeared, however, that the money was not applied to legitimate purposes of the town, the latter is not liable for the amount paid the treasurer for notes of the town, issued without authority.

In Paul v. Kenosha (1867) 22 Wis. 266, 94 Am. Dec. 598, it is held that where void bonds are issued by a city, the proceeds thereof may be recovered by the purchaser in an action for money had and received. The court deals with the question as though the city still retained the money. But in Thomson v. Elton (1901) 109 Wis. 589, 85 N. W. 425, referring to Paul v. Kenosha, it is said that in that case the money was obtained as a consideration for the sale of bonds previously made for another purpose, issued therefor, and thereafter acquired by the municipality. The reissue of the bonds was illegal, though, as supposed, for a legitimate purpose, and the money was used for such purpose. It is said that the implied promise upon which recovery was sustained arose not from the loan of money to the municipality, nor from the mere illegality of the means used to obtain it, but from the fact that the city, having possession of money to which it had no legal right, used the same for lawful municipal purposes.

In Thomson v. Elton (Wis.) supra, it was held that although a loan of money to a township was invalid because it was without authority to negotiate the loan, nevertheless, an action for money had and received could be maintained to recover the money received by the township and applied by it to a legitimate township purpose. The court said that "municipalities are bound by moral obligations, as well as individuals, and that where, in case of the latter, such an obligation will give rise to a legal liability, it may have the same effect as to a municipality; that if a municipality obtains money of a person by an illegal sale of property to him, or an illegal contract of some kind, not expressly prohibited by law nor tainted by moral turpitude, so that a court, on grounds of public policy, will not recognize it, or the relations growing out of it, to grant relief, and such person acts in good faith in parting with his money, believing the same to be for the benefit of the municipality, and the latter uses the money for its legal and legitimate purposes, to that extent the law will imply a promise to return the same, upon which an action for money had and received will lie. Justitia nemini neganda est applies even to a person dealing with a public corporation."

b. Where proceeds are used for purpose ultra vires the general powers of corporation.

By the weight of authority, even where the invalidity of the instrument is due to the failure of the municipality strictly to comply with nonessential statutory formalities in contracting the indebtedness, the money paid for the instrument cannot be recovered unless it is made to appear that the money was actually received by the proper municipal authorities and used for a purpose within the powers of the municipality to appropriate money for.

In Agawam Nat. Bank v. South Hadley (1880) 128 Mass. 503, a town was held not liable for money received by its treasurer upon negotiable instruments of the town, although he used the proceeds in paying debts of the town. It appeared that while the town had authority to borrow money in a certain way, in making the loans in question, such statutory method was not pursued. Upon the question of the liability of the municipality under such circumstances for money received by its treasurer and applied by him in extinguishing indebtedness of the town, the court said: "The plaintiff contends that it is entitled to recover upon the last count in the declaration for money had and received; and, at the trial, offered to show that the money paid or credited to the town treasurer upon the notes in suit was used by him in the payment of debts due from the town. This evidence was properly rejected. It fails to show that the money was received by the town in its corporate capacity, or that the act of the treasurer in applying it to the payment of its debts was ever authorized or ratified by the town. The difficulty is, that the money was paid to one who had no authority as treasurer or as agent of the town to receive it in the name of the town and apply it to the payment of town debts. If a town could be held in an action for money had and received, under such circumstances, then the purpose of the second and third sections of the statute would be wholly defeated. It makes no difference that the treasurer used this specific money in payment of the town debts. There is nothing to show any appropriation of such payments by the town to its own use, or any ratification of the act. The money in the hands of the treasurer did not belong to the town. For all that appears, funds may have been previously supplied by the corporation from other sources for the payment of these very debts. The relations of the treasurer to the town are not disclosed; he may then have been, and may now be, a defaulter to more than the amount of the alleged payments. The treasurer is an independent accounting officer. . . . If he applies money unlawfully obtained to the payment of town debts, that fact alone creates no liability on the part of the town to refund the money to the party from whom it was obtained."

In Brown v. Newburyport (1911) 209 Mass. 259, 95 N. E. 504, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 495, it was held that notes issued by a treasurer of the city were invalid because they were issued without the express approval of the finance committee, as required by the town council in authorizing the issuance of certain notes. It appeared that the proceeds of these notes were placed by the treasurer to the credit of the city in its bank account, and were at once checked out by him to cover his defalcations. Under these circumstances, the city was held not liable for the amount paid for the notes. The court said: "The liability of the defendant on the count for money had and received is also urged. The check with which this note and the others of even date were bought, was made to the order of the defendant, deposited in its bank account, and immediately used by the treasurer to cover his defalcations. If the note had been valid in the hands of the holder, the purchaser would not be answerable for the application of the purchase money. But this note was not a binding obligation of the defendant. So far as the city was concerned, the check was a voluntary payment without its knowledge. The fact that it was deposited in its bank account is not enough to charge the defendant with liability."

In Watson v. Huron (1899) 38 C. C. A. 264, 97 Fed. 449, it is held that where invalid city warrants were issued to secure money for unlawful purposes, and the funds were applied to this purpose, no equity arose in favor of the purchaser of the warrants, entitling him to recover from the city the amount he paid therefor.

In Long v. Lemoyne (1908) 222 Pa. 311, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 474, 71 Atl. 211, it was held that even though a warrant issued by a borough is invalid because the holder was a member of the board, the borough having received and used the money for legitimate purposes, the holder is entitled to recover the amount he paid it for the warrant. To the same effect is First Nat. Bank v. Goodhue (1913) 120 Minn. 362, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 84, 139 N. W. 599, in which it appeared that an officer of the purchaser of the warrant was a member of the village board which issued it.

This section deals with cases involving instruments of indebtedness void because the corporation issuing the same was wholly without power to issue the instrument, or, in issuing it, violated public policy or statute, or failed to follow the requirements prescribed by statute as a condition to the existence of the power.

The courts are generally astute in their efforts to hold public corporations liable for money received on invalid instruments. But due effect is also given to provisions restricting the power of public corporations to contract indebtedness, and no implied promise will be raised against the corporation in cases where the deviation is of such a character that the implication would operate to defeat the protective purpose of statutes imposing upon municipalities the duty of following a prescribed method as a condition to the power to contract indebtedness. Thomas v. Richmond (1871) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 349, 20 L. ed. 453; Litchfield v. Ballou (1885) 114 U. S. 190, 109 L. ed. 132, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; Morton v. Nevada (1890) 41 Fed. 582; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Johnson City (1900) 49 L.R.A. 123, 40 C. C. A. 58, 99 Fed. 668; Geer v. School Dist. (1901) 49 C. C. A. 539, 111 Fed. 682; Bluthenthal v. Headland (1901) 132 Ala. 249, 90 Am. St. Rep. 904, 31 So. 87; McPherson v. Foster Bros. (1876) 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215; McCurdy v. Shiawassee County (1908) 154 Mich. 550, 118 N. W. 625; Hackettstown v. Swackhamer (1874) 37 N. J. L. 191; Davis v. Stokes County (1876) 74 N. C. 374 (bonds issued in violation of public policy).

In Bluthenthal v. Headland (1901) 132 Ala. 249, 90 Am. St. Rep. 904, 31 So. 87, the rule is stated that a corporation cannot make a contract which is prohibited by ordinance or by statute, and that if such a contract is entered into by a municipality or its officers, and money or other property is furnished under it, the city is not bound, although the money or property may have been used by it.

However, in the reported case (HENDERSON v. REDMAN, ante, 346) it is held that where bonds issued by a city are invalid because the law under which they were issued was unconstitutional, and the bonds were paid for by a check payable to the city, the purchaser is entitled to recover from the city the amount of the check, even though the check was wrongfully indorsed by a city official, or delivered to someone to whom the city was not justly indebted. Followed in Henderson v. Winstead (1919) — Ky. —, 215 S. W. 527.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Goodhue (1918) 120 Minn. 362, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 84, 139 N. W. 599, it appeared that money was borrowed by a village upon warrants issued by it to raise funds for the construction of a fire and jail building. The warrants were invalid because not authorized by vote of the electors, as required by law. Notwithstanding this invalidity, the village was held liable for the money it received and used for the purpose mentioned. The court said: "The money was loaned to the municipality by plaintiff in good faith. It was paid into the village treasury, and subsequently expended for a purpose authorized by law. The forms of law were not complied with in effecting the loan, and the contract was invalid for that reason. Yet the village received the money, and ought in equity and good conscience to return it. And, though we have held that the doctrine of ultra vires is applied to municipal corporations with greater strictness than to private corporations, the doctrine really has no application to the case. If the question was whether the contract was valid, the decision necessarily would be that it was not. This action proceeds upon that theory. In that view the express contract disappears, because unauthorized, and the rule of implied liability takes its place. We are unable to assign a good reason for differentiating between the private and the municipal corporations as respects the rule of justice and common honesty. The private corporation in a case of this kind would not be heard to dispute its liability, nor should a public corporation be permitted to do so where, as in the case at bar, there is no question of fraud or collusion, and no concerted purpose between the village officers and plaintiff intentionally to evade or violate the law."

In Thomas v. Richmond (1871) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 349, 20 L. ed. 453, the facts were that the city of Richmond issued negotiable notes with the intent that they should circulate as money. This act was contrary to public policy as well as statute. Under these circumstances it was held that the owner of the notes could not recover from the city for the money it had received for the notes. In so holding, the court distinguished between the liability in this regard of a private and a public corporation. Conceding that a private corporation would be held liable under similar circumstances, the court said that "in the case of municipal and other public corporations, another consideration intervenes. They represent the public, and are themselves to be protected against the unauthorized acts of their officers and agents, when it can be done without injury to third parties. This is necessary in order to guard against fraud and speculation. Persons dealing with such officers and agents are chargeable with notice of the powers which the corporation possesses, and are to be held responsible accordingly. The issuing of bills as a currency by such a corporation without authority is not only contrary to positive law, but, being ultra vires, is an abuse of the public franchises which have been conferred upon it; and the receiver of the bills, being chargeable with notice of the wrong, is in pari delicto with the officers, and should have no remedy, even for money had and received, against the corporation upon which he has aided in inflicting the wrong. The protection of public corporations from such unauthorized acts of their officers and agents is a matter of public policy in which the whole community is concerned. And those who aid in such transactions must do so at their peril.

According to these principles no recovery could have been had against the city, either on the bills themselves or on a claim for money had and received. It was against the law of the state to issue them. It was a penal offense in both the person who paid and the person who received them, and they were issued by a municipal corporation which had no power, and which was known to have no power, to issue them."

In Litchfield v. Ballou (1885) 114 U. S. 190, 29 L. ed. 132, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820, it is held that where bonds issued by a city were void because representing a debt in excess of the constitutional limit on the power of the city to contract indebtedness, no implied contract or equity can be raised against the city on the ground that it received the money and used the same for a public benefit, such as the construction of a waterworks system.

In Morton v. Nevada (1890) 41 Fed. 582, it appeared that bonds were issued by a city in violation of the constitutional inhibition against municipal corporations loaning their credit to any private corporation unless authorized by a two-thirds vote of the qualified voters. The larger portion of the proceeds of the bonds was turned over to a railroad company and the balance used for various purposes incident to the government of the town. It was held that the money received by the town for the bonds was not recoverable by the purchaser. The court said: "If the principle of an implied promise to pay is applicable in this case, how is the constitutional inhibition to be made effectual? Its object being, as declared by the expounders, both state and Federal, of this Constitution, to prevent taxing the people without their consent first had thereto, how can it be reached, if this suitor prevails? The result to the taxpayer is the same, whether he be taxed on the expressed contract in the bond, or on a contract arising by implication. What substance is there in the constitutional bulwark of protection, if its barriers are to be removed when the purchaser of the forbidden claim comes in the form of a suitor for money had and received, rather than in the action of indebitatus assumpsit? It is the cause of action, rather than the form of action, which determines the right. In either case, the constituent is taxed to pay the judgment. Such a distinction would sacrifice substance to form, and its practical result, inevitably, would be a nullification of the Constitution. What the law forbids municipal bodies to do directly should not be permitted by indirect methods."

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Johnson City (1900) 49 L.R.A. 123, 404 C. C. A. 58, 99 Fed. 663, the purchaser of municipal bonds who purchased the same in the market for full value was held not entitled to recover from the municipality the money paid for the bonds, the latter having been unlawfully issued to a foreign railroad company in violation of a statute permitting aid only to domestic companies. It appeared that the only benefit which the municipality received from the bonds was that a railroad was constructed through it, and a depot was constructed on the ground purchased by the municipality for the railroad company.

In McPherson v. Foster Bros. (1876) 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215, it appeared that bonds issued by a school district to raise funds for the construction of a schoolhouse were invalid because creating an indebtedness exceeding the debt limit of the district. Under these circumstances, it was held that the town could not be held on an implied contract for the amount it had received for the bonds in excess of the debt limit. To the contention that if the bonds were void and the city had received value, it would be liable to pay back what it had received from innocent persons, or else the provision of the Constitution would operate to ensnare and defraud those who dealt with it, the court replied that "this view presents the suggestion of an ingenious plan for setting at naught the provision of the Constitution of the state under consideration. It is commended on the ground that, if the Constitution be enforced so as to cure the evil from which it is intended to protect the people of the state, it would operate to ensnare and defraud those who deal with political corporations. In such a case, according to the sentiment of the above quotation, the Constitution becomes an instrument of fraud, and on that ground may be violated. It must be confessed that it is a novel thought, to disregard the supreme law of the state because it operates to ensnare and defraud innocent persons. The error of the quotation is based upon a partial view of the rights of those who are called innocent purchasers, and want of attention to the object and purpose of the constitutional restriction in question."

In McCurdy v. Shiawassee County (1908) 154 Mich. 550, 118 N. W. 625, it appeared that the county treasurer, acting under order of the board of supervisors, issued negotiable notes which were negotiated to the plaintiff, and the proceeds were received and placed to the credit of the county. The board of supervisors was without authority to borrow money to defray the current expenses of the county, and such expenses were required to be raised by taxation. Under these circumstances, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, on implied contract, the money the county had received on the notes. There was no specific evidence that the county ever used the money for county purposes, but the court said that, as it viewed the case, the question as to whether or not the county had actually applied the funds to county purposes was not of material significance, and added: "In cases where equitable reasons are urged for the purpose of placing liability upon a municipality, consideration of the rights and interests of those most seriously interested must not be lost sight of. The taxpayer is entitled to the protection of all constitutional and statutory restrictions. In the aggregate he is the public for whose benefit the municipality exists, and which bears all the burdens put upon it, but which is not consulted when such burdens, as in this case, are assumed. In the case at bar the record shows that three times the electors have, at special elections, refused to vote to bond the county to pay floating indebtedness, which includes the amount in suit. Whether this was done before or after the notes in suit became due is immaterial. In the only constitutional way provided these electors have repudiated the illegal acts of the officers of the county. If this court should undertake to say that this indebtedness, admittedly illegal, must be paid by this county, it will practically declare the restrictions above mentioned to be inoperative, and subject the treasuries of all the municipalities of this state to the rapacity of designing and dishonest officials, leaving no protection whatever against recklessness, extravagance, crime, and bankruptcy. Such holding would be contrary to the spirit of previous decisions of this court, and against public policy."

In Hackettstown v. Swackhamer (1874) 37 N. J. L. 191, it is held that where a town was without authority to borrow money for its current expenses, no implied liability could be raised against it for the proceeds of notes issued by it, although such proceeds were used for this purpose. The court said that it did not add anything to the right to enforce the notes "that the money which it represents, and which was borrowed, has been expended in behalf of the corporation for legitimate purposes. The argument on this head was that, as the money had gone for the benefit of the corporation, the law, upon general principles, would compel its repayment. If this is so, then the rejection of an implied power to borrow is of little avail. The doctrine, although repudiated in the abstract, would be ratified in the concrete. If this contention is tenable, it is impossible to close the eye to the fact that the loan, although held illegal and void in its inception, would thus, by a subsequent act, be rendered valid and enforceable. To style it, as was done in the argument, money had and received, would not change the real nature of the transaction. To permit a recovery of it in this secondary form would be, virtually and in truth, to effectuate a loan, and all the evils attendant on the power to borrow money in an unrestricted form would supervene. And it is to be noted that it is altogether a fallacy to argue that the law will raise an implied promise to repay the money after it has been used. The impediment to such a theory is, that the corporation has not the competency to make the promise thus sought to be implied. An express promise to the effect contended for would be illegal, and, therefore, clearly, the law will not create one by implication. It is not the case of a principal using money borrowed by his agent without authority, but it is the case of a principal who is incapacitated by law from borrowing, and who, therefore, cannot legalize the act, either directly or by circuitry. Perhaps a parallel instance would be presented in case of a loan to a married woman at common law, the money being used by her. Her promise to repay the loan would be void; and, from the fact of her having made use of the money, no implied promise in law could be deduced."

It is the general rule that where the original purchaser of the invalid instrument of indebtedness of a public corporation is entitled to recover of the corporation the money he paid it for the invalid instrument, a subsequent holder of the instrument is likewise entitled to recover this amount. Louisiana v. Wood (1880) 102 U. S. 294, 26 L. ed. 153; Gause v. Clarksville (1800) 1 McCrary, 78, 1 Fed. 353; Geer v. School Dist. (1901) 49 C. C. A. 539, 111 Fed. 682; Gilman v. Fernald (1905) 72 C. C. A. 675, 141 Fed. 941; Waitz v. Ormsby County (1865) 1 Nev. 370.

It has, however, been held that even though the original purchaser of invalid bonds issued by a municipality might be entitled to recover from the municipality the money it had received from him therefor, a subsequent purchaser of the bonds is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the original holder in this respect, and hence, he cannot recover from the municipality the money it had received for the bonds. German Ins. Co. v. Manning (1899) 95 Fed. 597. To the same effect, on the ground of lack of privity between municipality and subsequent holder, is Henderson v. Winstead (1919) — Ky. —, 215 S. W. 527.

In Gause v. Clarksville (1879) 5 Dill. 168, Fed. Cas. No. 5,276; Gause v. Clarksville (1800) 1 McCrary, 78, 1 Fed. 353, it is held that a bona fide holder of bonds can recover as assignee of the holder of the original demand to the same extent that the latter would be entitled to recover.

In Coquard v. Oquawka (1901) 192 Ill. 355, 61 N. E. 660, refunding bonds were held invalid because issued to pay an invalid series of bonds. To the contention by the holders of the refunding bonds that a recovery should be allowed in their behalf on the common counts on the original bonds or indebtedness, the court, in denying the contention, replied that the municipality was never indebted to these bondholders unless as assignees of the bonds issued, and it never promised to pay them except as holders of negotiable bonds payable to bearer.

In Ironwood v. Wickes (1904) 93 App. Div. 164, 87 N. Y. Supp. 554, the doctrine is stated that a purchaser of city bonds from a broker, which are subsequently adjudicated invalid, is entitled to rescind his contract of purchase and recover from the city the amount he paid for the bonds, provided he returns them to the city. In this case such relief was denied on the ground of the failure of the bondholder to tender all the bonds he had received. But in Paul v. Kenosha (1867) 22 Wis. 266, 94 Am. Dec. 598, it is held that where city bonds are invalid, the purchaser is entitled to recover the amount paid the city for them and it is immaterial that he does not offer to return the bonds. It is assumed in this case that the bonds were part of the record of the case and so remained; and it is suggested that if the city had expressed a desire for their return after the court had held them to be invalid, the request doubtless would have been complied with.

V. Remedy.

An action for money had and received is a proper remedy to recover of a public corporation money it had received for invalid securities and appropriated to some legitimate corporate purpose.

Louisiana v. Wood (1880) 102 U. S. 294, 26 L. ed. 153; Gause v. Clarksville (1800) 1 McCrary, 78, 1 Fed. 353; Bangor Sav. Bank v. Stillwater (1892) 49 Fed. 721; Dodge v. Memphis (1892) 51 Fed. 165; Gilman v. Fernald (1905) 72 C. C. A. 675, 141 Fed. 941; Waitz v. Ormsby County (1865) 1 Nev. 370; Thomson v. Elton (1901) 109 Wis. 589, 85 N. W. 425.

It has been held that a bill in equity is not the proper remedy to obtain a money decree against the city for money it received from invalid bonds. The court said that the action for money had and received is the usual and adequate remedy in such cases where the claim is well founded, and the judgment at law would be the exact equivalent of what is prayed for in the bill in equity. Litchfield v. Ballou (1885) 114 U. S. 190, 29 L. ed. 132, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820. But where some equitable relief is sought in addition to a mere money decree for the amount the municipality has received and appropriated to legitimate corporate purposes, equity jurisdiction may be invoked. For example, in Everett v. Independent School Dist. (1900) 102 Fed. 529, s. c. subsequent appeal (1901) 109 Fed. 697, it is held that a bill in equity will lie in behalf of the holder of bonds issued by a municipal corporation for a public improvement where the bonds are invalid because exceeding the debt limit, and a decree will be entered against the municipality for the amount it received for the bonds of which it received the benefit within the debt limit, and said amount will be apportioned among all the holders of the bonds that have been made parties to the bill. To the same effect is Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Lyon (1899) 95 Fed. 325.

And in Chelsea Sav. Bank v. Ironwood (1904) 66 C. C. A. 230, 130 Fed. 410, it appeared that a city issued bonds for lawful purposes, but the bonds were defective, not from lack of power to issue the same, but because of the failure to exercise the power in a regular way. The bonds were issued to a broker, who paid the city only a portion of the proceeds. Under these circumstances, it was held that equity had jurisdiction to determine the amount which the city had received on the bonds and hence should repay, and to divide this sum among all the holders of the bonds. A bill in equity in behalf of all these holders was equitable in that it was an attempt to reach funds held by the city in trust for the holders of the bonds. A. G. S.

GEORGE E. HARRIS

v.

MICHIGAN MUTUAL HAIL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(207 Mich. 182, 173 N. W. 533.)

Insurance — against injury to fruit — fertilized blossom.

1. Insurance against damage or loss to fruit by hail covers injury to fertilized blossoms which prevents their maturing into fruit.

[See note on this question beginning on page 373.]

Damages — injury to growing fruit — basis of determination.

2. The injury to growing fruit by hail may be determined by the jury from the difference in yield of the injured trees and protected trees in the same or neighboring orchards, the usual yield in the injured orchard, and the cost of picking, packing, and marketing the crop.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1820.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Van Buren County (Des Voignes, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a hail insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kinnane, Black, & Leibrand for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. J. Barnard and Earl L. Burhans, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff suffered a loss to growing fruit within the meaning of the policy issued to him by the defendant.

Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 435; Providence Jewelry Co. v. Bailey, 159 Mich. 285, 123 N. W. 1117.

The damages were certain and capable of legal ascertainment.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff made written application to defendant for membership and for "indemnity against damage or loss to growing grain, fruit, and other farm products, . . . $1,000 on 112 acres of fruit, on section 20, Lawrence township, Van Buren county, Michigan," from noon of the 25th of May, 1915. The policy issued upon this application recites that plaintiff "has this 25th day of May, 1915, become a member" of the defendant company, and "has insured in said company against loss or damage to growing grain, fruit, and other farm products by hail to the amount of $1,000, from noon of the 25th day of May, 1915." The premises and specification of the insurance are as stated in the application; namely, "$1,000 on 112 acres of fruit, section 20, Lawrence township. . . ." The undertaking of the company is "to make good unto the said insured . . . all such loss or damage, not exceeding the amount insured, as shall happen by hail to the property above named, and more specifically described in the application on file, . . . which is hereby made a part of this contract, from the 25th day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, . . . the said loss or damage to be estimated according to the actual cash value at the time the same is adjusted. . . ."

The policy was in force May 8, 1916, on which day a violent hailstorm occurred at the plaintiff's farm. Plaintiff then had on section 20 about 2,000 bearing fruit trees from fourteen to forty years old, apple and pear trees. He notified the defendant that he had sustained a loss by the hailstorm. Officers of the defendant visited the orchards. There was some correspondence. Finally, after an attempt had been made to adjust the loss, and on October 16, 1916, defendant wrote plaintiff a letter, signed by its secretary, the pertinent portions of which are: "We will say in regard to your claim for damages by hail on May 8, 1916:

"First, that blossoms are not fruit, and hence are not covered by the policy.

"Second, that on your pear orchard, on which you claimed 50 per cent loss, did not show to as good fruit men as are in Van Buren county any loss by hail. So if any loss occurred to your crops, it was from something besides the hail of May 8, 1916."

In September, 1917, plaintiff filed his declaration in this cause, with a bill of particulars. Defendant pleaded the general issue. The cause came on to be tried in February, 1918. Plaintiff offered, defendant did not offer, testimony. There was a motion by defendant for a directed verdict upon the grounds: (1) That plaintiff had shown no injury to any property covered by the policy, namely, growing fruit; (2) that the plaintiff "has failed to show any damages that could be submitted to a jury at this time, all damages, from whatever cause they may have occurred, or whether they occurred or not, being uncertain, speculative, and contingent."

There was a verdict for plaintiff for $1,056.60, upon which judgment was entered. The grounds asserted in the motion for a directed verdict are those urged here for a reversal of the judgment.

Upon the first point defendant, appellant, presents the question in this way:

"Whether or not," it says, "the incorporators had in mind the line of demarcation where the protection would commence, there certainly is a line somewhere, and that line must be ascertained from the language they used. If we say 'growing fruit' includes blossoms, then it is by a hair's breadth to the next station and includes fruit buds. Horticulture teaches and the evidence shows that the fruit of this year is produced from buds grown last year. Therefore damage to this year's fruit buds may have a tendency to damage next year's fruit crop. Having gone that far, it is only a very short step to the next station, by claiming that, inasmuch as damage to fruit buds is proof of damage to fruit, proof of damage to leaf buds ought to be admitted as proof of damages to fruit on the theory that damage to the foliage has a tendency to damage the fruit crop, present or future. This line of reasoning could be continued, like the rhyme of 'The House that Jack Built,' to include future damage to foliage, damage to the limbs of the trees, then to the trunk, then to the soil from which the trees draw their sustenance, etc.

"It must be clear that these farmers intended mutually to insure another against loss or damage to some kind of growing fruit and grain; not something that might or might not develop into growing fruit and grain.

"To determine what the contract is we must resort to the language used in the writing. There is no parol testimony from which assistance may be had in the construction, and whatever that construction is found to be, the parties must be held to be bound by it."

It refers to the Century Dictionary, the New International Encyclopedia, and to the opinion of a Federal court (Nix v. Hedden (C. C.) 39 Fed. 109, id., 149 U. S. 304, 37 L. ed. 745, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881) for a definition of the word "fruit." With respect to these definitions it is said:

"It will be observed that one element tenaciously present in all these definitions is the element of seeds. We find no comprehensive definition of the term 'fruit' which does not contain the element of 'seed.' We can then say that unless the blossoms contain seed they would not be fruit within the purview of the policy.

"There is no evidence that any of those blossoms or fruit buds contain seed resulting or contained in a pollenized ovary which develops into the core and obtains the result of proper fertilization—seed.

"Pollen is referred to by some of the witnesses as seed, but pollen is not the seed mentioned in the definitions. The stamens which contain the pollen are part of the blossom (the leaves and carpels), and are never contained in the growing or ripened fruit. The seeds of fruit have such a well-known meaning that no one can be mistaken as to what is meant when it is said that one of the constituent elements of fruit is seed, contained in and covered by the juicy, pulpy product of a tree or plant.

"This would seem to be the only logical place to draw the line. The policy covers when the embryo apple is sufficiently advanced so that the presence of seed is susceptible of proof. Until then five sixths of the blossoms may not be fertilized, and those not fertilized would, of course, never develop into fruit.

"To hold the other policyholders liable for damages to blossoms that would never have developed even into a fertilized embryo apple was certainly not within the contemplation of the incorporators. It would be doing violence to their language to so hold."

Counsel for appellees, directing attention to the fact that in the policy the words "growing fruit" are employed to describe the risk insured, refers to the lexicographers and to botanists for definitions of "growth," "grow," "growing," and to Black's and Bouvier's dictionaries for a definition of "growing crop," and they say that anything that is developing is growing, and: "We claim fruit is growing fruit any time after the ovary within the blossom is pollenized, or is impregnated, as it were. From that point life begins, and from then to maturity it is merely in its stages of growth. True, a bare blossom is but a possibility. The ovary of the blossom contains what we call ovules. On receiving the pollen it fertilizes and the ovules become seeds. Where fruit is spoken of as a ripened ovary, we find botanists using this word in the sense of a pollenized or impregnated ovary."

Upon the other point the defendant, appellant, says in the brief in concluding the argument: "In this case there were no damages whatever proved. There was no proof that the blossoms claimed to have been injured had been far enough advanced to have even developed into embryo fruit. There is absolutely no proof of any kind or character as to how many bushels less the plaintiff probably received as a result of the hailstorm. There is not even any proof of that character to enable the jury to make any kind of a guess. What the jury did was to simply allow plaintiff the full face of the policy without having anything before them by which they could tell whether his damages were $1,000, $100, or $10,000. There was just as much proof as to any one of the above three sums as there was to either of the other two. . . ."

To this appellee replies, generally, that difficulty in ascertaining the damages is not a reason for refusing recovery, and that it does not follow that because their ascertainment is difficult they are therefore uncertain, remote, or speculative. He asserts that the damages may be measured by the difference between what his orchard affected by the hail produced and what other orchards in the immediate locality, not affected by the hail, produced. For the purpose of applying this rule, he contends that the record furnishes an ample basis. The rules given to the jury by the trial court we do not know, none of the charge of the court appearing in the printed record, and no complaint being made that the charge was erroneous.

Defendant is a mutual company, and its articles and by-laws are printed upon the policy which it issued to plaintiff. In the articles of association the "object" of the company is stated to be "to mutually insure the property of its members against loss or damage by hail on grain, fruit, and other farm products in such a manner as set forth in its by-laws."

The sixteenth article provides that the company insures its members against loss or damage by hail to growing crops,—on farm crops not to exceed $30 an acre; on fruit and garden truck not to exceed $100 per acre. "The rate of assessment on fruit and garden truck shall be treble what it is on farm crops." It is provided in the by-laws that a loss exceeding $100 shall not be adjusted before the maturity of the crop, and further provided that the association will not be liable for any loss or damage except that occasioned by hail.

The testimony tended to prove a rather severe hailstorm, the wood of trees and buildings being scarred, the blossoms knocked or cut from the trees; that plaintiff had in one field 550 apple trees, fifteen years old in 1916, in another about 800 apple trees, ten years old; that there were also 940 or 950 Keifer, 400 Bartlett, and 150 Angel pear trees, fourteen years old in 1916. On the 8th of May, 1916, the trees had been in blossom for a week or more, and the blossoms were dropping.

The secretary of defendant, called as a witness by the plaintiff, testified that he looked the orchards over June 14th, again in September, and a third time in October; that he estimated plaintiff's loss on his pears at from 300 to 350 bushels. To this effect, under date October 9, 1916, he wrote to plaintiff. He testified also that he never admitted plaintiff had any loss on his apples by hail. In what manner this witness estimated the loss of pears is not shown. No expert biologist or botanist gave testimony. A number of fruit growers, with large practical, but with little theoretical knowledge of the subject, gave testimony.

Plaintiff, on direct examination, testified in part as follows:

The hailstorm had the effect of knocking off the blossoms—that is, the fruit on the stem. It cut some of them. That morning I went out and found the blossoms cut off. Some was knocked off entirely, and some was cut off so you could cut it with shears, the little fruit, the fruit, you know; after the blossoms, you know how the fruit looks. After these white leaves, blossoms, drop off, there is your fruit right there, and it cut them off. They were all over the ground, it was covered.

Q. With things that you could identify as apples and pears?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I will ask you if, previous to the storm, you had examined blossoms out there with regard to whether or not pollenization or fertilization had taken place? You know what I mean when I speak of a stamen, don't you?

A. Yes.

Q. What was the condition of that practically on the end of the stamen—now I don't know what they call it?

A. Well, the way that I should call that, it was ripe; it was kind of a brownish; it had turned brown. When they first come out they are white, and then they turn kind of a yellowish color and grow a little darker.

Q. When they turn that color what is that an evidence of?

A. That the pollen is distributed.

On cross-examination he testified in part:

Friday, previous to the hail-storm, I opened up some of the buds to show Mr. High some of the inside, the fruit. You can see the fruit with the naked eye when they are blossomed. You could see the small apple. The apple would be about the size of a pin head. The blossoms were about half on. It showed the fruit on May 4th or 5th. I went out there to show him my prospect of the fruit crop. When I went out there Monday morning, I don't know as I saw a branch broke off from the trees, but I saw that my blossoms was cut. Some was knocked clear off from the main branch, and some was cut just as you cut it with shears. And they were laying all around on the ground with the fruit in the blossom. That I did notice that it knocked off the blossoms that had the fruit set in them and that they were laying on the ground. There are always more blossoms than a tree is capable of bearing apples or pears. Not all the blossoms were cut off. There was those left Monday morning that I thought at the time might make a crop, but in two or three days those stems had been hit with the hail and turned black. Then I knew I had a pretty heavy loss and got busy and wrote Garber. There are different things that might injure the blossom and kill the fruit, besides the breaking off of the stem. A cold, steady rain for a week will damage the blossoms, and a hard enough freeze will hurt apples.

Q. Did you at any time previous to the trial claim any damage on growing fruit? Was it not always damages to the blossom?

A. On growing fruit. I claim that the blossom, when it gets developed as far as they was developed, is growing fruit, because your fruit is in the—you can open it. I have opened probably thousands of them. I am always in the orchard seeing how they are coming, probably three or four days in a week. I go out in the orchard and open up these blossoms, and you can see it. If you have ever examined it yourself you can see it.

Q. Your position is that the blossom was injured and as a result the fruit would be injured?

A. Why, the fruit was injured when the blossom was injured; it is all the same thing; the fruit was there with the blossom.

Another witness, a fruit grower of long experience, testified:

From my observation I find an apple makes two kinds of growth, what we call wood growth and blossom growth. All apple buds are produced, practically all of them, on the end of a fruit spur which must be produced the season previous or some time before the blossom bud can be formed. Many other fruits have lateral fruit buds that grow on the previous year's growth, as a peach, but the apple grows on a fruit spur which is made in some previous year before that, and the bud for the ensuing year's crop—the bud for the 1916 crop would be completed during the growing season of 1915, and in the following spring, if nothing should happen to injure that bud in any way whatever, I think there could be no reason whatever why that bud shall not proceed to grow and make a bloom, and we believe, from my observation, that every perfect bloom, under right weather conditions, fertilizes. Later on, as the apple begins to grow, nature eliminates the weakest of these apples and thins them,—what we call the June drop,—and usually thins them down to the crop that the tree can mature.

Q. From your experience as an apple man, can you tell by the examination of the apple tree whether or not the apple has been fertilized?

A. Under normal conditions, under normal weather conditions, when the petals begin to drop naturally, the growth of the little apple is visible, at the time which the petals drop naturally.

Q. By the petal you mean the flower?

A. The white bloom of the apple. But my observation is that when the petal drops normally fertilization has taken place, and to prevent—the only thing that will prevent its making an apple or starting to grow, and until that dropping period what we call the June drop, would be some disease affecting the apple, or bad weather conditions; that might affect it. I think that apples may be sometimes fertilized and still injured later by bad weather conditions, but it would be very exceptional. As an incident, I might give the year, I think, of 1910, when our apples blossomed in April. On the 16th of April apple trees were in full bloom in our township. That is the year snow went off about the latter part of February and we sowed our oats in March, but that was very exceptional, and that year in May we had a very severe snowstorm and freeze from the Northwest, and it practically ruined the apple crop which was formed at that time. That is the only instance I know of being ruined from that cause after fertilization has apparently taken place or positively taken place.

Q. And after these petals have begun to drop normally the fruit is then growing?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it can be distinguished, you say?

A. Yes, sir. One point I would like to make. Every observer knows that a cluster of about six or seven, five to seven blossoms, in each apple bud, contains five to seven blossoms separately, and the center one of those seems to be a stronger bud than the others, and blossoms generally about two days earlier than the other blossoms open, and that center blossom usually fertilizes and the petals begin to drop by the time the others are in full bloom. And in our own orchard at home we had one crop of Jonathans, a very good crop that consisted entirely of apples formed from that one strong bloom in the center which blossomed two days previous to the others coming out, and the others were destroyed, simply withered up and turned brown, the petals did, and made no apples and didn't fertilize.

Q. From your observation as an apple man, can you tell by the examination of these petals on the tree whether or not fertilization has taken place; that is, supposing it has not taken place, explain what condition you find the petals in?

A. I find when weather conditions are so as preventing apples fertilizing that the petals remain on very much longer than in case fertilization has taken place, if the weather conditions are such and it is damp and the pollen can't circulate. I suppose that is the reason, but the petal will remain for a long period; I have known it to remain for ten days or two weeks.

Q. Under favorable weather conditions, where it is warm, how long does it take for fertilization to take place?

A. I think under perfect weather conditions that the apple will, at the expiration of two days after the apple is in full bloom, that the petals will begin to drop.

Other witnesses gave testimony to the same effect.

The articles of association and the policies issued by defendant seem to make no distinction between fruit and grain or other farm products. These members ought to have agreed among themselves concerning the state to which nature must have brought growing grain and fruit before liability would attach for its destruction, if they did not want the courts to give to the words employed by them a popular meaning. The argument of defendant that blossoms are not insured could be modified and used in the case of grain by saying that the growing wheat plant or corn plant was not insured. Suppose the property insured and destroyed was a field of wheat not headed out or a field of tomatoes with plants in blossom or having lost some or all of their blossoms. Without applying to the contracts of these mutually insuring members of the defendant corporation the rule that the language used by the insurer in the policy will be given a meaning favorable to the insured, we are justified in saying that in popular phrase wheat not headed and corn upon which no ears have formed are growing grain. It being so easy and manifestly so proper for defendant to state a rule, we shall attempt to state none for its guidance. We are contented to say that evidence was introduced which fairly tends to prove that the trees in plaintiff's orchards had on them growing fruit, fertilized growths, which in due course of time would have been apples and pears, for the destruction of which by hail the defendant, by the terms of its policy, may be liable.

The subject of the damages sustained by plaintiff has given us greater trouble. It must be assumed that the defendant did not intend merely to collect premiums and suffer no losses. Rarely will two orchards or two fields of growing grain, with different owners, be found where the soil, the exposure, the tillage are the same. The rule that to prove the extent of his loss by the crops secured by a neighbor whose orchard was untouched by the hail, the plaintiff must prove that in the orchards compared the soil, moisture, exposure, fertilization, spraying were the same, is not a workable one in such a case as this. Corporations like defendant have themselves made a practical rule for estimating damages to grain by hail which is (Barry v. Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Asso. 110 Iowa, 433, 437, 81 N. W. 692): "The loss in all cases shall be considered the difference between the amount grown on the damaged tract and a fair average of the same kind grown on an equal tract in the immediate neighborhood, where no damage was sustained."

In the case at bar the testimony for plaintiff tended to prove that there were in the immediate neighborhood orchards of pear and apple trees not affected by the hail and some trees in the plaintiff's orchards somewhat protected from the storm. The yield of the protected trees, the usual yield of the orchards themselves, the yield of fruit in the neighborhood orchards, these facts were laid before the jury. The cost of picking, packing, and marketing the crop was in evidence. We are not warranted in saying that the jury had before it no competent evidence of the damages sustained. We must assume that the court properly instructed the jury upon the subject. The court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for defendant.

ANNOTATION.

Construction of hail insurance policy.

This annotation is supplementary to that appended to Reeves v. National F. Ins. Co. 4 A.L.R. 1298, on the above question.

It will be observed that in the reported case (HARRIS v. MICHIGAN MUT. HAIL INS. CO. ante, 366), a policy insuring against damage or loss to fruit by hail was held to cover injury to fertilized blossoms which prevented their maturing into fruit, and it was further decided that the injury to the growing fruit by the hail might be determined by the jury from the differences in yield of the insured's trees and protected trees in neighboring orchards, the usual yield of the insured's orchard, and the cost of picking, packing, and marketing the crops.

A search has disclosed no subsequent decisions on the subject under consideration.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ohio County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to recover the balance of public funds in the hands of the defendant sheriff, alleged to be due plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Hubbard & Hubbard, for plaintiff in error:

A surety is bound only by his undertaking, according to its exact terms, and any change or varying of these terms by agreement between the creditor and the principal debtor, without the consent of the surety, releases the surety from liability.

Miller v. Stewart, 4 Wash. C. C. 26, Fed. Cas. No. 9,591, affirmed in 9 Wheat. 680, 6 L. ed. 189; Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 243, 11 N. E. 232; Com. v. Holmes, 25 Gratt. 771; 32 Cyc. 73.

The undertaking of the surety is to receive a strict interpretation, and is not to be extended beyond the fair scope of its terms.

Kirschbaum v. Blair, 98 Va. 35, 34 S. E. 895.

An extension of the time for the performance of a contract is such an alteration of it as releases the surety, if made without his consent.

Muskogee County, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917B, 977, 159 Pac. 655; 19 Cyc. 657.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of commissioners of Ohio county recovered a judgment against W. M. Clemens, ex-sheriff of said county, and the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, his surety, in an action on his official bond, and the surety brings this writ of error, claiming that it should have been discharged from liability, because a continuance of the case for thirty days was taken by agreement between the attorneys for plaintiff and the principal debtor, respectively, without its knowledge or consent.

Defendant Clemens was sheriff of Ohio county from the 1st of January, 1909, to the 31st of December, 1912. After his term of office ended, an audit was made of his accounts by J. H. Otto, under the direction of the state tax commissioner's office, which showed a balance of public funds in his hands due to the board of commissioners of Ohio county, and this action was brought to recover that balance. The items sought to be recovered are 15 per cent of the fees required to be paid to and collected by the sheriff as county treasurer, commissions improperly deducted on miscellaneous settlements, and interest. The action was begun by notice of motion for judgment.

The Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company of West Virginia, the surety, filed a special plea on the 23d of September, 1916, admitting its suretyship on the bond sued on, and alleging that, in disregard of its persistent demands upon plaintiff to proceed with due diligence to prosecute such claims as it might have against the sheriff, based on said bond, and in disregard of the court's order made on the 25th of May, 1916, referring the cause to a commissioner, and ordering the testimony to be taken and the commissioner's report completed and filed on the first day of the next term, which was the 5th day of September, 1916, plaintiff and the principal defendant agreed before that time, without the surety's knowledge or consent, to defer the taking of testimony until the next October, thus staying the proceedings for more than thirty days.

Neither party requiring a jury, and both parties agreeing thereto, all matters of law and fact were submitted to and decided by the court. On the 3d of December, 1917, it heard the cause upon the aforesaid special plea, general replication thereto, the commissioner's report, and exceptions thereto by defendant Clemens, and sustained his exceptions in respect to certain items, and found against the surety on the issue raised by its special plea, and rendered judgment against both principal and surety for $8,196.65, with interest thereon from the 1st of December, 1917, until paid.

After the cause was referred to a commissioner the prosecuting attorney, who was counsel for plaintiff, agreed with counsel representing the sheriff that the taking of testimony might be deferred until October following, for the reason, as then suggested by the attorney for said Clemens, that a great deal of time could be saved by thus allowing time to Mr. Welch, who had been chief deputy for said sheriff, to go over the audit made by the state; that in all probability defendant would admit a great many items therein charged, and thus dispense with the necessity of taking evidence to prove them. The effect of this continuance was to carry the case over the term at which the commissioner had been directed to file his report. The surety insists that the continuance was in effect an extension of time to the principal debtor, and, being granted without its consent, operated to discharge it from liability. We do not think so, for two reasons:

First, because it does not appear that the plaintiff consented, nor that the prosecuting attorney had authority to bind it by an agreement to extend time of payment.

Second, because a different rule respecting liability applies to a surety company, who becomes surety for another for a valuable consideration, than is generally applied to a mere voluntary surety.

The agreement between attorneys for the respective parties to continue the time for taking testimony was apparently for the purpose of expediting the hearing. As counsel for plaintiff, the prosecuting attorney had the right and implied authority to make such an agreement. Thornton, Attorneys at Law, p. 486. Stipulations between opposing counsel, necessary or incidental to the management of the suit, are within the implied authority of the attorney, and are binding on his client. 2 R. C. L. 989; 6 C. J. 702. While, generally speaking, an attorney at law has control over the conduct of a suit, and may bind his client by an agreement made in his interest to continue the case, he has no implied power to grant an extension of time of payment, nor will an unauthorized extension by him discharge a surety. Hall v. Presnell, 157 N. C. 290, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, 72 S. E. 985, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1298; Jerauld v. Trippet, 62 Ind. 122; Haselton v. Florentine Marble Co. (C. C.) 94 Fed. 701. Moreover, it does not appear that the continuance occasioned any loss to appellant.

A voluntary surety is a favorite of the law, and he is generally entitled to insist on the very letter of his contract. But the doctrine of strictissimi juris does not apply to corporations organized to enter into bonds or undertakings for a profit.

Although such companies sometimes call themselves surety companies, their business is essentially that of insurer, and their contracts, being usually expressed in terms prescribed by themselves, should be construed most strongly in favor of the obligee therein. 32 Cyc. 307.

An extension of time will not relieve a surety company on a bond, unless the extension exceeds the time limited in the bond for bringing suit thereon, nor unless the surety company is thereby made to suffer material harm. Philadelphia v. Fidelity & D. Co. 231 Pa. 208, 80 Atl. 62, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1085, and cases cited in note at page 1087; *Brown v. Title Guaranty & S. We affirm the judgment.

ANNOTATION.

Consenting to continuance or extension of time in action as releasing surety.

This note does not include bail bonds nor postponements of executions.

The few cases on this subject leave the matter in a somewhat indefinite situation.

The surety on a replevin bond was held to be discharged where the defendant in the replevin action entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to refer to arbitration a prior action of replevin between them, and also other matters in dispute between them, but not the second replevin suit, and agreed that all proceedings should in the meantime be stayed till the award should be made, which was stipulated to be published by a future certain time, which was afterwards further enlarged by the plaintiff and defendant, all without the knowledge of the surety. Bowmaker v. Moore (1819) 7 Price, 223, 146 Eng. Reprint, 954.

The sureties on a note were held to be released, where the payees entered into a written agreement with one of the principal obligors, by which it was stipulated that the time of payment of the note should be extended beyond the time specified, and additional security, in the shape of a deed of trust, was furnished to the payees of the note, and, in pursuance of the agreement, there was a continuance by consent of the attorney of the payees and the attorney of the principals by which the cause was adjourned from the fall term of one year to the spring term of the next. Wybrants v. Lutch (1859) 24 Tex. 309.

It was held that the surety on a debtor's relief bond was discharged where the attorney for the creditor, for a consideration, extended the time for the principal to make his disclosure beyond the six months stated in the bond, by adjournment of the hearing on the disclosure. The court said: "An attorney retained to manage a cause before any tribunal has authority to apply for a continuance or postponement of the trial or hearing; and he may make an agreement to effect that object, which will be binding upon his client." Phillips v. Rounds (1851) 33 Me. 357.

On the other hand, it will be seen that it is held in the reported case (OHIO COUNTY v. CLEMENS, ante, 373) that an attorney's consent to a continuance will not discharge a surety who is a surety company. The court in its opinion apparently rests its decision on two grounds: first, that an attorney, while having power to agree to continuances, has no implied power to agree to any valid extension of time of payment; second, that contracts of surety companies are to be construed most strongly in favor of the obligees. The official headnote expresses the deduction from the first ground that a continuance is not such an extension of time as will discharge a surety.

Where the court, on consent of one of a guardian's sureties, made an order that the guardian might retain the money of his ward until the further order of the court, he paying interest upon it at a special rate, it was held, in an action of the consenting surety against his cosurety for contribution, that the consent and order were no defense. Berton v. Anderson (1892) 56 Ark. 470, 20 S. W. 250, where the court said: "The court did not sustain towards Moore the relation of a creditor; but if its action could be regarded as having extended the time in which the law required him to pay or account for the money, the extension was for an indefinite period, and did not, for that reason, have the effect to discharge either of his sureties."

Where a decree provided that "by consent of parties, no decree is to be entered in these causes in favor of the plaintiff at this term," the court said: "It is not the case of a new contract or novation of the debt, so as to discharge the surety absolutely; but, if it discharges, it must be because it is mere indefinite indulgence. No consideration for this indulgence appears, and therefore, unless the fact that it is a consent of record changes it, the want of consideration prevents it from operating to tie the hands of the creditor, and therefore does not release the surety. . . . The most we can say is that such consent of record estopped the creditors from asking a decree that term of court. I do not know that it did that, as the parties might withdraw their consent with the court's leave; and the court, seeing that it was based on no consideration, if the other party were present, or on rule, would set it aside, on motion of creditor or surety, if justice required. It was a mere consent not to prosecute that term, and not releasing the attachments or changing the status of the cases for future efficacy. It was only a continuance. . . . Here, too, comes another consideration. If that consent continuance did bind the creditors to a continuance, it did not tie the hands of the surety from any legal steps he might take for his security; and the cases all say that, if what the creditor does does not stop the surety from steps to save himself, he is not released." The court further considered that no harm was done the surety. First Nat. Bank v. Parsons (1898) 45 W. Va. 688, 32 S. E. 271.

Where it was claimed that a surety on a note secured by mortgage was discharged by a provision in a decree of foreclosure that the sale should be postponed for sixty days, the court said: "But an extension by a creditor of the debt of the principal which will work a discharge of the surety without his consent must be made by the agreement of such creditor. There must be a binding agreement made by the creditor for an extension for a definite time, and supported by sufficient consideration, before there can be any discharge of the surety. . . . The giving of time in said decree for the sale of the land was done by the court, and not by the agreement of plaintiff, nor was it made upon any consideration." Kissire v. Plunkett-Jarrell Grocer Co. (1912) 103 Ark. 473, 145 S. W. 567.

It may be noted that a mere discontinuance of an advertisement of sale of real estate under a deed of trust does not exonerate a surety on the note secured thereby. Butler v. Gambs (1876) 1 Mo. App. 466. B. B. B.

Insurance — exception of loss in military service — public policy.

1. A provision in an insurance policy against liability for death while in the military service of the United States is not against public policy.

[See note on this question beginning on page 382.]

— death from pneumonia in camp.

2. Death from pneumonia while in a military camp is within an exception in a life insurance policy, of death while in the service of the Army or Navy of the government.

— waiver of exceptions — acceptance of premium.

3. Mere acceptance by an insurer of premiums, with knowledge that the in-

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Conway County (Priddy, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. P. Strait, for appellants:

An agent is presumed to be a general agent, with authority to act, until the contrary is shown, and knowledge of his limitations of authority must be brought home by the principal to the party who deals with such agent, and otherwise such principal will be liable for his acts, and the agent can bind his principal the same as if he was a general agent with general authority.

If in any negotiations or transactions with assured, after knowledge of the conditions, the company recognizes the continued validity of the policy, or acts based thereon, or requires the insured to do some act or incur some trouble or expense, forfeiture is waived.

Authority to solicit insurance, receive and write applications for insurance and forward the same to the general agent of the insurance company, and to receive and deliver policies and collect premiums would not empower the agent to waive certain provisions in the policy.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant instituted this action against appellee to recover on a life insurance policy issued by the latter on March 6, 1915, to Arl E. Miller, who died at Camp Beauregard, Louisiana, on December 26, 1917, while in the military service of our government. Death of the insured resulted from pneumonia. The facts of the case are undisputed, and the trial court decided that there was no liability under the policy, except to the extent of the small sum paid to the company by the insured as premiums.

The policy contained the following clause: "It is expressly provided that death while in the service in the Army or Navy of the government in time of war is not a risk covered at any time during the continuance or reinstatement of this policy, for any greater sum than the amounts actually paid to the company thereon."

There is another clause in the policy which reads as follows: "This policy shall be incontestable two years from its date, except for non-payment of premium calls, or death while engaged in or caused by violation of the law or while in the service of the Army or Navy of any government, which is not a risk covered at any time during the continuance or reinstatement of this policy for any greater sum than the amounts actually paid to the association thereon."

The application contained a clause similar to the one last quoted. The clauses quoted above are not entirely consistent with each other, in that the one first quoted provides for an exemption from liability on account of death of the assured while in the Army or Navy service of the government "in time of war," and the other two clauses contain much broader provisions, exempting the company from liability for death while in the Army or Navy of the government, without restriction as to it occurring during time of war. The death of the assured occurred while he was in the military service of this government during the period of the war with the Central Powers of Europe, and it is unimportant, therefore, to attempt to reconcile the apparently conflicting clauses, or to determine which of them controls.

It is suggested by learned counsel for appellant that the above-mentioned provisions, exempting the company from liability under the circumstances named, ought to be held void for the reason that it is against public policy to permit such

exception of loss in military service—
public policy.

contracts of insurance to be made, in that the tendency is to prevent voluntary enlistments in the Army or Navy of the government, or to induce the holder of such a policy to evade or resist involuntary enlistment under the Draft Laws. We do not think the argument is well founded. An insurance company has the right to select the particular risks it is willing to assume, and there is no public policy against a contract of this sort exempting the insurance company, in advance, from liability for death of the insured while in the military or naval service of the government. The stipulation does not provide for a forfeiture of the policy, but merely for an exemption from liability under certain circumstances and conditions. It holds out no inducements to the assured to refrain from enlistment in his country's service, and does not constitute, in any sense, an agreement not to enlist or to evade the Draft Law. No authorities are cited by counsel in support of the contention, and we are unable to find any cases in which the question has been raised. The subject of exemptions from liability on insurance policies in case of service in the Army or Navy is discussed by Mr. Joyce in his work on the Law of Insurance, vol. 4, § 2237, but there is no suggestion there by the author of any question of doubt about the validity of such a provision. There is likewise a discussion on the subject in Coolsey's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, vol. 3, pp. 227 et seq., but nothing is said by that author about the possibility of those provisions being held to be void. We find two cases on the subject, in one of which the insurance company was held not to be liable under such an exemption (La Rue v. Kansas Mut. L. Ins. Co. 68 Kan. 539, 75 Pac. 494), and in the other (Welts v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 48 N. Y. 34, 8 Am. Rep. 518) the company was held liable for the reason that the death of the insured did not fall within the terms of the exemption, as interpreted by the court rendering the decision. In each of the cases, the assured was in the service of the government during the pendency of war; but in one of the cases it was decided the assured was not in the military service, and that the case was, for that reason, not within the exemption.

The trial court was, therefore, correct in the present case, in holding that the death of the insured fell within the exemption clause set forth in the policy.

in camp.

The principal contention of counsel for appellant is that there was a waiver of the exemption provision of the policy. In support of that contention on the trial below, appellant introduced as a witness, Mr. Scroggins, who testified that he was the agent of the insurance company at Morrilton, where Arl E. Miller resided, and that he stated to Miller, in response to an inquiry by the latter, after he had enlisted in the Army, as to whether or not, under the terms of the policy, the full amount would be paid in the event of death while in that service, that he (witness) construed the policy to mean that there was only an exemption in case of death of the assured in battle, and that the exemption clause did not apply to death from natural causes. The exact statement of the witness was as follows: "He asked me if the policy would be good in event of his death in the service, and I told him that it was my construction of the war clause in this policy, if he died of natural causes, it would be paid, but if he died by violence, while in battle, it would not. I also called his attention to the Fulkerson claim as my conclusion of the matter. And he says, 'Well, if it won't be good, I don't want to pay any more, but if it will, I want to continue my policy,' and I told him it would be good in event of his death by natural causes. So one year's premium was paid to me a few days later, almost on the same spot of ground. . . . Mr. Ben Fulkerson had a policy. He volunteered in the service at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, in September, 1916, and this country was not at war at that time, and he died of contagious disease in the Army, and the company paid his claim."

The witness testified that he was the county agent for the company, and that his duties were to solicit insurance, forward applications to the home office of the company, and deliver policies sent to him from the home office for that purpose, and to collect the initial premiums on delivery of a policy. He also testified that he sometimes collected premiums on policies already delivered, but that this was generally for the convenience of the parties, though the company paid him a commission on all such collections.

It will be observed that the provision of the policy now under consideration is not for a forfeiture, but is merely an exemption from liability on account of death occurring under certain circumstances. It is not a case where acceptance of premiums with knowledge of the forfeiture constitutes recognition of the continued valid existence of the policy; nor does the case fall within the principle that a forfeiture is waived, where an insurance company, when it enters into a contract, has knowledge through any of its authorized agents, of facts which would work a forfeiture. People's F. Ins. Co. v. Goyne, 79 Ark. 315, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1180, 96 S. W. 365, 9 Ann. Cas. 373; Lord v. Des Moines F. Ins. Co. 99 Ark. 476, 138 S. W. 1008; Peebles v. Eminent Household, C. W. 111 Ark. 435, 164 S. W. 296.

There was no forfeiture provided for at all, but the company had, as before stated, the right to stipulate under what circumstances it should be liable. The assured had the right to pay the premium and continue the policy in force while he was in the military service of the government, notwithstanding the exemption of the company from liability for death occurring during the period of that service, and the mere acceptance by the company of the premium, with knowledge of the fact that the assured was in the military service of the government, did not constitute a waiver of the stipulation in regard to exemption. In other words, when the assured paid his premium, his policy was kept in force, and would have remained in force, if the assured had survived the period of his service in the Army.

Conceding, therefore, that the knowledge of Scroggins, the agent of the company, was the knowledge of the company itself, there was no waiver on account of acceptance of the premium, with knowledge of the fact that the assured was serving in the Army. The statement of Mr. Scroggins —waiver of exceptions—acceptance of

to the assured on the occasion mentioned by Scroggins as to his interpretation of the exemption clause of the policy was not binding on the company, for it was not done within the apparent scope of the agent's authority. There is not the slightest evidence that the statement was made for the fraudulent purpose of inducing Miller to pay the premium, or that it was not made in good faith in response to Miller's inquiry. It was only an expression, given in obvious good faith, of the personal opinion of the witness as to the proper construction of the language of the policy. Scroggins had no authority to issue policies, or to alter or interpret the terms thereof. The policy had already been issued and delivered more than two years before this conversation occurred, and the agent had no duty to perform with respect to the matter, and it was entirely beyond the apparent scope of his authority to advise the assured as to the legal effect of the various clauses in the policy. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 109 Ark. 324, 159 S. W. 1113.

Counsel rely especially on the case of Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112, 53 S. W. 49, where the court held that knowledge on the part of the company, at the time of the issuance of an accident policy, that certain risks necessarily pertained to the occupation and employment of the assured, constituted a waiver of a provision in the policy exempting the company from such liability. We think that decision has no application to the facts of the present case, for in that case the policy would have had no force at all, unless it embraced the risks mentioned in the exemption clause, and the knowledge of the company of the existence of facts which brought the circumstances of the assured within the exemption clause necessarily operated as a waiver, by treating the policy as being in force notwithstanding the facts which would render it inoperative. Here we have a case, as before stated, where the policy remains in force, notwithstanding the temporary existence of conditions — i. e., the service by the insured in the Army—which exempted the company from liability, and the mere acceptance of premiums with knowledge of that service did not constitute a waiver of the exemption.

Our conclusion is that the Circuit Court was correct in its decision, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Validity, construction, and effect of provisions in life or accident policy in relation to military service.

This annotation supplements that accompanying Kelly v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 A.L.R. 848, where the earlier cases on the subject are considered. A search has disclosed but two subsequent cases on the question.

In Malone v. State L. Ins. Co. (1919) — Mo. App. —, 218 S. W. 877, where the policy provided that if the insured should engage in any military or naval service, and should die "while so engaged, as the result of such service, or within six months thereafter," the liability should be limited to a return of the premiums paid, it was held, following Redd v. American Cent. L. Ins. Co. (1918) 200 Mo. App. 383, 207 S. W. 74 (set out at p. 850 of the prior annotation), that the insured entered the military service when he passed the required examination, took the oath, enrolled, and subjected himself to military orders, and, it appearing that he continued in such service until his death, it was held that there could be no question that he died "while so engaged;" but it was held that under the provision of the policy it devolved upon the insurer, in order to escape liability, not only to prove that the insured's death occurred while he was engaged in military service, but also that death resulted from, or was caused by, such service, and where the insurer introduced no evidence as to the cause of the insured's death, and the plaintiff's evidence only tended to show that the insured died while in military service, from an accidental gunshot wound from a gun in the hands of another soldier, it was held that the insurer had failed to prove that the insured's death was the result of his military service. The court distinguished the reported case (MILLER v. ILLINOIS BANKERS' LIFE ASSO. ante, 378) on the ground that the provision of the policy involved in that case was different, and said: "In that case the war risk clause exempted the insurer from liability 'provided that death, while in the service in the Army or Navy of the government in time of war,' should occur. The court very properly held that if the insured died while at a military training camp, after enlisting in the United States Army during the late war with Germany, there was no liability. But there was no further restrictive clause in that policy limiting the death while in military service only to such death as resulted from such service, as does the policy now in question. That case, therefore, is not in point."

In Myli v. American L. Ins. Co.

(1919) — N. D. —, — A.L.R. —, 175 N. W. 631, it appeared that the insured enlisted in the Navy during the World War, and was assigned to an institution in Minneapolis for training, and that while there he contracted influenza, from which he died in the city hospital. The insurer contested liability, except for a limited sum, claiming to be relieved from paying the face of the policy by a clause providing that, "if within five years from date hereof the death of the insured shall occur while engaged in military or naval service in time of war, without previously having obtained from the company a permit therefor, the company's liability shall be limited," but it was held that this provision did not, under the facts, exclude liability for the face of the policy; that such provision should be construed in connection with a clause providing for double indemnity in the event of accidental death not "resulting from military or naval service in time of war," and another clause providing for double indemnity, "excluding . . . injuries resulting from military or naval service in time of war," and that when so construed the provision exempted the insurer from liability for the face of the policy only where death was occasioned by an extra hazard, incident to military or naval service.

APPEALS by plaintiff and intervener from a judgment of the Superior Court for Contra Costa County (Barber, J.) in favor of plaintiff in part only, dismissing the action as to the defendant surety, and adjudging that intervener take nothing, in an action brought to recover an amount deposited with defendant Wells as bail in a certain cause. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles S. Peery for appellant Mundell.

Mr. E. B. Taylor in propria persona.
Messrs. T. D. Johnston, A. B. Tinning, Alfred C. Skaife, and Guy Le Roy Stevick for respondents.

Melvin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued as assignee of W. A. Mundell for $2,000 deposited with defendant Wells, who is ex officio clerk of the superior court of Contra Costa county, as bail in the case of the People, etc., v. R. B. Cradlebaugh. The corporation defendant is the surety on the official bond of Mr. Wells, and the intervener Taylor asserts an interest in the money by reason of an attachment and judgment against Cradlebaugh. The plaintiff and the intervener Taylor are the appellants.

Cradlebaugh was charged with a misdemeanor triable in the superior court. After his arrest he was released on cash bail of $2,000, deposited in that behalf by W. A. Mundell, who had borrowed the money for that purpose. He was preliminarily examined, was held to answer, and his bail was fixed at $2,000. At his request, the fund deposited at the time of his arrest was transmitted to the county clerk. Cradlebaugh was tried and convicted.

ed; was readmitted to bail pending sentence; and the money in the hands of Mr. Wells, as clerk of the court, was, by order of court, accepted as security for his due appearance for sentence.

Cradlebaugh appeared for sentence, as ordered, and his counsel in open court, not in his behalf but for those who had advanced the money in lieu of bail, sought to surrender him into custody, and asked for an order remitting the bail money "to the parties who put it up, and for the purpose of filing new bonds later on." The court did not act upon the suggestion of surrender, nor was there any ruling upon the motion to return the money. Cradlebaugh was arraigned and sentenced to imprisonment for one year in the county jail, and to pay a fine of $1,000.

After notice of appeal, the court, on request, fixed bail on appeal, the amount being $2,000. Counsel for the prisoner then asked that the bail theretofore deposited be exonerated. The court instructed him to draw the order and present it to the district attorney. Later in the day the district attorney asked for an order directing the clerk to apply $1,000 of the fund in his hands to the satisfaction of the fine imposed upon Cradlebaugh. After argument upon this matter, the court directed the clerk to satisfy that part of the judgment imposing a fine out of the money in his custody. He obeyed this order and offered the $1,000 remaining, after satisfaction of the fine, to Cradlebaugh. This sum, however, was sought to be attached in the hands of the clerk by Mr. Taylor, in an action brought by him against Cradlebaugh to recover $500 as a fee for his services as counsel in the criminal action. Mr. Taylor recovered a judgment against Cradlebaugh, which was in force at the time of the trial of the case at bar.

Upon these facts the superior court gave judgment for plaintiff against Mr. Wells, as clerk, for the sum of $1,000 remaining in his hands after satisfying the fine imposed upon Cradlebaugh. The court dismissed the action against the sureties on the clerk's bond and adjudged that the intervener take nothing.

Appellants, Mrs. Mundell and Mr. Taylor, contend that the offer to surrender Cradlebaugh into custody was sufficient to exonerate the bail; that the fund on deposit was not the property of the defendant in the criminal action, out of which a fine might be satisfied; and that such payment of the fine deprived the real owner of that amount without due process of law.

Even if appellants could uphold their declaration that the money deposited as bail was not, in the contemplation of law, the property of Cradlebaugh, but of the person who furnished it for that use, they could not prevail in this action against Wells, who, as county clerk and ex officio clerk of the superior court, only performed his duty as a ministerial officer of the court, acting under the order of the judge of said court, when he applied half of the fund to the satisfaction of the fine.

Money in court—action to recover—liability of clerk.

Regarding that portion of the fund, they can have no possible recourse against defendant Wells. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and could order the disposition of the money in custodia legis. If the clerk had disobeyed the order of the court in this case, he would have been guilty of contempt of court. A ministerial officer is protected and justified when acting under a process or order of a court possessing general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, in spite of any errors committed by the court issuing the process or giving the order. 22 R. C. L. 481.

But the court acted correctly, and fully within its powers, in making the order of which appellants complain. Section 1295 of the Penal Code provides for the deposit of money for the release from custody of a person held to answer. Section

1297 is as follows: "When money has been deposited, if it remains on deposit at the time of a judgment for the payment of a fine, the county clerk must, under the direction of the court, apply the money in satisfaction thereof, and after satisfying the fine and costs, must refund the surplus, if any, to the defendant."

It will thus be seen that in contemplation of law, so far as the criminal action is concerned, the money deposited for the purpose of insuring a defendant's appearance is his money, and the court is not required to protect the supposed rights of anyone who may have advanced it for him. There is no pretense that Cradlebaugh in the criminal action surrendered himself into custody. His counsel, in making the motion, was seeking to protect the rights of the person or persons who had advanced the money, as if bondsmen had appeared upon a written obligation. But persons who advance money in lieu of bail are not in the same position as sureties on a bond, and have no such rights.

—right to
principal.

When the defendant in the criminal action appeared for sentence, the counsel for Cradlebaugh, addressing the court, said: "Now if the court please, at this time, at the request of the bondsmen, I will ask for an order of court surrendering the defendant into custody, and for an order of the clerk remitting the bail money back to the parties who put it up, and for the purpose of filing new bonds later on."

The court then proceeded to pronounce judgment. From the foregoing it will be seen that there was no offer of the defendant in the criminal action to surrender himself "to the officer to whom the commitment was directed"—a prerequisite to the return of the bail money. Penal Code, § 1302. Therefore the court was not called upon to rule upon the motion to order Cradlebaugh into custody. Consequently, the money in the hands of the clerk was a fund remaining on deposit "at the time of a judgment for the payment of a fine." Under the statute (Penal Code, § 1297) there was but one correct method of disposing of half of it. The court adopted that method.

Appellant Mundell contends that the statute (Penal Code § 1297) is unconstitutional, in that it deprives of property, without due process of law, the person who advances the money for bail, by placing him in a different and less advantageous position than the surety on a bail bond.

Constitutional law—due process—application of cash
bail to fine.

There is no force in this contention. There is no constitutional reason why one who advances cash in lieu of bail money should occupy the identical position of a surety on a written contract. The latter is bound, and the court, clerk, and sheriff are bound, by the strict terms of the written promise, while the measure of the depositor's liability, as well as of the correlative duties of the court and its officers, is to be found in the statutes. The law does not provide for a written agreement between the state and one who advances cash in lieu of bail. It attributes the ownership of such a fund to the defendant, and one who furnishes money for the release of a person held under a criminal charge is presumed to know that fact. It is argued that the sheriff had no right to accept the money originally, and that the clerk, therefore, could not receive it in lieu of bail. But it is not contended that the money was not advanced for the purpose of obtaining Cradlebaugh's release. If it finally reached the proper judicial custody, and Cradlebaugh was in fact permitted to go at large, the plaintiff Mrs. Mundell cannot complain because the purpose of the payment by her assignor was accomplished not by a direct deposit in court, but through the agency of the sheriff, who receipted for $2,000,

"being bail money, case of R. B. Henry" (one of Cradlebaugh's aliases).

That the money deposited for bail in a criminal action is regarded as the defendant's property is a rule sustained by the weight of authority. In People ex rel. Gilbert v. Laidlaw, 102 N. Y. 588, 7 N. E. 910, the court, construing statutes very similar to §§ 1296 et seq. of the Penal Code of California, used the following language: "All these sections treat the money deposited as belonging to the defendant, and in all cases where money is deposited in lieu of bail it may be applied in payment of any fine imposed, and the surplus, if any, after the fine has been satisfied, must be returned to the defendant. The relator, when he deposited this money, must be assumed to have known the provisions of these statutes, and the deposit must have been made in compliance with them. There is no authority for the county treasurer to take a deposit in lieu of bail except by virtue of these statutes, and the deposit must be made in strict compliance with the statutes. The statutes may have been framed as they are for the very purpose of avoiding a dispute like that which has arisen in this case. If the contention of the relator be upheld, then disputes may frequently arise as to whose money was deposited, and the county treasurer can never know with certainty to whom the money is to be returned, and the court cannot know in passing sentence, or in making its order, whether the money is properly applicable upon the fine imposed. It is, therefore, wiser that the provisions of the statute should have their obvious meaning, to wit, the money is deposited as the money of the defendant, and if a fine is inflicted upon him, it may be used to pay the fine, and the surplus is to be returned to him."

Other authorities upon this subject, announcing substantially the same rule, are State v. Wisnewski, 134 Wis. 497, 114 N. W. 1118; State v. Ross, 100 Tenn. 308, 45 S. W. 673; People ex rel. Meyer v. Gould, 38 Misc. 505, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1067, and State v. Owens, 112 Iowa, 403, 84 N. W. 529. But it is suggested very earnestly that in California an entirely different rule has been adopted, and Hudson v. Police Ct. — Cal. App. —, 178 Pac. 172, is cited to support this theory. That was a case in which a writ of review was issued against the police court of the city of Oakland, and, after hearing, the district court of appeal annulled a judgment forfeiting money deposited as bail and applying it to the payment of a fine. It appears from the opinion in that case that before trial Mr. Hudson, counsel for the defendant in a criminal action, offered to surrender said defendant. There seems to have been no question regarding the sufficiency of this offer, and the district court of appeal correctly decided that the court was bound to accept it and to return the money to the counselor who had deposited it for his client. In the case at bar the facts are very different. No request was made for the acceptance of defendant's surrender in the criminal action, but the court was asked for an order accepting his surrender by his bondsman. He had no bondsman, and the court was neither bound to act nor to regard the request for the order as a personal surrender by Cradlebaugh to the sheriff.

But although, as between defendant and the state, the money deposited in lieu of bail is regarded as a defendant's property and will be applied, so far as necessary, to the satisfaction of a fine, nevertheless, in a contest like the one waged in the case at bar, involving the residue in the hands of the clerk after the payment of the fine, the court will regard the claims of the person who advanced the fund in order to bring about the release of the individual held in custody. While it is true that the statute provides for the payment to the defendant of the surplus, if any, after satisfaction of the fine (Penal Code, § 1297), if the true ownership be litigated, as in the case at bar, before the refunding contemplated by the statute, the court will inquire who is, in equity and good conscience, entitled to the money, and will award it accordingly. In Way v. Day, 187 Mass. 476, 73 N. E. 543, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts was considering a judgment dismissing a bill in equity whereby a judgment was prayed to enforce an assignment by Day of $800 deposited as bail, and remaining in the hands of the clerk of the superior court after Day's conviction and sentence. It was found in the lower court that Greer, one of the defendants, had deposited the money, and that it never was the property of Day, and that court ruled "that, while Greer cannot claim against the commonwealth that this money belongs to him, and not to Day, yet this rule does not protect the plaintiff or give to him any rights against the real owner of the fund, and that for this sole reason the bill cannot be maintained."

—contest between strangers —who entitled to money.

In approving this ruling and the dismissal of the bill, the supreme court used the following language: "Even if it be assumed that a court of equity can interfere with the power and duty of the court in which the money is deposited, and direct to whom it shall be paid,—an assumption attended with great, if not insuperable, difficulties,—and even if it be further assumed that as between the commonwealth and Day the money must be regarded as belonging to Day, and not to Greer, and, still further, that the court in which it is deposited has no power to order it to be paid to any other person than to Day or his order (see Edelsten v. Adams, 8 Taunt. 557, 129 Eng. Reprint, 500; Douglass v. Stanbrough, 3 Ad. & El. 316, 111 Eng. Reprint, 434; Salter v. Weiner, 6 Abb. Pr. 191; People ex rel. Gil- bert v. Laidlaw, 102 N. Y. 588, 7 N. E. 910), still it is plain that, the money being in fact Greer's and not Day's and having been pledged only for a certain purpose, Day had no authority, express or implied, to divert it to a different purpose. In equity and good conscience the money should go to Greer, and as against him the assignment by Day to the plaintiff must be regarded as invalid to convey any interest in or right to the fund, and equity will not lend its aid to enable him to get possession of it."

In Wright & Taylor v. Dougherty, 138 Iowa, 195, 115 N. W. 908, the question presented to the supreme court was whether or not, when money is deposited with the clerk of a court by a friendly third person to secure the release from custody of one under indictment, such fund is subject to seizure in satisfaction of the claims of judgment creditors of the indicted person. After reviewing the authorities which hold that, as between the state and the person under indictment, the money deposited as bail may be used in satisfaction of a fine, the court said: "True, under the statute, the money is to be deposited in the name of the defendant, and perhaps in a sense the legal title thereto is to be regarded as in him. But the money in the hands of the clerk is no more than a deposit, and this is only in favor of the state, the other party to the transaction; and the interest of the state does not extend to the actual ownership of the money. It goes no farther than that the defendant shall appear when called for trial, and that the deposit shall be available out of which to pay any fine or costs that may be assessed against him. This the depositor must be held to have agreed to. The statute goes no farther, and the cases cited go no farther. As between the depositor and the defendant, or his creditors, the ordinary rules of property obtain."

We are of the opinion that the true rule is clearly set forth in the passages quoted above, and, therefore, that the surplus remaining in the hands of the county clerk after satisfaction of the fine was properly adjudged to be the money of plaintiff. We also approve of that part of the judgment imposing costs upon plaintiff. Manifestly, it would have

The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right to apply cash bail to payment of fine.

General rule.

In jurisdictions where, by statute, a deposit of money may be made in lieu of bail in criminal cases, the decisions are unanimous in holding that a fine imposed on the accused may be satisfied from the cash deposit; and this is true, although the money has been furnished by a third person. La Porte v. Williams (1911) 17 Cal. App. 428, 120 Pac. 55; Wills v. Neilan (1893) 88 Iowa, 548, 55 N. W. 527; State v. Owens (1900) 112 Iowa, 403, 84 N. W. 529; Wright & Taylor v. Dougherty (1908) 138 Iowa, 195, 115 N. W. 908; People ex rel. Meyer v. Gould (1902) 38 Misc. 505, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1067, affirmed in (1902) 75 App. Div. 524, 78 N. Y. Supp. 279; People v. Burke (1902) 38 Misc. 566, 78 N. Y. Supp. 112, 11 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 365, 17 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 28; Alexander v. Creamer (1899) 46 App. Div. 211, 61 N. Y. Supp. 539; People ex rel. Gilbert v. Laidlaw (1886) 102 N. Y. 588, 7 N. E. 910; State v. Ross (1898) 100 Tenn. 303, 45 S. W. 673; State v. Wisniewski (1908) 134 Wis. 497, 114 N. W. 1113.

"That, either in civil or criminal proceedings, money deposited as bail may be applied to the satisfaction of obligations to secure which the defendant is held to bail, regardless of the rights of third parties to the money, seems settled by authority." Alexander v. Creamer (1899) 46 App. Div. 211, 61 N. Y. Supp. 539.

"We think it should be held, as a matter of law, that the money, when received by the clerk pursuant to the order made by the court, belonged to the defendant, . . . and that the court properly directed the clerk to apply a sufficient amount thereof to satisfy the judgment entered against the defendant." State v. Owens (1900) 112 Iowa, 403, 84 N. W. 529.

The California statute (Penal Code, § 1297) "authorizes the application of money deposited as bail in satisfaction of a fine, and the refunding of the surplus, if any, to the defendant." La Porte v. Williams (1911) 17 Cal. App. 428, 120 Pac. 55.

A Tennessee act (Shannon's Code, § 7135) provides as follows: "When money has been deposited, if it remains on deposit at the time of a judgment for the payment of a fine and costs, the clerk shall, under the direction of the court, apply the money in satisfaction thereof, paying the surplus, if any, to the defendant." Under this section of the statute, "it is clearly the duty of the court to direct the costs to be paid out of the sum deposited, and if there is a fine, that must also be paid, and until this is done the fund cannot be withdrawn." State v. Ross (1898) 100 Tenn. 303, 45 S. W. 673.

Application of rule.

In La Porte v. Williams (Cal.) supra, the petitioner was arrested for vagrancy, and, on conviction before the police court, appealed to the superior court. The judgment was affirmed, and the superior court certified its judgment to the court below, directing the justice to apply the bail money to the extent of the fine, in execution of the judgment. The petitioner thereupon applied for a writ prohibiting the justice from so doing, on the ground that the petitioner or her counsel had no notice, after the hearing on appeal, when the judgment would be rendered, and that the superior court transmitted its findings and judgment to the lower court before the expiration of ten days. It was held that these contentions were not well founded, and since the Penal Code authorized the application of money deposited as bail in satisfaction of a fine imposed, the police court was authorized to apply the cash bail to the payment of the fine, on the superior court's certification of its judgment affirming the police court.

But in Hudson v. Police Ct. (1918) — Cal. App. —, 178 Pac. 172, a cash bond deposited with the clerk of court by an attorney, to secure the release of his client, was held not available for the payment of a fine imposed on the client, when the attorney, both at the time of the trial and after the client pleaded guilty, appeared personally with the client, offering to surrender her and demanding the return of the money.

In Wright & Taylor v. Dougherty (1908) 138 Iowa, 195, 115 N. W. 908, the question arose whether money furnished by a third person as bail, to secure the release of one charged with crime, was subject to garnishment at the suit of the creditors of the accused, after the dismissal of the indictment. It was held that this money could not be garnished, since it was deposited for the purpose only of assuring that the defendant should appear when called for trial, but that it was available to pay any fine or costs that might be assessed against the accused.

In People ex rel. Meyer v. Gould (1902) 75 App. Div. 524, 78 N. Y. Supp. 279, affirming (1902) 38 Misc. 505, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1067, the question was whether a deposit of cash made in lieu of bail by a person indicted for the larceny of money could be attached in a civil action, by the person whose money was taken. It was held that the deposit was answerable only for the appearance of the accused at the trial and for any fine that might be imposed.

In State v. Owens (1900) 112 Iowa, 403, 84 N. W. 529, a preliminary information was filed against the defendant and another, accusing them of the crime of keeping a gambling house. They appeared to that information, and, waiving examination, were held to answer to the grand jury, their bail being fixed at $300 each. A check for $600, made by a third person, was deposited with the clerk of the court, in lieu of a bail bond, and the defendants were released. Thereafter the grand jury returned two indictments against one of the defendants alone, on each of which bail was fixed at $600. This amount was afterwards reduced to $300 in each case, and the $600 check was, by consent of the party making it, allowed to remain as bail for the defendant. The defendant pleaded guilty to one of the indictments, and judgment was rendered that he should pay a fine and costs; and on the same day the defendant filed an application, asking the court to require the clerk to apply so much of the $300 deposited as cash bail as might be necessary to satisfy the judgment rendered against him. The county attorney made a like motion on the same day, and produced a certificate from the clerk, showing that the bail was in his possession. In the meantime, however, the person who drew the check for the bail filed a motion for the release of the money, on the ground that he had surrendered the defendant to the sheriff. It was held that the transaction between the defendant and the third person was, in effect, a loan to the defendant, and the deposit was defendant's and could be used to pay the fine imposed, refunding to the defendant the surplus, if any. The court, after quoting the statute allowing cash bail, pointed out that in no place in the statute was provision made for the deposit of cash by a third person.

In Wills v. Neelan (1898) 88 Iowa, 548, 55 N. W. 527, a person charged with a misdemeanor was convicted by a police judge, and sentenced to fine or imprisonment. The accused elected to serve the imprisonment, but the court, nevertheless, ordered that the amount of the fine should be deducted from a cash deposit which the accused had given as bail, the balance of the bail to be returned to the accused, and the accused to be released from custody. This was accordingly done, and the accused thereupon instituted an action in detinue against the police judge. The authority of the police judge to receive the certificate of deposit in lieu of bail, and to order it applied for the payment of a fine, was not questioned; the only question being whether he was authorized so to apply it when the prisoner preferred to serve the jail part of the sentence. Answering this question in the affirmative, Given, J., said: "The judgment is in the alternative, and would be satisfied by either payment or by imprisonment, but, until satisfied, it might be enforced either by collection or by imprisonment. The appellee had the right to pay the fine, and thereby avoid imprisonment, but he had no right to elect to go to jail instead of paying the fine. The judgment not being satisfied, it might be enforced either by collecting the fine or by imprisonment."

In People v. Burke (1902) 38 Misc. 566, 78 N. Y. Supp. 112, 11 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 365, 17 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 28, the defendant was adjudged, for abandonment of his wife, to contribute a weekly amount to her support. Thereafter an appeal was taken and allowed, the defendant depositing $300 as cash bail with the city chamberlain. The judgment of the lower court was subsequently affirmed, and the defendant surrendered himself and was committed. The defendant then filed a motion to direct the city chamberlain to return to him the money deposited in lieu of an undertaking. It was ordered, however, that the money should be applied to the support of the wife and the payment of costs as adjudged by the lower court, the balance only to be returned to the defendant.

In People ex rel. Gilbert v. Laidlaw (1886) 102 N. Y. 588, 7 N. E. 910, the relator applied for a writ of mandamus, addressed to the county treasurer, commanding him to return a $300 cash bond which the relator had deposited as bail for a person charged with assault. It appeared that the accused had been convicted of the offense charged, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $250, which was ordered to be paid from the $300 deposited with the county treasurer, and the surplus of the deposit was ordered to be refunded to the accused. The fine was so satisfied, and the balance of the deposit was turned over to the accused. Under statute, it was provided that the defendant might, instead of giving bail, deposit the amount in cash, and "if it remain on deposit and unforfeited at the time of a judgment for the payment of a fine, the county treasurer must, under direction of the court, apply the money in satisfaction thereof; and after satisfying the fine, must refund the surplus, if any, to the defendant." In affirming the judgment of the special term, dismissing the writ of mandamus, Earl, J., said: "The money is deposited as the money of the defendant, and if a fine is inflicted upon him it may be used to pay the fine, and the surplus is to be returned to him. When any party other than the defendant makes the deposit for him, it is a deposit in compliance with the statute, and the money is thus devoted to the purposes of the statute, and to the use of the defendant. The certificate which was issued to the plaintiff in this case certifies that the money was deposited for the defendant. It must, therefore, be treated as if it were furnished to the defendant and the deposit had been made by him."

In State v. Ross (1898) 100 Tenn. 803, 45 S. W. 673, the defendant was indicted for larceny, was found guilty, and sentenced to prison. He appealed to the supreme court, and, his bail having been fixed at $3,000, a cash deposit of that amount was placed in the hands of the clerk of the county criminal court, and was paid over by him to the clerk of the supreme court. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed, and application was thereupon made to withdraw the cash bail by a person who claimed to have made the deposit as agent for the defendant's mother, to whom, it was alleged, the money belonged. This application was made on the theory that the deposit was made in lieu of a bond, and that, the defendant having appeared and been sentenced by the court, the fund could no longer be held. The court, after quoting sections of Shannon's Code which provide for the deposit of a cash bail in lieu of a bail bond, and for the application of this deposit for the payment of all fines and costs, and for the refunding of the surplus, if any, to the defendant, held that the costs of court should be deducted from the money on deposit, and the balance should be paid over to the defendant, or to such person as he might direct by proper power of attorney.

In State v. Wisnewski (1908) 134 Wis. 497, 114 N. W. 1113, the defendant was arrested on a charge of forgery, and, on failure to furnish bail, was committed. He was afterwards admitted to bail; the sum of $800 in cash being furnished by one Julius Wisnewski. The defendant was thereupon discharged from custody, but was subsequently arrested on a second charge of forgery, for which he was tried and convicted. He served his term in prison, and during that term the first charge remained pending, and the cash bail remained on deposit. About the time of the defendant's release from prison, one Edgar, an attorney, procured authority from the defendant to represent him in obtaining the $800 deposit, and, on application of Edgar to the circuit court, an order was made directing the clerk to pay Edgar the $800, and thereupon payment was made accordingly. Thereafter Julius Wisnewski made application to the circuit court to be made a party to the proceeding instituted by Edgar, and for the vacation of the order previously made directing the clerk to pay the $800 to Edgar, and asking that the $800 be paid into court. It was held that the statute authorizing the defendant to deposit the amount of bail in money, and providing for the payment of fines out of the deposit, and the return of the surplus, if any, to the person depositing the money, contemplated that the cash should be deposited by the accused; and if the money was actually furnished by a third person, the defendant would, nevertheless, be entitled to the surplus; and since the money had been paid to the defendant's attorney, on order of the defendant, the attorney could not be required to pay it into court for the benefit of the petitioner. Teller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs in error were sureties on a criminal recognizance given for the appearance of one Minnie De Lage, who was charged with a felony. On the return day of the recognizance the defendant did not appear, and the bond was therefore forfeited, and a scire facias issued, requiring the sureties to show cause why judgment for the penalty named should not be rendered against them. To this they answered, alleging that the accused was insane on the return day and was still insane; that she was in the custody of the sheriff of a county in Texas, under a criminal charge; and that there was then pending in Texas a proceeding to determine the question of her sanity. A general demurrer to the answer was sustained, and judgment entered for $1,000 against said sureties. They bring the case here on error.

The demurrer admits the allegations of the answer, including the allegation that the accused was insane on the return day and when the answer was filed, and was in the custody of the law in Texas. There is therefore presented the question whether or not the sureties are relieved from their obligation to produce their principal in the recognizance by the fact that she is insane and in the custody of another state. It is plain that the purpose of a recognizance is merely to insure the presence for trial of a person accused of a bailable offense. The enriching of the public treasury is no part of the object at which the proceeding is aimed.

the sureties when it appears that they are unable, by no fault of their own or of their principal, to perform the condition of the bond. Moreover, to produce for trial an insane person would serve no good purpose, as the trial could not proceed. These considerations have been many times recognized by the courts, which have set aside forfeitures and vacated judgments on bail bonds when the principal has been prevented by death, sickness, or insanity from appearing as required by the bond. Such cases come within the rule which relieves from the obligation of a contract rendered impossible of performance by an act of God. "Ordinarily, insanity of the principal is a good defense for nonperformance of the obligation of the bond." 2 R. C. L. p. 55, ¶ 67.

In Chase v. People, 2 Colo. 481, this court held that, when a principal in a recognizance was on the return day prevented by sickness from appearing, such sickness not being the result of fault or misconduct on his part, a judgment of forfeiture should be set aside, when the facts were made to appear. In that case it was held that the costs should be paid by the sureties. In Scully v. Kirkpatrick, 79 Pa. 324, 21 Am. Rep. 62, a number of cases are cited to the effect that sickness and insanity, as well as death, excuse performance of the condition of a recognizance. The rule is well settled, and has our <sup>—forfeiture—insanity as defense.</sup> entire approval. It may be that, on a hearing upon an issue made as to the alleged insanity, it will appear that the accused is not or was not insane.

The judgment will be reversed on payment of costs by the plaintiffs in error, and such further proceedings may be had in the cause as are consistent with the views hereinbefore expressed.

ANNOTATION.

Insanity of principal as relieving bail for his nonappearance.

In criminal cases, it seems to be well established that bail will be exonerated from liability for failure to produce the principal at the trial when such failure is due to the fact that the principal is in confinement because of his insanity. Com. v. Fleming (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 491; Wood v. Com. (1896) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1076, 33 S. W. 729; Briggs v. Com. (1919) — Ky. —, — A.L.R. —, 214 S. W. 975 (obiter); Reg. v. Blackwell (1857) 7 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 353. And see the reported case (SMITH v. PEOPLE, ante, 392).

In Com. v. Fleming (Ky.) supra, it appeared that the accused, while still on bail, but before his trial commenced, was duly adjudged a lunatic by a court of competent jurisdiction within the same state, and ordered to be sent to the insane asylum. While on his way there, in the custody of a duly authorized officer, the accused escaped, and was still at large and could not be located at the time of his trial. It was held that these facts constituted a good defense to an action against the sureties to recover the bail.

In the reported case (SMITH v. PEOPLE), the court holds that there was no reason for penalizing the sureties for failure to produce the principal, where it appeared that the principal on the return day was insane and in custody of the sheriff in another state, pending a proceeding in such state to determine her sanity.

In Reg. v. Blackwell (Eng.) supra, it appeared that the accused was held for murder, but became so insane during his confinement that he was, by the order of the secretary of state, removed to the insane asylum. It was held that the recognizances would be respited sine die.

So, in Wood v. Com. (1896) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1076, 33 S. W. 729, the state sought to hold the sureties liable on a forfeited bail bond, conditioned on the appearance of the accused to answer an indictment for murder. The sureties pleaded that the accused, while still on bail and before his trial, was duly adjudged a lunatic in proceedings instituted for that purpose before a police justice, and in consequence thereof had been confined in an insane asylum. It was held that the defense was good.

But in Reg. v. Cobus (1845) 1 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 207, it appeared that the accused was charged with murder and had been committed to the insane asylum before trial on a certificate of two justices of the peace that he was insane. The court held that they would not discharge the recognizances, but would only respite them until the next assizes.

In Adler v. State (1880) 35 Ark. 517, 37 Am. Rep. 48, it was held no defense to the sureties on the bond that the accused was confined in an insane asylum in another state, and so was unable to attend his trial, where it appeared that the sureties themselves had assumed the responsibility of sending the accused there, without consulting the court or permitting others to do so. The court said: "The paragraph of the answer in question does not allege that Kahn was sent to the New York asylum for care and medical treatment by any act or authority of the state. He was in the custody of appellants as his bail. The inference from the plea is, that they assumed the responsibility of sending him there, without consulting the court, or permitted others to do so. If by the law and regulations of the asylum he was detained there, as alleged, and out of the process of the court, it was not the fault of the state, but the result of their sending him there, or permitting him to be sent."

In Com. v. Allen (1914) 157 Ky. 6, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 252, 162 S. W. 116, it was held that where the accused was indicted for larceny and allowed out on bail, his subsequent insanity and disappearance from the state without informing anyone of his intentions was no defense to an action against the sureties to recover the amount of the bail; that to exonerate the sureties from liability it must appear that the principal was duly adjudged insane. The court said: "Appellee insists that he is released, because the failure of the principal in the bond to appear was caused by the act of God; and in support of this contention he relies upon Com. v. Fleming, and Wood v. Com. (Ky.) supra. But in both of those cases the defendant had been adjudged a lunatic by a court of competent jurisdiction; and in the Wood Case the defendant was actually confined in the asylum at the time his bond was forfeited."

The rule on the subject is thus declared in an obiter statement in Briggs v. Com. (1919) — Ky. —, — A.L.R. —, 214 S. W. 975, the actual question before the court being as to the effect of the induction of the principal into the military service. "In this state, where the principal is actually confined in an insane asylum, being thus in the custody of the state, and beyond the power of the sureties to produce him, the latter is discharged. . . . Likewise where the principal has been adjudged to be of unsound mind. . . . But where the principal, though insane, has not been so adjudged, the bail is liable if he permits the accused to escape beyond the jurisdiction; and, the court being in law the custodian of the principal, his surety must produce him either for trial or for surrender, as provided by statute."

In civil cases the rule seems to be that lunacy of the principal does not exonerate the bail. Bowerbank v. Payne (1810) 2 Wash. C. C. 464, Fed. Cas. No. 1,727; Ibbotson v. Galway (1795) 6 T. R. 133, 101 Eng. Reprint, 474; Cock v. Bell (1811) 13 East, 355, 104 Eng. Reprint, 407.

Thus, in Bowerbank v. Payne (Fed.) supra, where it appeared that the defendant was a lunatic and confined in the hospital, the court refused to enter an exoneration on the bail piece.

So, in Ibbotson v. Galway (1795) 6 T. R. 133, 101 Eng. Reprint, 474, it was held that the sureties would not be exonerated though it appeared that, after the commencement of the action, a commission of lunacy had issued against the principal, under which he had been found a lunatic.

So, in Cock v. Bell (1811) 13 East, 355, 104 Eng. Reprint, 407, the court held that even where the principal was duly adjudged insane, the insanity, when not violent or dangerous, did not excuse the sureties or give them additional time within which to render up the principal.

But in Fuller v. Davis (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 612, it was held a good defense to an action against the surety on a bond for the liberties of the prison limits, that between the date of the execution of the bond and the time at which it was returnable, the principal was furiously mad and had been committed by the judge of probate to the state lunatic asylum. Kentucky Court of Appeals — May 21, 1918.

Trust — noncompliance with statute — individual liability of trustee.

1. A trustee managing an estate, who leases a hotel without complying with the statutes and ordinances with respect to fire escapes and extinguishers, is individually liable for injury to a guest because of the absence of those things.

[See note on this question beginning on page 408.]

Statute — enacting clause — noncompliance with statute.

2. The use of an enacting clause, "Be it enacted by the legislature of the state," when the Constitution states that the style shall be, "Be it enacted by the general assembly of the commonwealth," does not invalidate the act.

[See 25 R. C. L. 775.]

Pleading — ordinance — sufficiency.

3. A petition charging violation of an ordinance passed a certain day, having a specified title and specifying the particulars of violation, is a sufficient pleading of the ordinance.

Negligence — necessity of proximate cause.

4. There can be no recovery for injury or loss occasioned by negligence unless the complaining party can show that the negligence charged contributed to or brought about the injury or loss complained of.

[See 22 R. C. L. 113.]

Evidence — proximate cause — circumstantial.

5. The causal connection between an act of negligence and an injury need not be shown by direct evidence if there is ample circumstantial evidence to establish it.

— acts or declaration of injured person.

6. The causal connection between the act of negligence and the resulting injury need not be shown by acts or declarations of the person injured.

Proximate cause — neglect to utilize means of escape from injury.

7. Where one alleged to have been injured by another's negligence had some means of escape from the impending danger, which he could have availed himself of, but failed to do, the negligence of the other party will not generally be regarded as the proximate cause of his injury, in the absence of facts or circumstances showing the connection between the two.

Innkeeper — failure to provide egress from building — liability.

8. An innkeeper who fails to comply with the ordinance requiring the arrangement of doors and passageways to facilitate egress in case of fire cannot avoid liability in case of the death of a guest in a fire, on the ground that failure to provide fire escapes and extinguishers was not the proximate cause of death, because he could not have reached a fire escape or used the extinguisher had they existed.

—arrangement of passageways so as to cut off egress in case of fire.

9. Statutory provisions that hotels shall be equipped with fire escapes, and that the way of egress to such fire escapes shall at all times be kept free and clear of any and all obstructions of any and every nature, require the doors and halls in the hotels to be so arranged as to facilitate egress in cases of fire, and an arrangement of halls and doors which prevents such egress will impose liability on the hotel keeper for death of a guest who is unable to escape from a fire because of an unsafe arrangement of means of exit.

Evidence — presumption of negligence — guest dying in fire.

10. There is no presumption of negligence on the part of a guest dying in a fire in a hotel not equipped with fire extinguishers and escapes as required by statute.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is located in the city of Louisville on Seventh street a three-story building, known as the Seventh Avenue Hotel, and in December, 1915, during a fire originating in and which partially destroyed this hotel, Charles C. Morgan, William Buckner, and C. F. Buckner, who were guests at the hotel, lost their lives as a result of the fire, and this suit was brought by the administrator of Morgan against the Louisville Trust Company, as trustee, owner, and landlord, and C. P. McClary, as tenant and proprietor of the hotel, to recover damages for his death. It appears that the hotel property was owned by the estate of Emma McBurnie, of which estate the Louisville Trust Company was duly appointed, qualified, and acting trustee, and as trustee it leased the property to McClary, who was operating it at the time of the fire as a hotel.

Originally, the suit was brought against the Louisville Trust Company as trustee of the estate of Emma McBurnie, and in its individual capacity as a corporation, but upon motion to require the administrator to elect whether he would prosecute the suit against the trust company in its individual capacity or in its fiduciary capacity, the court ruled that it was not liable in its fiduciary capacity, and thereupon the action proceeded against it in its individual capacity. After the pleadings had been made up there was a trial before a jury and a verdict in favor of the administrator against the Louisville Trust Company for $6,000, and against McClary for $1,000, and from the judgment on this verdict the trust company, but not McClary, prosecutes this appeal. At this point it will be convenient to set out such a description of the hotel building as may be necessary for the understanding of the case:

The original building that composed a part of this hotel was made of brick, three stories high, and fronted on Seventh street, but afterwards a frame addition, extending along the south side of the brick building, was constructed, and the two buildings constituted the hotel at the time of the fire. The office was on the first floor of the brick building, and leading from the office to the second floor of the brick building there was a stairway going into a hall in the second floor of the brick building that extended from the front to the rear of the building. Morgan and the Buckners occupied, on the night of the fire, room No. 1 in the frame building, and between this room and the other rooms and the hall in the brick building there was a brick wall extending from Seventh street to the rear of the building. In this wall that separated completely room No. 1 and the other rooms in the frame building from the brick building and the main hallway therein, there were no doors or other openings except one near the front of the building that furnished a means of exit and entrance to and from the main hall of the brick building to the frame building, and in order to go from the office to room No. 1 it was necessary to go up the stairway to the main hall in the brick building, then down the hall towards Seventh street to the door in the brick wall that opened into the frame building, then across the frame building to a little hall, 3 feet wide, on the south side of the frame building, then down this hall a few feet to a door that opened into another hall, from which hall there was a door opening into room No. 1, and also a door opening into room No. 2; room No. 1 being back of room No. 2. Room No. 1 had in it two doors, one opening into the little hall above mentioned, and the other into room No. 2, and in the rear of room No. 1 there were two windows that looked out on the roof of the one-story dining room and kitchen.

It is difficult to describe, so that it can be understood, the location in the hotel of room No. 1, and the difficulty of getting from the office, or the main hall in the brick building, to or from it, but we have been furnished with plans of the second floor that enable us to confidently say that if the architect of this frame building had endeavored to plan a room that it would be almost impossible to escape from, in case of fire in the frame building, he could not well have succeeded in locating it, and the means of ingress and egress therefrom, better than the plans show he did. If there ever was located in a building intended to be and that was used as a hotel a room that might be described as a fire trap, room No. 1 fills the description. Indeed, a stranger, as it appears Morgan and these Buckners were, would find it difficult in the middle of a quiet day to make his way from room No. 1 to the main hall and the office, to say nothing of the almost insurmountable difficulties that would present themselves if a stranger in the night, and in the midst of a fire, should attempt to find his way to a place of safety.

The fire was discovered about 4 o'clock in the morning by a policeman out on the street, who at once turned in the fire alarm, and within a few minutes thereafter the fire department reached the place, but before they got there the hotel clerk, the porter, and a man named Ash had gone through the building to awaken the guests, all of whom, it appears, made their escape except these three men, who were, apparently, the only occupants of the second floor of the frame building. Ash did not testify in the case, but Louis Thompson, the porter, was introduced as a witness, and said, in substance, that the fire originated in the one-story kitchen, and soon enveloped the entire rear end of the frame building, thereby prohibiting escape from room No. 1 through the windows that opened out on the kitchen roof. At the time the porter reached the little hall, into which the door of room No. 1 opened, this hall was full of suffocating smoke, and he did not go to the door of room No. 1 to alarm the inmates, because, as he said, this service had been performed by Ash, whom he heard calling out "Fire," and knocking on the door of room No. 1. When the fire department reached the building some of the firemen made their way into this little hall on the second floor through the fumes and smoke, and, breaking open the door of room No. 2, which was used as a storeroom, they found Morgan and the two Buckners, all of them either dead or in a dying condition on the floor of this room, to which it appears they had gotten from room No. 1 through the door in the partition between these two rooms. There was also some evidence to show that the firemen found the door of room No. 1 unlocked, and an intimation that the occupants may have attempted to make their escape through this door, but, being prevented by the smoke in the hall, they turned to the door leading into room No. 2, hoping that they might make their escape in that way; but there were no doors or openings in that room, except the door leading into room No. 1, and the door leading into the little hall, and so they were compelled to remain in room No. 2, where they were suffocated by the smoke.

Turning now to other matters, it appears that in 1914 the legislature enacted a law regulating hotels and restaurants, and in this act, which is now § 2095a, subd. 6, of the Kentucky Statutes, it was provided that "in all hotels and restaurants two stories high with ten or more sleeping rooms, where sleeping accommodations are furnished to the public, there shall be provided for each 2,500 feet of area or fractional part thereof an efficient chemical fire extinguisher conveniently located in a public hallway outside of the sleeping rooms, and always in condition for use, or a 1 and  $\frac{1}{4}$  inch inside standpipe with hose connection and a hose of sufficient length always attached in such a hallway, which standpipe shall be supplied by a sufficient pressure of water."

It further provided that all hotels and restaurants more than two stories high should be equipped with an iron stairway or fire escape on the outside of the building, and that "the way of egress to such fire escapes shall at all times be kept free and clear of any and all obstructions of any and every nature." Subdivision 8.

It further appears that in 1909 the city of Louisville enacted an ordinance known as the Building Code, and in § 153 it was provided that every building three or more stories high, used as a hotel, should have at least one fire escape, and as many more as might be necessary for safety; the location of the fire escapes to be subject to the approval of the inspector of buildings; and in § 183 it was further provided that "the doors . . . and passageways . . . shall be arranged . . . to facilitate egress in cases of fire or accident and to afford requisite and proper accommodations for the public protection in such cases."

In accordance with these statutory and ordinance provisions and § 466 of the Kentucky statutes, giving a cause of action for injuries resulting from the violations of a statute, the trial court instructed the jury that "it was the duty of the Louisville Trust Company, when it permitted the building known as the Seventh Avenue Hotel to be used as a hotel, to cause it to be equipped with an efficient chemical fire extinguisher conveniently located in a public hallway outside of the sleeping rooms, and an inside standpipe, with hose connection attached, in the hallway, and supplied by sufficient pressure of water, and to cause the building to be equipped with an iron stairway on the outside of the building, and to cause the doors, stairways, passageways, and aisles of the building to be arranged for the facilitation of egress from the sleeping rooms and all of them in case of fire."

Coming now to the errors relied on, we find it urged that the judgment should be reversed: (1) Because the Louisville Trust Company was not liable in its individual capacity. (2) The Act of 1914, regulating hotels and restaurants, was void because the enacting clause was fatally defective. (3) The city ordinance was not sufficiently pleaded to be the basis of a cause of action. (4) There was no causal connection between the proved negligence and the death of Morgan, or, in other words, there was a failure to show that the negligence of the trust company, in failing to have the building equipped in the manner provided in the statute and ordinance, was the proximate cause of the death of Morgan. (5) Error in the instructions, and the admission of evidence. (6) Because Morgan was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat a recovery.

As before stated, the trust company was sued in its fiduciary and individual character, but upon motion to elect the trial court held that it was liable in its individual, and not in its fiduciary, capacity, and, in so ruling, the trial court was clearly correct. The trust company controlled and managed this hotel property in its fiduciary capacity, and leased it some years before the fire to McClary, or his predecessor, for hotel purposes, and at the time of the fire McClary, as tenant of the trust company, was occupying and using the building with the knowledge and consent of the trust company for hotel purposes. It is further plainly made to appear that the trust company, in 1914, was notified that the hotel building was not supplied with any of the equipment mentioned in the statute or ordinance for the protection of guests, and that it negligently failed to take any steps to provide this equipment or any part thereof. At the time of the fire there was no fire escape on the building, or fire extinguisher, or standpipes in the building; nor was there any door leading from room No. 1 to the main hall in the brick building, and the means of egress and ingress to and from room No. 1 were so arranged as to prevent, rather than facilitate, egress from this room. In short, the trust company, having violated the law in leasing the building for hotel purposes, willfully failed and refused to comply with any of the requirements of the statute or ordinance, or the notice it received from the fire inspector, and to its neglect in these respects the death of Morgan may reasonably, if not certainly, be attributed. Under these circumstances, the general rule is that the trustee is liable in his individual, and not in his official, capacity, and this, for the sound reason that the trustee should not be allowed, by his tort or negligence, to impair the trust fund. 39 Cyc. 302; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 942, 2065; Louisville v. O'Donaghue, 157 Ky. 243, 162 S. W. 1110; Helling v. Boss, 121 N. Y. Supp. 1013; O'Malley v. Gerth, 67 N. J. L. 610, 52 Atl. 563, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 121; Belvin v. French, 84 Va. 81, 3 S. E. 891; Plimpton v. Richards, 59 Me. 115; Elmore v. Elmore, 58 S. C. 289, 51 L.R.A. 261, 36 S. E. 656; Daily v. Daily, 66 Ala. 266; Parker v. Barlow, 93 Ga. 700, 21 S. E. 213;

Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 Pac. 695; Parmenter v. Barstow, 22 R. I. 245, 68 L.R.A. 227, 47 Atl. 365. Nor do we find in the case of Ireland v. Bowman, 130 Ky. 153, 118 S. W. 56, 17 Ann. Cas. 786, anything conflicting with the general principle set forth. In that case the question of the personal liability of the trustee was not put in issue; besides, the testator, who, during his life, had maintained a dam in connection with a mill that obstructed a stream, conferred upon his executors authority to continue the operation of the mill, and pursuant to the authority they were conducting the business as directed by the testator, and when sued to recover damages on account of the obstruction of the stream by the dam, the court said that "if the dam was a public nuisance, J. M. Thomas could not by his will confer upon the defendants authority to maintain it, and the trustees are answerable as trustees for any damage which they may have done by the maintenance of the nuisance. They are sued here as trustees. The trustees and devisees simply stand in the shoes of J. M. Thomas. The suit is against them as the representatives of his estate."

But in this case the trust company voluntarily and without testamentary direction so to do rented this property for hotel purposes when it knew, or should be charged with notice, that it was not equipped in the manner provided by law, and then, when its attention was directed to the lack of equipment, it persisted in continuing to lease the building for hotel purposes without making the improvements, or any of them, that it was required by the statute and ordinance to make. Under these circumstances, it would be, as said in Plimpton v. Richards, 59 Me. 115, monstrous to hold that judgment and execution should go against the estate for a tort which the trustee had no authority under or by virtue of its trusteeship to commit.

The attack on the validity of the legislative Act of 1914 finds its only support in the fact that the title to that act reads, "Be It Enacted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky," when the Constitution of the state, in § 62, provides that "the style of the laws of this commonwealth shall be as follows: 'Be it enacted by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky.'" It will thus be observed that the enacting clause of this 1914 act departed from the constitutional direction in the use of the word "legislature" in place of the words "general assembly," and in the use of the word "state" in place of the word "commonwealth."

In the case of Com. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 160 Ky. 745, L.R.A.1915B, 1060, 170 S. W. 171, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 515, the court held that the requirement of the Constitution that the style of laws should be as directed was mandatory, and, therefore, when the enacting clause set forth in the Constitution had been wholly omitted, there was such a departure from the Constitution as to render the proposed legislation void, and we have no disposition to depart from or question the correctness of that decision. We regard it as thoroughly sound and in keeping with numerous decisions of this court holding mandatory constitutional directions. But there is a marked difference between the failure to provide an act with any enacting clause and the failure to provide the act with a perfect enacting clause. The act here in question has an enacting clause, but it is an imperfect one in the respect that it does not contain the precise words that it is specified in the Constitution an enacting clause should contain, but the defect is in form and not in substance, and the departure from the precise phraseology of the Constitution is neither misleading nor deceptive, because the words "legislature" and "general assembly" are commonly used interchangeably, as are the words "commonwealth" and "state," in various sections of the Constitution, in many legislative enactments as well as in court opinions, and there could be no misunderstanding on the part of any person arising from the use of the words employed in this enacting clause. Com. v. Sherman, 85 Ky. 686, 4 S. W. 790. Under these circumstances, to hold void, for the reason suggested, an otherwise valid legislative enactment, would be sacrificing substance for mere technical form, and giving to mandatory constitutional directions a narrow, if not an absurd, meaning and effect. No court of last resort has held more consistently and firmly than has our court to the doctrine of mandatory construction of constitutional provisions, but we have as consistently refused to overthrow legislative enactments for frivolous and purely technical reasons.

The ruling in the case of McCreary v. Speer, 156 Ky. 783, 162 S. W. 99, is relied on, but plainly it does not support counsel, or conflict with what we have said, because in that case the legislature fixed sixty days as the time the notice of a vote on a proposed amendment should be advertised when the Constitution directed that ninety days' notice should be given, and the court ruled that this was a substantial departure from the constitutional direction, and that it was, admits of no doubt.

The principle that has controlled us in constitutional construction was thus stated by the court in Penitentiary Comrs. v. Spencer, 159 Ky. 255, 166 S. W. 1017, where it was said: "At the threshold of what we have to say it might be well to observe that this court has no disposition to give a narrow or technical construction to the section of the Constitution under consideration, or a construction that would make it difficult or impracticable for the legislature to phrase or construct titles or acts that would not be obnoxious to this provision of the Constitution. The section should be liberally construed so as not to hinder or embarrass the legislature in its efforts to enact laws, but at the same time a construction so loose as to virtually nullify the section, which is mandatory in its terms, should not be adopted. . . . Running through all of them [the cases] will be found the determined purpose of this court to enforce substantial compliance with this section, while giving to it a reasonable and liberal construction."

We are therefore of the opinion that the validity of the act was not affected by the imperfections in the enacting clause.

Statute—enacting clause—noncompliance with statute.

As to the objection that the ordinance of the city was not properly pleaded, the petition charged that the hotel was being operated in violation of the ordinance, and specified the particulars in which the violation consisted, and in the reply it was further averred that the directions of the building inspector to the trust company in respect to equipping this building in the manner provided by the ordinance was pursuant to "an ordinance of the city of Louisville, approved August 4, 1909, and entitled an ordinance establishing and providing for a department of building for the city of Louisville, and regulating the construction, equipment, maintenance, alteration, repairing, and removing of buildings and the occupancy, obstruction of streets and alleys in the performance of same, and provided certain penalties for the violation thereof, same to be known and cited as the Building Code." These sufficiency.

averments were, as we think, substantially sufficient to comply with the practice, and especially so in view of § 2775 of the Kentucky statutes, providing that the courts shall take judicial notice of the ordinances of the city.

It is also urgently insisted by counsel that there was a total failure to show that the negligence of the trust company in the respects mentioned was the proximate cause of the death of Morgan, and therefore there could be no recovery against it. If it should be admitted that there was no causal connection between the proven negligence and the proven injury, then the argument of counsel would be well founded, because it is the settled rule, not only in this state, but in other jurisdictions, that there can be no recovery for injury or loss occasioned by negligence, unless the complaining party can show that the negligence charged contributed to or brought about the injury or loss complained of. Thus it was said in Conway v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 135 Ky. 229, 119 S. W. 206, 122 S. W. 136, that "there is also a plain elementary principle of negligence law that to constitute actionable negligence there must be a concurrence of two things: First, negligence; and, second, injury resulting as a proximate cause of it. It matters not how negligent a person may be; his negligence, unless the injuries complained of were the proximate result of it, will not authorize a recovery in damages."

proximate cause.

To the same effect are Davis v. Ohio Valley Bkg. & T. Co. 127 Ky. 800, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 402, 106 S. W. 848; Conley v. Ennis, 170 Ky. 125, 185 S. W. 501; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Perkins, 177 Ky. 88, 197 S. W. 526. This principle in the law of negligence, although it has not heretofore been applied by this court to a case like this, as this is the first of its kind that has come before us, has often been laid down by other courts as applicable to injuries resulting from the negligent failure to provide buildings with fire escapes and other safety equipment. Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 495, 43 L.R.A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 698, 48 S. W. 809; Pauley v. Steam Gauge & Lantern Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 15 L.R.A. 194, 29 N. E. 999; Arnold v. National Starch Co. 194 N. Y. 42, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 178, 86 N. E. 815; Radley v. Knepfly, 104 Tex. 180, 135 S. W. 111.

Let us see, now, if there is not evidence, direct or circumstantial, tending to sufficiently show a causal connection between the negligence of the trust company and the death of Morgan, and in considering this feature of the case it should here be said that it is not essential that the Evidence— causal connection proximate cause should be shown by —circumstantial. direct evidence; indeed, direct evidence in many cases like this would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain, although there might be ample circumstantial evidence to sustain the cause of action, and so, when the causal connection can be shown by circumstances, these circumstances will be equally as effective as direct evidence would be.

Nor is it indispensable that the evidence showing the connection between the negligence and the injury should be exhibited —acts or dec- by the acts or declaralaration of in- rations of the injured person. juryed party, as it may be shown by facts and circumstances entirely independent of anything that he said or did, as for example by the acts of the party charged with negligence if these acts were of such a nature as that but for them the injury would not have happened.

When, however, the complaining party has some means of escape from an impending

Proximate cause danger that he —neglect to could have availed utilize means of himself of, or when escape from the means of avoidinjury. ing it are open to his choice, the negligence will not generally be regarded as the proximate cause of the injury in the absence of facts or circumstances showing the connection between the two. To illustrate, if the halls and doors in this building had been so arranged as to facilitate egress in case of fire, and it appeared that Morgan was unable to or failed to make his escape on account of fright, or confusion, or delay on his part, or because he was not awakened in time, or because of the rapidity with which the flames spread, or the smoke filling the halls, then we would have a case where the causal connection between the negligence and the injury was lacking. But this general rule, so often applied in negligence cases, should have no controlling weight in a case where the injured party, on account of the negligence of the other party, has no means of escape, and there is not open to him any way by which he can avoid the impending danger. If this were not so, then the greater the negligence the less the liability would be, and the rights of the injured party would be diminished in the same ratio that the negligence was increased, when the converse is true, and the greater the negligence the greater the liability.

Coming, now, to apply what we have said to the facts of this case, we think the evidence shows that the failure of Morgan to escape was not caused by fright, or confusion, or delay on his part, or by the rapidity by which the fire spread or the smoke filled the halls, or by the fact that he was not awakened in time, but by the unsafe and dangerous construction of the interior of the hotel that prevented Morgan from reaching a fire escape if one had been provided, and therefore the rule laid down in the case of Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 495, 43 L.R.A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693, 48 S. W. 809, and others cited by counsel, have little application to the facts in this case. In the Weeks Case, the court based its opinion that there was no causal connection between the negligence and the injury upon facts showing that the injured party could not have reached the fire escapes if they had been erected on account of the rapid spread of the flames, and other acts committed by him in his fright caused by the presence of the fire; and so in the Radley Case. But in no one of those cases was it made to appear, as in this one, that the injured party would have been prevented from reaching fire escapes if they had been erected by obstacles and obstructions placed in his way by the negligent and unsafe manner in which the hotel was constructed.

A case supporting the doctrine that obstacles and obstructions arising from defects in construction or maintenance will furnish the connecting link between the negligence and injury is Arnold v. National Starch Co. 194 N. Y. 47, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 178, 86 N. E. 815. In that case suit was brought by a party injured in a fire to recover damages on account of the failure to have the building equipped with fire escapes, and one of the defenses was that the failure to have the fire escapes was not the proximate cause of the injury. In discussing this point the court said: "But . . . it is further urged in behalf of respondent that its failure to comply with the statute, even if mandatory, may not be made the basis of a recovery for any damages sustained by appellant on the occasion in question, because it was not established that the injuries resulted from such failure. This argument rests on two propositions,—the first one being that other sufficient means of escape were provided, and the second one that appellant's clothes and hair took fire immediately when the conflagration reached the room where she was, and that, therefore, her damages accrued before she could possibly have reached the fire escape, if provided. The evidence, in my judgment, permitted the jury to find against this argument, and both of the propositions involved in it. . . . And, on the other proposition, while the evidence may not establish with mathematical accuracy just when the fire reached appellant's clothes and person with reference to its first appearance on the floor, or with reference to her final escape therefrom many minutes afterwards, still, as I read it, it permitted the jury to find that, as the result of an accumulation of inflammable dust and material, the fire spread very rapidly throughout the floor; that appellant came in contact with it, and was set on fire some time after it first appeared; and that, if there had been statutory and convenient fire escapes from the windows, she might have escaped thereby before becoming on fire, and, conversely, that the failure to comply with the statute resulted in her detention in the burning room for many unnecessary minutes, and that such detention and inability to escape caused and contributed to her injuries."

Another case is Kohn v. Clark, 236 Pa. 18, 84 Atl. 692, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 775. In that case the plaintiff brought suit to recover damages upon the ground that the building in which he was employed was not equipped with fire escapes. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the ground that it did not appear that the failure to provide the building with fire escapes was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. In considering this feature of the case the court said that the statute provided that "the number and location of such escapes to be governed by the size of the building and the number of its inmates, and arranged in such a way as to make them reasonably accessible, safe, and adequate for the escape of said inmates."

And that "whether the one external fire escape that was here constructed was an adequate provision for escape during a fire, considering the size of the building and the number of inmates, and whether it was so arranged as to make it readily accessible, safe, and adequate for the escape of the inmates, were clearly questions for the jury. We have no disposition to weaken by refinement of construction the obligation which this wise and salutary legislation imposes on the owners of such buildings. The act provides an easy way by which they may relieve themselves of responsibility. . . . So, too, we think the question of proximate cause was for the jury. It may be that one cause of plaintiff's failure to escape unhurt was want of familiarity on the part of the operatives with the means of escape that had been provided; but, suppose the means provided were found to be short of what the law requires,—a matter which the jury as we have said alone could determine,—in such case to hold want of familiarity to have been the proximate cause is to imply a duty on the part of the employer to make good the owner's default, by instructing and training his employees as to the best way of using inadequate means of escape.

What circumstances, it may be inquired, are in the record conducing to show that the death of Morgan was attributable to the failure to have this building equipped in the manner pointed out in the instructions, and conducing to show that the negligent construction of the building and the location of room No. 1 would have prevented Morgan from reaching the fire escape, if the building had been supplied with one? Morgan and his companions, it should be kept in mind, died before they had an opportunity to make any statement connected with the transaction, and as no one else saw or heard them from the time they entered this room until the firemen discovered them in a dead or dying condition in room No. 2, there is a total failure to show what efforts they made to escape, aside from the circumstance that they broke the door and went from room No. 1 into room No. 2, and the further circumstance that the door of room No. 1, opening into the little hall, was unlocked, but that they did make every possible effort that men, situated as they were, could make to escape, cannot be doubted in the light of universal human experience. But it is said by counsel that the flames and fumes and smoke spread through the hallways so rapidly that these men could not have stayed the fire with a chemical extinguisher or a hose if there had been one in the hall, nor could they have found their way to a fire escape in the front of the building if one had been there located. Possibly, indeed probably, this may be so in view of the unsafe and dangerous construction of the interior of the hotel, when considered in connection with the location of the room occupied by these men. Proceeding now with this argument a little further, the effect of it is that if guests in a hotel are put in a room from which escape, in case of fire, would be extremely difficult, if not wholly impracticable, there should be no recovery on account of the want of safety equipment, because if the equipment had been supplied, the guests could not avail themselves of its protection. To so construe the statute and ordinance would be to destroy the very purpose of their enactment, and give to them a meaning that would enable owners and lessees of fire traps, like the Seventh Avenue Hotel, to escape liability upon the ground that the rooms and halls were so located and situated as that guests could not avail themselves of fire escapes and other safety equipment if they had been provided. Of course, we cannot agree that the useful provisions of the statute and ordinance should be made worthless by such a construction. They were intended to promote the safety of guests in hotel buildings, and to afford them means of escape from injury and death in cases of fire, which are not infrequent occurrences in hotel buildings, and they should be given such a reasonable construction as would carry out the wholesome intent in their enactment.

Turning again to these legislative enactments, we find it provided that the hotel should be equipped with a fire escape, and that "the way of egress to such fire escapes shall, at all times, be kept free and clear of any and all obstructions of any and every nature."

And further that "the doors and passageways shall be arranged to facilitate egress in cases of fire, and to afford requisite and proper accommodations for the public protection in such cases."

It would be folly to erect fire escapes that were inaccessible, and therefore the plain meaning of these landowner—failure to provide egress from building—liability.

provisions is that the doors and halls in the hotel should be so arranged as to facilitate egress in cases of fire, and kept in such condition as to be, at all times and under all circumstances, free from obstructions of every kind, and so the statute and ordinance contemplated not only that the building shall be provided with fire escapes, but that the doors and passageways shall be so arranged as to facilitate egress in cases of fire; and it is equally as great a violation of these legislative requirements to fail to have the doors and passageways so arranged and kept as it is to fail to have the building supplied with fire escapes.

Now, we think it clear that the doors and hallways leading from room No. 1 were not so located or arranged as to facilitate egress in cases of fire, or to afford requisite and proper accommodations for the protection of guests; on the contrary, they were so located and arranged as to prevent egress in cases of fire, and to deny the requisite protection, and therefore the trust company will not be heard to say that Morgan could not have found his way to a fire escape if one had been put up, or have found his way out of the room to a place of safety if the building had been equipped with water and fire extinguishers.

In such a state of case as is here presented, the presumption is that Morgan could and would have escaped if the doors and halls had been so arranged as to facilitate egress and the building had been equipped with requisite appliances. For example, if there had been a door, as there should have been, opening from room No. 1 into the main hall in the brick building, it is scarcely to be doubted that Morgan and his companions could easily have made their escape, but as it was, they had no means of escape. Their means of escape had been cut off by the manner in which the hotel was constructed and maintained in violation of the statute and ordinance.

No presumption of negligence or that the failure of Morgan to escape was due to causes within his control is to be indulged in. In cases where death ensues as the result of a negligent act, there

presumption of negligence—
guest dying in

is no presumption of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. Contributory negligence may, of course, be relied on as a defense, but the burden of showing it is on the defendant. Anglea v. East Tennessee Teleph. Co. 142 Ky. 539, 134 S. W. 1119; Stuart v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 146 Ky. 127, 142 S. W. 232; Osborne v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 158 Ky. 176, 164 S. W. 818, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 449. We therefore think that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to take the case to the jury on the issue that the failure to have the building arranged and equipped in the manner pointed out in the instruction was the proximate cause of the death of Morgan.

Some effort is made to show that Morgan, on the night in question, was intoxicated, but we shall not take up time with this issue put in the case for the purpose of endeavoring to make out a defense of contributory negligence. Sufficient is it to say that there is no material evidence supporting this contention. Nor do we find any substantial error committed by the trial court in the instructions, or in the admission of evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

In most of the cases cited in this note in which the personal liability of the trustee, executor, or administrator has been affirmed, the question arose in an action by the person injured; and the decision against the trustee, executor, or administrator, does not necessarily in all cases imply that he will not be entitled to an allowance on his settlement with the estate on account of the liability he has thus incurred. That aspect of the subject seems to have been rarely presented.

In Keating v. Stevenson (1897) 21 App. Div. 604, 47 N. Y. Supp. 847, it was held that trustees under a will who became legal owners of realty, and were chargeable with the duty of repairing the premises, were personally liable for negligently failing to make repairs by reason of which another sustained an injury. The reasoning of the court in the case was that the trustees were the legal owners of the property, and that, having the entire ownership of the estate, the duty rested upon them to use reasonable care to keep it reasonably safe for those having occasion to use it. The court said: "The failure to repair being a neglect of the personal duty imposed upon the defendants by virtue of their legal ownership, they, in the first instance, must be held personally liable for it. There is no reason apparent upon this record why it could be held that the estate which they represented in a certain sense should be charged with any of the damages resulting from this act, which was imposed upon them personally. If it should turn out in the settlement of the estate, for any reason, that it was the estate, and not the defendants, which was properly chargeable with the payment of any damages for such neglect, undoubtedly the defendants would be authorized to retain the amount of such damages from the rents. But unless something of that kind was made to appear, the liability, being personal to the defendants, could not be made a charge upon the estate. The case is not like any of those in which it has been permitted to plaintiffs to maintain actions for negligence against receivers who were in possession of the property under the orders of the court. Such receivers are in no sense the owners of the property and they have not the legal title to it. The property is in the court for its management and administration, and the receiver is an officer of the court, being under its orders and carrying out its directions. The servants whom he is obliged to employ are employed by him solely in his official capacity and by virtue of his official duty, and they do not in any way represent him personally. For that reason it has been held in many cases that, in the absence of any personal neglect of the receiver, he is not liable personally for the neglect of his servants. Murphy v. Holbrook (1870) 20 Ohio St. 187, 5 Am. Rep. 633; Cardot v. Barney (1875) 63 N. Y. 281, 20 Am. Rep. 533; Barton v. Barbour (1881) 104 U. S. 128, 26 L. ed. 674. It is different in a case where the receiver is guilty of personal negligence, or where he has entered into some contract relation with the particular piece of property which was the subject of the negligence, so that he is personally responsible for its proper condition. In such a case he would be held liable for any neglect in the management of the property upon the sole ground of his legal relation to it as owner. Kain v. Smith (1880) 80 N. Y. 458. The duty of the care of the property seems to be one that is inherent in the ownership of it, and the distinction seems to be that the person who is legally the owner of the property has imposed upon him, by reason of that ownership, the duty of keeping it in proper repair, and that for a violation of that duty he is personally liable; whereas, if he has no title to the property, but simply performs certain duties which are imposed upon him with reference to it, his liability is not personal, but grows out of his official situation. It is to be noticed in this form of action the defendants would be liable to be arrested in a proper case, and if judgment went against them, a body execution might be issued against them. All of that shows that the violation of the duty insisted upon is one which is personal to them, and not official. The case of an action against an assignee in bankruptcy or a receiver or other trustee to foreclose his interest in the property is not analogous, because in that case the thing attacked is only his property right which is sought to be taken away, and for that reason it is necessary that he should be made a party in his official capacity. But in such a case as this no remedy is sought against the property. It is against the individual for his personal neglect. The rule is similar to that one which is applied in actions against executors for acts done by them in regard to the management of the property which they held in their official capacity. They have the legal title to this property, and, having that, they are personally responsible, by reason of the legal title, to third parties dealing with them with relation to the property, precisely as though no one else had any beneficial interest in it."

And trustees having possession of real property under a devise in a will are liable in their individual capacity for an injury to one caused by a negligent failure to repair a coalhole in the sidewalk in front of the premises. O'Malley v. Gerth (1902) 67 N. J. L. 610, 52 Atl. 563, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 121.

And in Everett v. Foley (1907) 132 Ill. App. 438, where by a will trustees were given exclusive control of property and directed to keep and perfect the estate, and provided with means to keep up repairs, they were held personally liable to one who sustained an injury by being struck by a blind which was negligently allowed to remain in an unsafe condition. The court said: "It is next insisted that there was no right of action against appellants, first, because they were only possessed as trustees under the will of James Campbell; and second, because they had leased the premises to the Wonderland Company. The will gives the premises to appellants as trustees, giving them exclusive control over the property until ten years after the death of testator's widow, and gives them authority to mortgage it to the extent of $50,000, to improve and repair it, and to preserve it from waste. It directs them to take possession of, keep, and protect the estate, and provides the means to keep up repairs, if the income should not be sufficient. Appellants accepted the trust by qualifying under the will and taking charge of the property. All persons who had occasion to deal with this property must do so through the appellants. All the duties which devolve upon the owners of property were the duties of appellants, and if,

And in Belvin v. French (1887) 84 Va. 81, 3 S. E. 891, executors to whom real estate was devised in trust to hold and keep in repair were held personally liable for an injury sustained to one by their negligence in failing to keep an area light in the sidewalk in repair. The court said: "The jury also found that the negligence of the defendants was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, which undoubtedly renders them personally responsible. And why, we ask, should they not be liable for their own neglect of a plain official duty? Grant, as we do, that the principle invoked in their behalf is a correct one, namely, that fiduciaries ought not to be dealt with by such harshness as to deter a prudent man from accepting the trust, yet, on the other hand, it is equally true that a fiduciary ought not to be permitted to manage the trust estate in his hands in such a manner as to injure others with impunity, so far as any personal liability on his part is concerned, and to hold that the defendants are not personally liable in the present case would be as inconsistent with natural justice as with the well-settled principles of the common law."

And executors having control and possession of a building are personally liable for the death of one killed by a window which fell upon him because of a failure to keep the building in repair. Ferrier v. Trépannier (1894) 24 Can. S. C. 86. The court stated that there could be but one answer as to the personal liability of the executors, that they were the parties primarily liable and the guilty parties in the first degree, that it was their personal fault and negligence which was the immediate cause of the accident, that they were at the time in actual possession of the building, which was under their exclusive control and superintendence, and that, whether as trustees or executors or in any other fiduciary capacity, it did not in any way lessen their personal liability for tortious negligence whereby a third party suffered damage.

And in Boston Beef Packing Co. v. Stevens (1882) 20 Blatchf. 443, 12 Fed. 279, executors were held liable personally for damage sustained by an adjoining owner by the fall of a building belonging to the estate which they had leased as a warehouse, and which was unsafe and unfit for use as a warehouse at the time it was let.

And executors in control and possession of a building are personally liable to one rightfully therein who is injured by neglect to keep the premises in repair. Donohue v. Kendall (1884) 18 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 386, affirmed in (1885) 98 N. Y. 685. The court stated that it was supposed that the executors had no power to repair, and that it was conceivable that they had not such power at the expense of the estate, but that the presumption was otherwise; that however this might be, they had the power to make repairs at their own expense, and were not compelled to go into control of the property if they did not see fit to do so.

And in Bannigan v. Woodbury (1909) 158 Mich. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 371, 122 N. W. 531, it was held that an administrator, having control and possession of a building belonging to the intestate, is chargeable with the duty of keeping the building in a safe condition, and is personally liable for his negligence in failing to repair the building by reason of which a pedestrian is injured by a window falling from the building.

And in T. L. Horn Trunk Co. v. Delano (1912) 162 Mo. App. 402, 142 S. W. 770, it was held that an administratrix was individually liable for negligence in failing to keep a tank on leased property of the estate in proper repair, by reason of which a tenant suffered loss of his goods.

It has been held, however, where a will vested a title to premises in executors, but contained nothing in any way bearing upon their duties in respect to the house, and gave a right to occupy it to the testator's widow, that the executors were not liable for an injury sustained through the unsafe and defective condition of the house, although they had knowledge thereof. Butler v. Townsend (1895) 84 Hun, 100, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1094. The court stated that the executors were not entitled to the possession, use, or management of the house, and that as the will made no provision for repairs and conferred no authority upon them to devote any part of the estate to that purpose, they failed to see upon what theory the executors could be held liable, and stated further that the duty of keeping premises in a safe condition pertained to occupancy, and not to ownership, and that in the case at bar the use and occupation of the property were given to the widow, and that the executors never had been in control or management thereof.

And it has been held that an executor who takes no estate in the lands of the testator, but has merely a naked power to receive the rents, is not personally liable to a tenant who sustains damage through the defective construction and maintenance of a building. Robbins v. Mount (1867) 4 Robt. (N. Y.) 553.

c. With respect to negligence of employees.

In some cases trustees under wills and executors and administrators have been held personally liable for injuries or damage sustained because of the negligence of persons employed in administering the trust. Kalua v. Camarinos (1898) 11 Haw. 557; McCue v. Finck (1897) 20 Misc. 506, 46 N. Y. Supp. 242; Gatti-McQuade Co. v. Flynn (1913) 79 Misc. 430, 140 N. Y. Supp. 185; Deschler v. Franklin (1900) 11 Ohio C. D. 188; Parmenter v. Barstow (1900) 22 R. I. 245, 63 L.R.A. 227, 47 Atl. 365.

In Kalua v. Camarinos (1898) 11 Haw. 557, an administrator who was carrying on the intestate's business was held personally liable for injuries suffered in a collision with a wagon, which was caused by the negligence of one employed by him as a driver, who at the time of the injury was acting within the scope of his employment. The court in this case said: "The de-defendant's counsel in their brief assert that defendant was not carrying on the business as a trader, but merely to preserve its good will until such time as it could be sold, under the direction and by the authority of the probate court. We do not find this position supported by the pleadings or the proofs adduced below. This is a complete answer to the contention of defendant's counsel that an administrator is only responsible for damages or injuries caused either directly by himself or indirectly by his negligence. Defendant was not winding up his intestate's estate. Kondo was employed by the defendant, and the alleged trespass was committed by Kondo while driving the wagon in the scope of his employment in the fruit store business. Defendant was his master. According to well-settled law, not disputed by defendant, the master is responsible to third persons for injuries through the negligence of his servant while acting within the scope of his employment. This is so because every master is bound to employ servants that are both skilful and careful. So far as third persons are concerned Kondo was the servant of defendant. . . . In this case the law casts upon the defendant the same responsibility to third parties for the acts of his servants as is cast upon all masters or employers of servants. Whether the master employs them in the business of his decedent or his own business it makes no difference."

And in McCue v. Finck (1897) 20 Misc. 506, 46 N. Y. Supp. 242, it was held that an executor carrying on a business under a will was liable individually, and not in his representative capacity, for a negligent injury sustained by a truck driven by an employee.

And in Gatti-McQuade Co. v. Flynn (1913) 79 Misc. 430, 140 N. Y. Supp. 135, it was held in an action to recover for an injury sustained through the negligence of a driver employed by an administratrix, that an administratrix committing a tort, either personally or by an agent, is liable therefor in her personal capacity, and not in her representative capacity, and the complaint in this case was construed to state a good cause of action against the administratrix in her individual capacity.

And it has been stated that one holding property as trustee under a will is personally liable for an injury sustained by another by being struck in the eye by chips of stone which were negligently caused to fly into the plaintiff's face by persons employed on the property while she was passing on the sidewalk. Parmenter v. Barstow (1900) 22 R. I. 245, 63 L.R.A. 227, 47 Atl. 365. The action in this case, however, was against the trustee in his official capacity.

And in Deschler v. Franklin (1900) 11 Ohio C. D. 188, which was an action against executors to recover for an injury claimed to have been sustained through the negligent operation of an elevator in a building belonging to the estate, the court refused to hold the executors liable in their representative capacity, and stated that if any cause arises through the negligence of an executor in managing an estate, the action must be against him personally, and not against him in his representative capacity.

In some cases, however, the courts have refused to hold trustees under wills, or personal representatives, liable for injuries or damage resulting from the negligence of employees.

Thus, in Fetting v. Winch (1909) 54 Or. 600, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 379, 104 Pac. 722, 21 Ann. Cas. 352, where it was sought to hold an executor liable for the death of an assistant janitor in a building belonging to the estate, which was alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the head janitor in placing an inexperienced person in charge of an elevator, it was held that no recovery could be had. The court stated that if liable at all, as the act was beyond the scope of his official capacity, the executor must be sued as an individual; that a judgment against him personally for damages sustained on account of a personal injury must rest either on the principle of respondet superior, or on the breach of some duty amounting to actionable negligence, or on his independent tort, and that the maxim of respondeat superior is bottomed on the principle that he who expects to derive advantage from an act which is done by another for him must answer for an injury which a third person may sustain from it, and said that there was no testimony to show that the executor in the case at bar was managing the building for his own profit, or that he derived or expected to derive any advantage or profit from the employment of the head janitor, and that in the absence of such evidence it could not be legally said that he was individually liable for the janitor's act, and that the evidence did not show any act of negligence on the part of the executor that would render him liable for damages caused by the carelessness of the head janitor, whom the complaint alleged was competent. The court in this case recognized the rule that when the law imposes a duty on an executor or administrator and he neglects to discharge the obligation thus enjoined, whereby another sustains an injury, the personal representative is liable therefor.

In Benett v. Wyndham (1862) 4 De G. F. & J. 259, 45 Eng. Reprint, 1183, a trustee under a will was held entitled to recover from the estate the amount paid by him on a judgment recovered in an action in which it appeared that the trustee directed the bailiff to have certain trees cut, and that the latter ordered woodcutters, usually employed on the estate, to do the work, and that in the process thereof a tree fell and injured the plaintiff, who was passing. The court said: "The trustee in this case appears to have meant well, to have acted with due diligence, and to have employed a proper agent to do an act the directing which to be done was within the due discharge of his duty. The agent makes a mistake the consequences of which subject the trustee to legal liability to a third party. I am of opinion that this liability ought, as between the trustee and the estate, to be borne by the estate."

And in Re Raybould [1900] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 199, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 248, 48 Week. Rep. 301, 82 L. T. N. S. 46, where a trustee and executor carried on a colliery, it was held that an adjoining landowner whose land had been let down without recklessness or improper working of the mine was entitled to recover directly from the testator's estate for the damage suffered. The court relied upon the decision in Bennett v. Wyndham (Eng.) supra, holding that there was no personal liability on the part of the trustee in the absence of negligence on his part.

And there is an obiter statement in Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation (1908) 128 App. Div. 214, 112 N. Y. Supp. 566, which was an action of negligence against a charitable corporation, that a trustee under a will, or a like trustee, is not individually liable for the negligence of servants employed in the administration of the trust unless he was himself negligent.

d. Violation of statute.

It will be observed that in the reported case (LOUISVILLE TRUST CO. v. MORGAN, ante, 396) a trustee managing an estate under a trust in a will, who leased a hotel belonging to the estate without complying with the statutes and ordinances with respect to fire escapes and extinguishers, was held individually liable for injuries to guests because of the absence of such equipment.

And it has been held that testamentary trustees of a tenement house under a trust imposing the duty of keeping the property in repair upon them were personally liable for an injury sustained by a tenant because of the trustees' failure to properly light a hallway as required by a statute. Gillick v. Jackson (1903) 40 Misc. 627, 83 N. Y. Supp. 29. The court stated that so far as the tenant was concerned, the trustees were the owners of the building; that trustees of an express trust in real estate, where the will creating the trust imposes upon the trustees the duty of managing, leasing, and keeping in repair the property, are, by virtue of the legal title which is vested in them, liable personally, at least in the first instance, and not in their representative capacity, for failure to perform their duty.

And in McAdams v. Starr (1901) 74 Conn. 85, 92 Am. St. Rep. 197, 49 Atl. 897, an administrator was held the "owner," within the meaning of § 376, Gen. Stat., of a dog which had belonged to the intestate, and it was accordingly held that judgment might be rendered personally against the administrator for an injury resulting from a bite by the dog. The exact terms of the statute do not appear, nor does there appear to have been any personal negligence by the administrator.

II. Receivers.

For the distinction between testamentary trustees and receivers as bearing upon their personal liability, see Keating v. Stevenson, cited and quoted supra, I. b.

As to statute creating presumption of negligence against railroad company as applicable to receiver operating road, see annotation to Lamb v. Floyd, 1 A.L.R. 1180.

Cases involving the liability of receivers are not included unless it is clear that the court was considering their individual or personal liability.

In the absence of personal negligence a receiver is held not individually liable for the negligence of employees causing injury to a third person, since he is held master only in his official capacity.

New York.—Cardot v. Barney (1875) 63 N. Y. 281, 20 Am. Rep. 533; Camp v. Barney (1875) 4 Hun, 375.

In Davis v. Duncan (1884) 19 Fed. 477, in considering the right to recover for injuries sustained through the negligence of employees of a railroad after a receiver had surrendered and turned the road back, the court said: "The railroad company took the property cum onere as to these claims. A receiver, as such, upon principle and authority is not personally liable for the torts of his employees. Were he so liable few men would take the responsibility of such a trust; it is only when he himself commits the wrong that he is held personally liable. The proceedings against him as receiver for the wrongs of his employees is in the nature of a proceeding in rem and renders the property in his hands, as such, liable for compensation for such injuries." To the same effect is Gray v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. (1907) 84 C. C. A. 392, 156 Fed. 736.

And in Erskine v. McIlrath (1895) 60 Minn. 485, 62 N. W. 1130, it was held that the liability of a receiver of a railroad for a personal injury caused by the negligence of an employee arises only by reason of the doctrine of respondeat superior, and that in his individual capacity the receiver is not the master of the servant causing the injury, but is such only in his capacity of receiver, and that he is not personally liable for the negligence of servants employed by him to operate the railroad under the orders of the court.

And in Cardot v. Barney (1875) 63 N. Y. 281, 20 Am. Rep. 533, a receiver in bankruptcy of a railroad company was held not individually liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of his employees in the absence of any negligence on his own part; the court stated that there was good reason that one employing another in his business should be responsible for his acts, but that it knew of no principle upon which a receiver, or other officer of a court, merely obeying its orders, having no interest in the prosecution of the work, and deriving no profit from it, should be answerable except for his own acts and neglects.

And in McNulta v. Ensich (1890) 134 Ill. 46, 24 N. E. 631, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 675, a judgment against a receiver of a railway rendered against him personally in an action to recover for personal injuries sustained through the negligence of employees engaged in the operation of the railroad was reversed, the court stating that no judgment could be rendered against the receiver individually, but that it must be entered against him as receiver and be payable out of the funds held by him in that capacity in the due course of the administration of his receivership.

And in Averill v. McCook (1900) 86 Mo. App. 346, it was held error in an action against receivers of a railroad for killing a cow to enter a personal judgment against them, on the ground that the receivers were liable only in their official capacity, and that the judgment rendered would necessarily be paid from the funds in their hands as receivers.

And in Camp v. Barney (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 375, a receiver operating a railroad was held not personally liable for the neglect or misconduct of those employed by him, and the record and proceedings in an action against him individually to recover for personal injuries sustained by a passenger were amended so as to make the suit and judgment against him as receiver, and so payable out of the funds in his hands, instead of by him personally. The court stated that the receiver was personally liable, however, for his own neglect or misconduct.

And in Robinson v. Kirkwood (1900) 91 Ill. App. 54, a personal judgment against receivers was modified to stand against them officially. The court said: "It is true no personal judgment could be rendered against the receivers, nor could execution be awarded against them; the judgment should be entered against them as receivers and be made payable in due course of administration of their trust as such receivers."

In Erwin v. Davenport (1871) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 44, which was an action against the receiver of a railroad to recover for the death of an employee, an averment in the complaint that the receiver had knowledge of a material defect in the equipment of the train on which the employee was injured, and that with this knowledge he was running the train when the accident occurred, was held to state a good cause of action, the court saying that the agent is personally responsible whether he did the wrong intentionally or ignorantly by the authority of his principal, for the latter could not confer upon him any authority to commit a wrong upon the rights of another. It was held, however, that the receiver's responsibility did not extend to nonfeasance or mere negligence, and certain declarations which merely alleged negligence were held not to state good causes of action.

In Vasele v. Grant Street Electric R. Co. (1897) 16 Wash. 602, 48 Pac. 249, an action to recover for personal injuries against a corporation and its receiver was held to fail as to the latter where the title of the cause merely designated him as "receiver," without the word "as" preceding, and the complaint, although it stated that he was a duly appointed and qualified receiver of the road, did not aver that he had charge and control as the receiver of the company, and it was distinctly averred that the motorman whose alleged negligence caused the injury was the agent of the defendant company.

In Kain v. Smith (1880) 80 N. Y. 458, a receiver of a railway appointed in one state, in possession of another road in New York under a lease, was held liable in an action against him individually for injuries to an employee from defective apparatus, the court holding that he could not shield himself from liability on the ground that he was a receiver.

And under similar facts a like conclusion was reached in Lyman v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1886) 59 Vt. 167, 10 Atl. 346.

III. Other trustees.

In Ballou v. Farnum (1864) 9 Allen

(Mass.) 47, trustees of a railroad named in a mortgage, who were operating it for the benefit of the bondholders and who had executed a lease of a part of the road to other parties, but continued to operate it for the lessees, and to select and discharge all employees, and exercise all the powers usually exercised by railroad corporations over their own roads, were held to stand in the relation of master and servant with the employees and to be personally liable for an injury to a person which was caused through the negligence of an employee in the performance of his duties.

And in Fallardeal v. Boston Art Students' Asso. (1903) 182 Mass. 405, 65 N. E. 797, where it was sought to hold a corporation liable for the negligence of a person employed as janitor by trustees in the control and management of a building under an assignment by the corporation of a lease of the building held by the corporation, the court refused to hold the corporation liable, and stated that according to the terms of the assignment no one had any right to interfere with the control and management of the premises by the trustees, that they entered into possession under the assignment and continued their control over the premises until after the accident, and that the janitor was their servant, and that if there was any liability the trustees, and not the corporation, were liable.

And it has been held that one in control of a tenement house by virtue of a trust, who causes the stairways to be improperly and negligently repaired, and allows that condition to go into further defect whereby a tenant is injured, is personally liable for the injury. Trani v. Gerard (1918) 181 App. Div. 387, 168 N. Y. Supp. 808. The court stated that although the defendant's opportunity to do the things complained of came from his trusteeship, yet his negligent doing was an individual misfeasance. It refrained from passing upon his liability for a nonfeasance, stating that that question was not before them. It does not expressly appear in this case how the trust was created.

And in Norling v. Allee (1890) 31 N. Y. S. R. 412, 10 N. Y. Supp. 97, where one of three trustees was sued in his representative capacity to recover for an injury sustained through the blowing down of a fence, it was held that the trustee was not liable for negligence, and that the remedy, if any, was against the trustees personally. It does not appear in this case in what particular way the trust was created.

Trustees empowered by a deed of trust to deal with property and conduct a business as if they were the absolute owners thereof have been held not liable for an injury sustained through the negligence of a servant employed by them in the conduct of the business, where there was a provision in the deed of trust that no responsibility whatever should result to the trustees by reason of misconduct of agents or employees, and that there should be no liability or responsibility for negligence upon the part of the trustees, the intention clearly being that the risk of loss because of negligence on the part of the employees should be assumed and borne by the estate. Prinz v. Lucas (1905) 210 Pa. 620, 60 Atl. 309, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 245.

In Fisheries Co. v. McCoy (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 202 S. W. 343, it was held that trustees of a joint stock association were personally liable for negligence resulting in injury to an employee, and that they could not make a valid contract with an employee relieving them from such liability.

In Baker v. Tibbetts (1895) 162 Mass. 468, 89 N. E. 350, which was an action in which it was sought to charge a trustee for the benefit of creditors for a personal injury, on the ground that his agent, acting within the scope of his employment, invited the plaintiff into a place of hidden danger, by reason of which he was injured, the court stated that the fact that the defendant held the title to the property as trustee would not reduce him to the position of an intermediate agent between the real principal and the person actually causing the damage. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Chaves County (McClure, J.) convicting him of larceny of cattle. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. L. O. Fullen, for appellant:

The alleged confession of the defendant was not a free and voluntary confession; it was obtained through the offer of "hope and reward."

Mr. Carl H. Gilbert, Special Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Mechem, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant appeals from a conviction of larceny of cattle. His confession of the crime to Lee J. Richards, a cattle and hide inspector, and to W. A. Hamilton, the owner of the stolen cattle, was introduced by the state over appellant's objection that the same was involuntary, having been induced by promises of immunity made by both Richards and Hamilton. The court was of the opinion that there was a conflict in the evidence whether the confession was voluntary or involuntary, and let it go to the jury, under an instruction that if they believed that the confession was voluntary they could consider it in arriving at their verdict, but if they believed that it was involuntary they should not so consider it. This action of the court is assigned as error.

The undisputed facts in the case are: That the appellant, learning that he was under suspicion, went into hiding. That his mother went to a neighbor, H. C. Hammond, and asked him to see what could be done in appellant's behalf. Hammond called on Richards and asked him to see Hamilton, and see if Hamilton would be inclined to deal leniently with the appellant, if the appellant would come in and tell all he knew about the case. Richards told Hammond that he (Richards) would see Hamilton, and if Hamilton would help the appellant, Richards would bring Hamilton to Hammond's house at a named hour, and that if they came Hammond could inform appellant that Hamilton would help the appellant, if he would come to Hammond's house and meet them, and tell them all he knew about the case. Hammond so informed the appellant, and when, according to the arrangement, Richards and Hamilton came to his house, Hammond sent for the appellant, who came in, met Richards and Hamilton, and confessed. There is a conflict in the testimony whether or not, at the time appellant confessed and immediately prior thereto, Richards and Hamilton promised him immunity. Richards denies that they did. The appellant testified that they made him the promises immediately before he confessed. Hamilton did not appear as a witness in the case.

But we believe the court misapprehended the conclusive effect of the facts leading up to the making of the confession, for it was established by the testimony of all the witnesses, including Hammond, that the confession was brought about by Richards telling Hammond that he (Richards) would see how Hamilton felt about the matter, and if Hamilton would not push the case, Richards would bring Hamilton to Hammond's house for a meeting with appellant, and that Hammond could tell appellant that, if they came, appellant could understand that Hamilton would not prosecute him.

Richards, just before leaving the stand, testified as follows:

Q. And do you know you arranged a meeting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you conveyed the impression, by what you said and what you did, to Hammond, that if the boy did come up there with Hammond that he could know that it was all right, and that Hamilton was not going to prosecute him. Didn't you?

A. Well that was—appeared to be kinder the understanding.

Q. Well, appeared to be; you was there, and your old brain works. You know what you did; that was what happened, wasn't it?

A. Well, we went over there two or three times.

Q. Well, just answer the question, Mr. Richards; you know that the arrangement was made, and that was the understanding, that when the boy showed up there and told about this thing, that Hamilton, the owner of these cattle, and you, as far as you could, was going to help the boy; now, wasn't that the arrangement?

A. Well, yes, in a way it was.

Q. Well, in a way it was; wasn't the way, not in way; wasn't that the arrangement?

A. That was the agreement between us and Hammond; we made no agreement with the boy, and had no conversation with the boy.

Q. But you did make an agreement with Hammond, and, Hammond had talked with you for the boy, didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

At another point in his examination Richards testified:

Q. Were you requested by Hammond to get anything in the nature of a promise on the part of Hamilton as to what he would do, any definite or specific promise as to what he would do, if the boy would talk and tell what he knew?

A. Well, that was the nature of it; it was to get Hamilton and see Hamilton's feelings in the case, and I don't suppose that, if Hamilton had said, "No, I am going to prosecute the boy to the full limit, every way, don't matter whether he talks or don't talk," I don't suppose there ever would have been any meeting made between us and the boy; but, as I said before, Hamilton felt like there might be somebody else interested in it, and the boy said he wanted to tell the facts of the case, but he did not say what the facts were, or did not lead us to believe what the facts were in any way.

There was no necessity of Richards repeating to appellant the promises, theretofore conveyed to appellant by Hammond, to make the inducement complete. The promises communicated to appellant by Hammond were confirmed by both Richards and Hamilton, by their going to meet the appellant, pursuant to the arrangement they made with Hammond, and of which the appellant had notice. The appellant's confession was involuntary, and the court erred in admitting it.

Appellee insists that, even though the confession was involuntary, the promises which induced it were not made by persons in authority. But the question must not be whether the persons making the promises were persons in authority—that is, capable of performing their assurances of immunity, but were they in such a situation that the person confessing might reasonably consider them as persons able to afford him aid? 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 1234. That the appellant in this case had abundant reason to believe that the owner of the cattle and a cattle inspector had it in their power to do him very considerable favors, in the situation he was in, is not to be seriously questioned.

There is no more convincing evidence to the ordinary man than a confession of guilt, and where a confession is admitted, under an instruction to the jury to determine whether it is voluntary or involuntary, and to consider it in the former case, or in the latter case to reject it, the probabilities are, unless the confession was extorted under circumstances calculated to arouse sympathy for the defendant, that the average jury will consume but little time in determining the question of whether the confession was voluntary or involuntary, but will, in the great majority of cases, say the prisoner has confessed, and therefore is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to grant appellant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

Parker, Ch. J., and Roberts, J., concur.

  - a. Generally, 436.
  - b. Confession held not admissible, 437.
  - c. Confession held admissible, 439.

I. Introductory.

The general doctrine is indisputable that confessions which are made under promises of immunity are considered as made under mental duress, and therefore incompetent as evidence. 1 R. C. L. 564. But whether they are so extorted must depend on the character of the authority, power, or influence by which they are induced. It is the purpose of this note to show what persons are considered as clothed with authority sufficient to justify the exclusion of confessions made under promises held out by them.

II. Prosecutor.

It is held, almost without exception, that a prosecutor, or a person representing him, is a "person in authority," within the meaning of the rule excluding confessions made under promise of immunity held out by one in authority.

As to a promise of immunity by the employer of the accused, where the offense is against the property of the employer, see infra, X.

In Sullivan v. State (Ark.) supra, it appeared that the defendant, suspected of complicity in a larceny of meat, was induced to make a confession of guilt on a promise by the owner of the meat that he would be made a state's witness, and that he would not be bound over or prosecuted, "if he would testify against the Allen boys." The owner of the meat held no official position, but he was the prosecutor, and it was held that, as such, he was a person "in authority," within the meaning of the law, and the court accordingly held the confession to be involuntary, and inadmissible in evidence.

So, where a boy of tender years, accused of burning a barn, was told by the owner of the barn that if he would tell the truth "he would get out of it better," and the accused thereupon confessed his guilt, it was held that the confession was inadmissible. State v. Jackson (Del.) supra.

In People v. Williams (Cal.) supra, it appeared that the defendant, accused of rape, was induced to go with the brothers of the prosecutrix to the office of the city marshal, and was there confronted with the prosecutrix. He was told by the brothers, in the presence of the marshal and the prosecutrix, that if he would make a statement exonerating the prosecutrix that he could go free, but if he declared his innocence he would be prosecuted. Thereupon the prosecutrix made a statement as to the alleged occurrences. The defendant "made no reply, but just sat there and kind of cowed right down." The court held that this silence did not imply an admission, but, granting that it did, the admission was not voluntary, because induced by the suggested promise that he could go free if he admitted his guilt.

Where the defendant, accused of the larceny of money, was induced to make a confession of guilt by a promise held out by the owner of the money that, if the defendant would tell where the money was hid and how it had been divided, he would not "prosecute him heavy," and that all that he wanted was his money, it was held that the confession was inadmissible. Rector v. Com. (1882) 80 Ky. 468.

In State v. Foster (1907) 136 Iowa, 527, 114 N. W. 36, it appeared that the defendant, charged with assault with intent to murder her husband, on being promised immunity from prosecution by her husband, made a detailed statement of the facts connecting her with the crime. Later in the day she repeated the confession in the presence of two attorneys and the physician attending her husband. The court said: "Even if defendant's husband had assured her in the morning, before her first statement was made, that he had no desire to prosecute her, she could not assume in the afternoon, when the whole situation had been changed by reason of her disclosures, and two attorneys had been summoned, one of them the county attorney, to listen to what she had to say, that she was speaking under any immunity or promise of exemption. And as already indicated, the testimony of the state directly negated any continuing promise or inducements being held out to her. Under these circumstances the fact that the statements in the morning may have been made under such inducements as to justify the exclusion of the evidence with reference thereto would not render the confession in the afternoon inadmissible."

Where a person accused of arson was induced to make a confession of guilt by the prosecutor, who told him that it would be better for him if he turned state's evidence, thereby raising a hope of immunity, it was held that the confession was inadmissible.

State v. Mims (1891) 43 La. Ann. 532, 9 So. 118.

In Boyd v. State (1840) 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 39, it appeared that the defendant was charged with maliciously disfiguring a horse by cutting off its tail and mane. One of the witnesses at whose house the act charged took place testified that after defendant and Depew were arrested he said to them that if they would acknowledge that they did it in a frolic, and from no disrespect to his family, he would forgive them and use his endeavors to get the owner to drop the prosecution. Depew then said: "We have done it out of a frolic," and Boyd, the defendant, "that it was not done out of any harm, or with any view to disgrace witness's family." The court said: "It was the duty and province of the court in this case to have excluded the evidence of confession. The proof was direct and manifest that the confession was obtained by a promise that witness would attempt to put an end to the prosecution."

In Deathridge v. State (1853) 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 75, it appeared that the prisoner, accused of arson, was told by the person who had him in custody that it was best "to retract and tell all about it," and if he did not he could save him no longer; that the prosecutor then came up and told the prisoner that "it was best to turn state's evidence, and get out of it." A confession thus induced was held inadmissible in evidence.

In State v. Dye (1913) 36 Nev. 143, 133 Pac. 935, it appeared that a prisoner charged with arson, while in jail, was visited by the prosecutor who said to him: "Bill, I want the principals in this proposition. It wouldn't do me much good to send you to prison, for they could hire someone to do the job again. Bill, I want the head man in this." The prisoner thereupon made a full confession. It was held that the confession was inadmissible in evidence.

In Com. v. Tuckerman (1857) 10 Gray (Mass.) 173, it appeared that a prisoner charged with embezzlement of the funds of a corporation was told by a stockholder and director of the corporation, whom he had been led to believe had great influence with the other directors and could stop a prosecution, that he (the stockholder and director) had no vindictive feelings toward the prisoner, and intended to do whatever was right and proper to prevent his arrest, or the institution of a prosecution against him. It was held that the confession made on the strength of this inducement was inadmissible in evidence.

So where, in the presence of the prosecutor, a stranger told the prisoner that if he would confess, being in custody, his confession could not be used against him, it was held that the confession thus obtained was inadmissible in evidence. State v. Roberts (1827) 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 259.

In Rex v. Warickshall (1783) 1 Leach, C. L. (Eng.) 263, in which it appeared that the prisoner, charged as an accessory after the fact with having received stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, was induced to make a confession by promises of favor held out by the prosecutor, it was held that the confession was inadmissible in evidence.

In Rex v. Jones (1809) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 152, it appeared that the prosecutor said to a prisoner charged with theft that he only wanted his money, and that if the prisoner gave him that he might go to the devil, if he pleased. The prisoner took 11s. 6d. out of his pocket, and said it was all he had left of it. The prisoner was found guilty. It was held that the evidence was not admissible, and the conviction wrong.

So where the son of the prosecutor told the accused that his father had told him to promise that if accused would confess and tell on all the others who were engaged in it, he would be turned loose, it was held that a confession subsequently made on the strength of the promise of immunity was inadmissible. Owen v. State (1885) 78 Ala. 425, 56 Am. Rep. 40, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 206.

But it has been held that while the magistrate before whom the prisoner, together with one jointly charged with the same offense, was examined, is a "person in authority," the owner of the barn, for the burning of which the accused is charged, is not a person in authority. Wolf v. Com. (1878) 30 Gratt. (Va.) 833.

Where one accused of stealing certain articles called the prosecutrix aside during the preliminary trial, and told her that if she would dismiss the prosecution he would try to get her things for her, and she then promised him that she would dismiss the prosecution, it was held that the confession was not induced by the promise of immunity, but was antecedent to, and therefore, of necessity, uninfluenced by, it. Murdock v. State (1881) 68 Ala. 567.

So where one accused of shooting mules was told by the owner of the mules that all he (the owner) wanted was compensation for his mules, and if accused would pay him for them he would not prosecute him, and that would be the end of it, it was held that a confession of guilt was voluntary, since the promise of the prosecutor was given not for a confession, but for compensation for the mules. Meadows v. State (1902) 136 Ala. 67, 34 So. 183.

See also Womack v. State (1884) 16 Tex. App. 178, wherein it appeared that the prosecutor, Henderson, told the defendant that he, Henderson, had consulted with the district attorney, and that officer had authorized him to say that if defendant would turn state's evidence against his codefendant Fuller, he (defendant) would not be prosecuted, and also that the prosecutor would file no complaint against him. Under these promises the defendant made a confession, and the lower court admitted it in evidence against the defendant on the ground that he had repudiated the agreement by refusing to testify against Fuller. The court said: "That defendant subsequently repudiated the agreement does not, and cannot, affect the question as to the circumstances under which the confession was made. At the time it was made, was he not induced to make it through the promise or hope held out to him by Henderson? If so, then no subsequent act of bad faith on his part could or would render valid and legal that which per se was illegal and inadmissible as a voluntary confession."

On the trial of an indictment for larceny, it appeared that the owner of the goods, on the prisoner's expressing regret for having committed the offense, promised not to prosecute him; but on meeting the constable shortly afterwards the prisoner was told by that officer that the matter could not be settled in that way, and the prisoner was arrested. A subsequent confession was held admissible in evidence against the prisoner. Ward v. People (1842) 3 Hill (N. Y.) 395.

III. Prosecuting attorney.

In People v. Buckminster (1916) 274 Ill. 435, 113 N. E. 713, it appeared that one Fink, having been promised immunity for his part therein by the assistant state's attorney, confessed that he had been hired by the defendant to burn a certain building. The court held the confession inadmissible.

In State v. Johnson (1878) 30 La. Ann. 881, it appeared that the defendant was induced to confess to the offense of grand larceny by a promise held out by the district attorney that he might be used as a state's witness. The court held the confession inadmissible in evidence.

Where an agent is sent by the prosecuting attorney to a person accused of crime for the purpose of obtaining admissions, and tells the person that he is authorized by the prosecuting attorney to find out who the parties were that were concerned with him, and that it would be better for his interest and save him a heavy fine if he would own up who the parties were, it was held that a confession thus obtained was inadmissible in evidence. Searles v. State (1892) 6 Ohio C. C. 331, 3 Ohio C. D. 478.

In Simmons v. State (1883) 61 Miss. 243, it appeared that one McIntosh, of counsel for the prosecution and "the leading spirit" in it, had told the prisoner that if he would tell what he knew of the murder of General Tucker, he (McIntosh) would do all he could to save him; and it was after this that the prisoner made a confession of guilt. It was held that the confession was not admissible in evidence.

Where the defendant, accused of the larceny of shoes, testified, on the trial of one Slime charged with having received stolen goods, to the effect that defendant stole the shoes and sold them to Slime, it was held that this judicial confession was inadmissible in evidence, since it had been induced by a promise of immunity from prosecution, held out by the prosecuting attorney. State v. Murphy (1910) 146 Mo. App. 707, 125 S. W. 557.

In State v. Hunter (1904) 181 Mo. 316, 80 S. W. 955, it appeared that the defendant was induced to confess that he had obtained judgment in a civil suit on perjured testimony, and that his testimony on the trial of said cause was false. This confession was induced by a promise held out by the prosecuting attorney, who had been defendant's attorney in the civil suit, that he would not be prosecuted for perjury. The court held the confession inadmissible in evidence on the trial of the defendant for perjury.

In Porter v. State (1876) 55 Ala. 95, wherein it appeared that the defendant, accused of murder, was induced to make a confession on a promise of immunity from punishment held out by his attorney, and confirmed by the prosecuting attorney, the brother of the deceased, and the magistrate, the court said: "In the present case, the strongest conceivable influences were brought to bear on the prisoner to induce him to confess. The promises were of the most complete immunity from criminal punishment; and this guaranty was given and sanctioned by the court before which he was being tried, the brother of the deceased, and by the officiating attorneys of both the prosecution and the defense. Never was importunity more vehemently urged, backed by a stronger array of personal influence, or enforced by the promise of a more tempting boon. A clear head and an imperious will could scarcely resist such combined influences. Under these the first confession was made, and it matters not that the prisoner then announced he expected to be hung; thus repelling, as it may be supposed, all idea that he was at all influenced to make the confession by the promises previously made him. It is very improbable that, in the absence of the importunities and assurances with which he was besieged, he would have confessed his guilt of the horrid crime, the commission of which was then so justly disturbing the public repose. In fact, the counsel for the prosecution, in view of the circumstances, admitted on the trial that the confession, then and thus obtained, could not be given in evidence against the prisoner. In this he but affirmed what all the law books teach."

In Corley v. State (1887) 50 Ark. 305, 7 S. W. 255, it appeared that the defendant was suspected of complicity in a larceny. He was summoned before the grand jury, and the grand jurors exhorted him to tell the truth and promised him protection. He then made a statement implicating others in the larceny. Later, while awaiting the further direction of the grand jury, he was visited by the prosecuting attorney, who assured him that the state would deal fairly with him if he would tell the whole truth. The next morning, while waiting to be called before the grand jury, three persons, who afterwards became witnesses against him, were admitted to him, and, referring to his statement previously made before the grand jury, told him he ought to tell the whole truth. Thereupon he produced a confession which he said he had prepared for the grand jury, as he had not intended to tell anything until he got before the grand jury where he could get protection. The court held this confession inadmissible in evidence.

In Gregg v. State (1894) 106 Ala. 44, 17 So. 321, it appeared that on a trial for infanticide, the defendant being charged with having killed her daughter's infant, a witness testified that he, together with others, went to the house of the defendant to investigate the matter, and made the impression upon the defendant that they had authority to institute investigation, and after the denial by the defendant of the birth and destruction of the child, the witness said to the defendant, "Tell us the truth about it all, and that will be the last of it," in response to which the defendant admitted the birth and murder of the infant. It was held that the confession was involuntary and inadmissible in evidence.

1015, 81 S. E. 192, wherein it was held that a person, who, under the direction and authority of the attorney for the commonwealth, actively engages in the effort to ascertain the perpetrator of a crime and to secure his arrest and conviction, is a "person in authority," within the rule excluding a confession induced by the hope of some advantage held out by such person, the court stated the rule as follows: "The rule in Virginia is well established by the decided cases, that persons in authority (within the rule excluding a confession, unless it appears that it was not obtained from the party by some inducement of a worldly or temporal character, in the nature of a threat or promise of benefit held out to him by a person in authority, or with the apparent sanction of such person or persons) are such as are engaged or concerned in the apprehension, prosecution, or the examination of the accused."

In Lopez v. State (1882) 12 Tex. App. 27, it appeared that the district attorney promised that he would not prosecute the prisoner if he would appear and testify against his accomplice, but did not warn him that his confession might be used against him if he refused so to testify. On the strength of this promise, the prisoner made a confession to the district attorney. When the accomplice was placed on trial, the prisoner refused to testify against him. Afterwards he was placed upon his own trial, and his confessions made to the district attorney were admitted in evidence against him. The court of appeals held this to be error, because it was not shown, as a predicate for the admission of the confession, that it was within a statute providing that confessions are inadmissible in evidence unless "freely made, without compulsion or persuasion."

In Neeley v. State (1889) 27 Tex. App. 315, 11 S. W. 376, it appeared that the district attorney had a conference with the defendant, accused of the theft of cattle, in which it was agreed that the defendant would testify in behalf of the state, to material facts against his accomplices, and in consideration of his so testifying he would be exempted from prosecution for said theft; but that, should he violate said agreement and refuse so to testify, he would be liable to prosecution. He thereupon made a confession, and thereafter refused to fulfil his agreement with the district attorney to testify against the other parties, and the district attorney caused him to be indicted for the theft to which his confession related. The confession was held not to be admissible.

So, where it appeared that the prisoner was charged with arson, and the county attorney, city marshal, and another party went to the prisoner's house to see him with reference to turning state's evidence, and the county attorney told him that if he would testify for the state through all the courts, he would see that he would not be prosecuted, but warned him that his testimony might be used against him if he refused so to testify, and the prisoner thereupon gave evidence on the examining trial, but refused to testify when called against his accomplice, it was held that the confessions of the defendant, made at the examining trial, were inadmissible against him on his own trial, because not made in compliance with the statute that no confession is admissible in evidence "unless freely made, without compulsion or persuasion." Lauderdale v. State (1892) 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 46, 37 Am. St. Rep. 788, 19 S. W. 679.

In United States v. Lee (1846) 4 McLean, 103, Fed. Cas. No. 15,588, it appeared that the defendant, charged with stealing from the mail, was used as a witness for the government against an accomplice, with the understanding that he would not be prosecuted to conviction, provided he made a full disclosure in regard to the acts of the accomplice. In making the disclosure according to the agreement, the defendant implicated himself. The court said: "The government is bound in honor, under the circumstances, to carry out the understanding or arrangement by which the witness testified, and admitted, in so doing, his own turpitude. Public policy and the great ends of justice require this of the court."

But where a district attorney of the United States entered into an agreement with the defendants, who were accused of an offense against the United States, that if they would testify on behalf of the plaintiffs frankly and truthfully, when required, in reference to a conspiracy among certain government officials then known to exist, they would not be prosecuted, it was held that the district attorney had no authority to make such an agreement. Whiskey Cases (1878) 99 U. S. 594, 25 L. ed. 399.

In Reg. v. Croydon (1846) 2 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 67, it appeared that one Baker had been tried, found guilty, and transported for burglary. After this conviction, the prisoner, who appeared to have been connected with Baker in the transaction, made a confession on the strength of inducements held out by the attorney who had conducted Baker's defense, and was then engaged in an endeavor to get up a prosecution, and seeking to discover a criminal. It was held that the attorney was clothed with authority to offer such an inducement, and the confession was therefore inadmissible.

But in Com. v. Knapp (1830) 10 Pick. (Mass.) 477, 20 Am. Dec. 534, it appeared that the attorney general wrote to the prisoner a letter, promising the protection of the government on condition of his making a full disclosure and testifying in the case fully and truly. A full confession was made by the prisoner under this arrangement with the attorney general, but on being called to testify against his accomplices he refused to do so. It was held that by this refusal the prisoner forfeited all claim to the immunity which had been promised him by the attorney general, so that his confession was admissible against him in evidence when he was put on trial.

So in State v. Moran (1887) 15 Or. 262, 14 Pac. 419, it appeared that the defendant was promised immunity on the condition of his testifying fully against an accomplice. In accordance with this agreement he made certain admissions and confessions before the examining magistrate and the grand jury, but at the last minute, when he must have known that his refusal to testify would result in the acquittal of the accomplice, he fled. It was held that he thereby deprived himself of the immunity which had been accorded him, so that his admissions and confessions were admissible against him when he was put on trial.

In Smallwood v. State (1917) 14 Okla. Crim. Rep. 125, 167 Pac. 1154, it appeared that the defendant, charged with robbery, was induced to make a confession of guilt and return the stolen property by a promise held out by the county attorney that he would not be prosecuted, if the owner of the property should fail to appear as a witness at the examining trial. The owner, however, appeared as a witness at the examining trial, and it was held that the county attorney, having lived up to his agreement, was entitled to introduce the confession in evidence on the trial of the accused.

So where the attorney general promised to secure a pardon for the accused, if he would confess and disclose who else was engaged in the crime, but the accused failed to act on the promise, and later made a confession which was not in the least influenced by the promise of the attorney general, it was held that the confession was voluntary and admissible. Holsenbake v. State (1872) 45 Ga. 43.

In New York, by virtue of a statute, a confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, cannot be given in evidence against him if made on a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor. People v. Rogers (1908) 192 N. Y. 331, 85 N. E. 135, 15 Ann. Cas. 177.

In People v. Reilly (1918) 181 App. Div. 522, 169 N. Y. Supp. 119, affirmed in (1918) 224 N. Y. 90, 120 N. E. 113, it appeared that the defendant, after his arrest, was brought to the district attorney's office, and a priest in the presence of the assistant district attorney told the defendant that there was no danger of any statement he made being used against him, and that their only desire was to help him. The defendant thereupon made admissions which tended to connect him with the crime. It was held that the admission thus obtained could not be used on the trial of the defendant.

In a case where the prisoner charged with receiving and concealing stolen goods was promised immunity from prosecution by the state's attorney if he would turn state's evidence, and the prisoner complied with the agreement, it was held that the agreement was no bar to a prosecution, but that the prisoner had an equitable title to the mercy of the executive. State v. Guild (1899) 149 Mo. 370, 73 Am. St. Rep. 395, 50 S. W. 909.

IV. Sheriff or other arresting officer.

The sheriff, constable, or other officer arresting the prisoner, and having him in control and custody, is a "person in authority," contemplated by the rule excluding confessions made under promises held out by persons in authority.

In People v. Thompson (Cal.) supra, it appeared that the defendant, a boy of eighteen years, had heard of some persons accused of crime who had gotten off by confessing, and, imbued with this notion, he sought an interview with the sheriff and, after ascertaining that his impression was to some extent true, inquired of the sheriff if it would be better for him to make a statement of the facts, and the sheriff replied that it would. The confession thus induced was held not to be voluntary.

So where a confession of guilt was induced by the promise of a sheriff that he would do everything in his power to help accused out of the scrape, it was held to be inadmissible in evidence. People v. Castro (1899) 125 Cal. 521, 58 Pac. 133.

Where a defendant, charged with murder, while imprisoned in the county jail, was induced to confess by the sheriff's promise that if he told the truth the sheriff would do whatever he could for him, it was held that the confession was not voluntary, and was inadmissible in evidence. People v. Gonzales (Cal.) supra.

In Territory v. McClin (Mont.) supra, wherein the defendant was induced to confess by a statement by a deputy sheriff that it would be better for him, the court, in speaking of the persons whose promises are contemplated by the rule, said: "In regard to the person by whom the inducements were offered, it is very clear that if they were offered by the prosecutor, or by an officer having the prisoner in custody, or by a magistrate, or, indeed, by anyone having authority over him or over the prosecution itself, or by a private person in the presence of one in authority, the confession will not be deemed voluntary and will be rejected."

In Territory v. Underwood (1888) 8 Mont. 131, 19 Pac. 398, it appeared that the defendant was charged with obtaining money under false pretenses from a corporation. The officer who had the defendant under arrest told him that he thought the principal thing the superintendent of the corporation wanted to know was how much the company had lost; that accused had better confess the crime to the superintendent and give evidence against two other persons implicated; and that he thought the superintendent, if he did, would withdraw the charge, or ease it as light as he possibly could. The court held the confession thus induced inadmissible.

In State v. Sherman (Mont.) supra, wherein it appeared that the defendant was induced to make a confession by a promise held out by his father in the presence of the officers, it was held that a confession so elicited was inadmissible.

In Kearns v. State (Okla.) supra, wherein the plaintiff in error, while under arrest and confined in jail, made certain written and oral confessions to the sheriff, the county attorney, and the jailer of the county, the court said: "If the confessions obtained by the officers were obtained under duress or promise of immunity, or other inducements in connection with the crime charged, they would not be admissible in evidence. As is stated . . . the officers testified that no promises were made nor inducement offered. Against this is the statement of the plaintiff in error only. The trial court, after hearing the matter at length, concluded that the inhibitions of the law against the admission of confessions obtained by promises of immunity or other inducements had not been encroached upon, and that the statements were voluntarily made, and therefore entitled to be introduced."

So where a person accused of murder was induced to confess by the deputy sheriff's promise that he would "help him out if they sent him to the pen," it was held that the confession was incompetent evidence. Mackmasters v. State (1908) 82 Miss. 459, 34 So. 156, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 119.

In State v. Staley (1869) 14 Minn. 105, Gil. 75, wherein it was alleged that the officer who arrested the accused induced him to confess by promising him the privilege of turning state's evidence if he told a straighter story than his accomplice, the court said: "The rule seems well settled that if an advantage is held out, or harm threatened, of a temporal or worldly nature, by a person in authority, the confession induced thereby must be excluded. . . . The officer who made the arrest, and by whom the inducements are alleged to have been held out, is, within the rule, a person in authority."

In Couley v. State (1849) 12 Mo. 462, it appeared that the defendant, accused of burglary, was induced to confess by the officer who arrested him. The officer told defendant "that he would not appear against him if he would confess," and that "he could turn state's evidence and get clear." The court held that testimony of a confession thus induced should have been excluded from the jury.

In Morehead v. State (1849) 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 635, wherein it appeared that the prisoner, accused of the larceny of a slave, was told by someone in the company that arrested him that it would be better for him to confess and tell on his accomplice, and that he would probably be made state's evidence, as it was the accomplice they were after mainly, the court said: "The inducements to the confession proceeded from some of the company assembled to apprehend the prisoner, and were made, if the witness is to be credited, in the hearing of the prosecutor and officer. Upon well-settled principles, therefore, the confession thus obtained was inadmissible."

In McVeigh v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 17, 62 S. W. 757, 12 Am.

Crim. Rep. 143, it appeared that the prisoner was told by a friend in the presence of the sheriff and deputy sheriff that if he would confess they would get the district attorney to dismiss the case against him. The deputy sheriff added that he had known men to be turned loose by turning state's evidence. The court held that a confession thus obtained should not be received in evidence.

In a case where a prisoner, charged with the theft of money, was told by the deputy marshal who arrested him that he had better confess, and that he (the deputy marshal) would help him to get out of it, it was held that the confession was inadmissible in evidence. Clayton v. State (1893) 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 489, 21 S. W. 255.

In Rutherford v. Com. (1859) 2 Met. (Ky.) 387, it appeared that while the accused was in the custody of the deputy sheriff, by whom he had been arrested, he remarked to the officer that he had no fear, and asked him what he thought. The deputy sheriff replied that if one or two important facts could be shown he would get clear. The prisoner inquired what they were, and the officer then told him to show where he was the night before, and also to show that he had no money transactions with Starks, and he would get clear. The prisoner then stated that he had had no money transactions with Starks. This statement was admitted in evidence on the trial of the prisoner in order to connect him with the robbery and murder of Starks. In holding that the statement should have been rejected, the court said: "Now it is very evident that the statement in question was made under the influence of hope. The prisoner was induced to believe, if he would assume the attitude indicated by that statement, that he would get clear of the charge that was made against him. This inducement was presented by the officer who had him in custody, and in whose knowledge he seemed to confide. The statement was made by the prisoner under the belief that it was necessary for his safety, and consequently there is no certainty of its truth; and this is the very ground upon which statements and confessions, extracted by the influence of hope upon the mind, are rejected as unworthy of credit."

In Collins v. Com. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 691, 25 S. W. 743, it appeared that the defendant, accused of burning a house, was induced to make a confession of guilt by a promise by the sheriff, in the presence of the jailer and the commonwealth's attorney, that if the defendant would come out and tell all he knew the prosecution would let him off and use him as a witness. The court held that confession to be inadmissible in evidence.

In Com v. Taylor (1850) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 605, it appeared that the prisoner was in the hands of the police officer and a deputy sheriff, and was told by them that, if he would make disclosures that would be of benefit to the government, they would use their influence to have them go in his favor. The court said: "The case seems to us to fall within the rule excluding confessions obtained under the influence of inducements held out by an officer having the prisoner in his custody, and for that reason the testimony of Wright [the deputy sheriff] ought to have been excluded."

In Com. v. Cullen (1878) 111 Mass. 485, it appeared that the defendant was charged with larceny from the person. One Weir, a police officer, testified that he arrested the defendant in New York and brought him on the cars to Boston; that on the way he said to the defendant: "If you will get the money, it will not be used as evidence against you; I want the money." On the next day the defendant made a confession to another police officer. The court said: "The jury should have been instructed that if an inducement in the shape of promises or threats had been brought to bear upon him by an officer, it would be their duty to allow no weight or influence against the prisoner to any statements which he afterwards made to another officer, provided they were satisfied that these statements were made under the influence, and as the result and consequence, of such inducement."

In Com. v. Curtis (1867) 97 Mass. 574, wherein it appeared that the prisoner, under arrest on a charge of adultery, made a confession on the strength of an inducement held out by the officer who had him in custody, the court said: "There is no doubt that any inducement of temporal fear or favor coming from one in authority, which preceded and may have influenced a confession, will cause it to be rejected unless the confession is made under such circumstances as show that the influence of the inducement has passed away. No cases require more careful scrutiny than those of disclosures made by a party under arrest, to the officer who has him in custody, and in none will slighter threats or promises of favor exclude the subsequent confessions."

In Com. v. Cuffee (1871) 108 Mass. 285, it appeared that two officers who had arrested a boy without a warrant, upon suspicion of having committed murder, searched him, stripped him of his clothing, and placed him in a cell at a police station, and that about 10 o'clock at night "they took him out of his cell for the purpose of questioning and examining him, and examined him from that time till midnight, without warning him of his right not to answer unless he chose to do so, or offering him any opportunity to consult counsel or friends." The boy was thus induced by the police officers to make statements tending to show his guilt. The court held that the jury was properly instructed to disregard the statements if, on the whole evidence in the case, it appeared that they were induced by threats or promises.

In a case wherein a person, accused of setting fire to a house, while in the custody of the officers who arrested her, confessed that she had set the fire, but on the trial testified that she made the statement under the promise that she would not be prosecuted, it was held proper to instruct the jury that they should give no weight to the confession if they believed it was induced by the promise, but if they believed it was not so induced, that such weight should be given to it as they thought it entitled to. Com. v. Smith (1870) 119 Mass. 305.

In United States v. Kurtz (1836) 4 Cranch, C. C. 682, Fed. Cas. No. 15,547, it appeared that the defendant, having been arrested by two constables upon a charge of stealing goods, was told by them that, if he would tell where the goods were, they would do what they could for him. The defendant was also suspected of having stolen money from another on a former day, but nothing was said by the constables to him about the theft of money, when they told him they would do what they could for him. Defendant made confessions to the constables in regard to the goods, and later made confessions to the magistrate in regard to the money. The court rejected the confessions as to the goods, but admitted the confessions as to the money.

So, where it appeared that accused, after the officer in whose custody he was had retired to rest, was visited in the middle of the night by three persons in succession, who represented to him that it would be better for him, or he would get off easier, if he made a confession, it was held that a confession thus obtained was incompetent in evidence. The court said: "None of these persons was the officer in charge; but their admission to the cell at such an unreasonable hour carried with it an implication of the officer's consent to their mission, and respondent could scarcely fail to be impressed that their assurances were made with full authority. No reliance can be placed upon admissions of guilt so obtained, for the very obvious reason that they are not made because they are true, but because, whether true or false, the accused is led to believe it is for his interest to make them." People v. Wolcott (1883) 51 Mich. 612, 17 N. W. 78.

In Reg. v. Millen (1849) 3 Cox. C. C. (Eng.) 507, it appeared that the prisoner, Sheepwash, was in custody upon a charge of murder, together with a man named Oliver. Sheepwash made a confession on the strength of an inducement held out by Oliver in the presence of the constable. Wright-man, J., held the confession inadmissible in evidence, as the inducement appeared to have the sanction of the constable, who was present and apparently assented to it.

In Reg. v. Laugher (1846) 2 Car. & K. (Eng.) 225, it appeared that the prisoner, a married woman who resided with her husband, was charged by a police constable with breaking into the house of the prosecutor and stealing his money. She denied it, but her husband, coming in soon afterwards, told her, if she knew anything about it, to tell the truth. Pollock, C. B., said: "The fact of the constable being present, and not dissenting from what was said, places the expressions used by the husband on the same footing as if they had been used by the constable; and I think that, as the constable was the person in authority, such an inducement ought to be sufficient to exclude the admission."

In Rex v. Pountney (1836) 7 Car. & P. (Eng.) 303, it appeared that a prisoner, in the custody of a constable upon a charge of felony, was taken by the constable to an inn, where the innkeeper, in the hearing of the constable, held out an inducement to confess, whereupon the prisoner confessed in the constable's hearing. Alderson, B., though he received the evidence, said he entertained a strong opinion against its admissibility, and that, if it had been necessary, he would have reserved the point for the opinion of the judges.

V. Magistrate.

The examining magistrate is such a person in authority that a confession made on a promise of immunity made by him is not admissible. United States v. Cooper (1857) Fed. Cas. No. 14,864; United States v. Pocklington (1822) 2 Cranch, C. C. 298, Fed. Cas. No. 16,060; Austine v. People (1869) 51 Ill. 236; Rex v. Rudd (1775) Cowp. pt. 1, p. 331, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1114, 1 Leach, C. L. 115.

In Austine v. People (1869) 51 Ill. 236, it appeared that the defendant, accused of rape, was induced to admit the charge on the promise by the officiating magistrates that the prosecution would be dropped. The court said: "The rule is, a confession can never be received in evidence when the prisoner has been influenced by any threat or promise, for the reason the law cannot measure the force of the influence used, or decide upon its effect on the mind of the prisoner, and therefore excludes it if any degree of influence has been exerted. . . . The evidence shows most clearly this confession was forced by the hope and promise the prosecution should be dropped. The inducement to confess was held out by the officiating magistrates by persons in authority; and to avoid an accusation before a grand jury, and a public trial before the circuit court, a man of deficient stamina would confess, as this defendant was willing to do, to almost anything."

In United States v. Cooper (Fed.) supra, it appeared that the justice of the peace, while officially engaged in the examination of a criminal charge, obtained a confession from the prisoner by holding out an inducement. The court said: "Among the rules most carefully elaborated and strictly enforced is this: That if a confession has been made to a person in authority in the premises, and has been induced by anything said or done by said person, calculated to excite either hope or fear in the prisoner's mind, then the confession is inadmissible. It has always been understood, without a dissenting voice, that a justice of the peace, engaged in an official investigation of a criminal charge, is a person in authority in regard to such charge. In regard to persons bearing that character, too much care cannot be exercised to prevent them from this reprehensible tampering with parties arraigned before them."

So in a case in which a prisoner, indicted for breaking open a storehouse, was examined before the mayor of the town, who informed him that one of the party had confessed to a part of the charge, and that if the prisoner would confess candidly the truth, the mayor would represent his case to the court, it was held that the confession was inadmissible in evidence. United States v. Pocklington (1822) 2 Cranch,

C. C. 293, Fed. Cas. No. 16,060. See also Wolf v. Com. (1878) 30 Gratt. (Va.) 833, supra.

In Rex v. Rudd (Eng.) supra, it appeared that the justices of the peace admitted the prisoner to testify against her accomplice, and told her that if she would make a full disclosure she should be safe; if not, she should be prosecuted. It was held that the justices were persons in authority, even though in strictness they had no right to give such an assurance, and that any evidence thus extorted from her would be of no prejudice to her on the trial.

In a case wherein it appeared that the prisoner, charged with the stealing of a bank post bill, was apprehended and brought before the receiver general for the county, who, after hearing his account, said to him: "Unless you give me a more satisfactory account, I will take you before a magistrate," it was held that a confession made on the strength of this implied promise of immunity was inadmissible in evidence. Rex v. Thompson (1783) 1 Leach, C. L. (Eng.) 325.

It has been held that a clerk to the committing magistrate by whom accused was examined is a person in authority, and a confession made as a result of an inducement held out by him is inadmissible in evidence. Rex v. Drew (1837) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 140.

But where an accomplice, after making a full disclosure before the committing magistrate, refused before the grand jury to give any evidence at all, Wrightman, J., ordered his name to be inserted in the bill of indictment, and he was convicted on his own confession. Rex v. Holthem (1843) 2 Greave's Russell, Crimes (Eng.) 958.

VI. Jailer.

In Bob v. State (1858) 32 Ala. 560, in which it appeared that a negro slave was induced to confess to the shooting of a white person by the implied promise of his jailer that his master would sell him, and not let him be hung, it was held that the subsequent reiteration of the confession was not competent evidence against the accused.

But see Shifflet v. Com. (1858) 14 Gratt. (Va.) 652, wherein it was held that a young man living in a jailer's family and having control of the jail in the jailer's absence, but who was not an officer of any kind, was not a "person in authority." The court defined what persons are meant by the phrase as follows: "Persons in authority, within the meaning of that rule, are generally, if not always, persons engaged in the apprehension, prosecution, or examination of the prisoner. The prosecutor, the officer who makes the arrest, and the magistrate before whom the prisoner is carried are clearly persons in authority; and inducements held out in their presence, without their objection, are regarded as held out by them. There are others who may also be persons in authority. If a jailer in whose jail the party making the confession is confined be such a person (as to which I express no opinion), there is, I think, neither reason nor authority for saying that a mere member of the family of the jailer, holding no office of any kind, nor having any connection with the prisoner further than to attend about the jail, and, in the absence of the jailer, to have control of it and carry the keys, is a person in authority within the meaning of the rule. If he is, so also, it seems, would be the wife of the jailer in this case, who kept the keys when the witness was not using them, and the son of the jailer, who sometimes acted for him. What power could any such subordinates be reasonably supposed to have to execute any promise or threat they might make to a prisoner, 'in respect of his escape from the consequences of the offense, or the mitigation of the punishment.'"

In a case where the prisoner, charged with murder of a child, was induced to make a confession by a woman who had her in custody to prevent the prisoner from laying violent hands on herself, it was held that the confession was inadmissible because induced by one in authority. Rex v. Enoch (1833) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 539.

VII. Detective.

In People v. Kurtz (1886) 42 Hun (N. Y.) 335, it appeared that the defendant, accused of burglary, was induced to make a confession on being told by one Pinkerton, a detective, that if he would confess he could get the benefit of a state's witness. It was held that the confession was inadmissible in evidence against the defendant. The court said: "Pinkerton had been in communication with the district attorney about this case, and the district attorney had given instructions to Pinkerton in regard to the prisoner. Pinkerton, then, was not a merely unofficial person. He was, to some extent, acting for the district attorney; and what he did and said might be deemed to come from the district attorney, unless it were positively disavowed. It would be most unreasonable, under the circumstances, that what Pinkerton said should not be considered as said in behalf of the district attorney. And simply to say, 'Your statement must be voluntary,' did not so repudiate what the detective had previously said as to take away from the mind of the prisoner the influence which had been exerted."

In People v. Stielow (1916) 161 N. Y. Supp. 599, it appeared that the defendant, accused of crime, made a confession to a detective in the employ of the county, on the latter's promise that he would not be prosecuted therefor. The court said: "Evidence of promises of immunity, express or implied, made by a detective in the employ of the county, under engagement by the district attorney to discover the perpetrators of a crime, are not binding upon the district attorney, so as to compel him to grant immunity, or so as to invalidate a confession, where such promises are not made with the express or implied authority of the district attorney, or under such circumstances as to imply his assent, and such evidence is not sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial, where the evidence of the promises is in conflict, and the confession is alleged to be made without any promise of immunity."

So in Roesel v. State (1898) 62 N. J. L. 216, 41 Atl. 408, in which it appeared that the prisoner made a confession on the strength of inducements held out by one Keron, a county detective, who had charge of the prisoner, the court said: "Keron was a person in authority within the meaning of the rule relating to the admissibility of confessions. A confession by an accused to one in authority, to be admitted in evidence, must be voluntary. By this is meant that the confession must not be extorted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises."

So where a weak-minded man, under arrest, accused of burning a mill, was induced to make a confession of guilt by a detective in the employ of the owners of the mill, who told the accused that it was best for him to own up and turn state's evidence, because he (the detective) was anxious to get it out of him, it was held that the confession was incompetent. Flagg v. People (1879) 40 Mich. 706, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 70.

But see United States v. Stone (1881) 8 Fed. 232, in which it appeared that the defendant was charged with stealing property from a wrecked steamboat. The chief witness, Bennett, a detective employed by the owners to hunt up the missing goods, and empowered by them to institute criminal proceedings against the guilty parties, testified to a confession made by the defendant, in which the latter admitted his guilt. It appeared that the defendant was induced to make this confession, and pay for the goods alleged to have been stolen by him, on being promised by Bennett that "that should be the end of it." The court admitted the confession in evidence on the ground that Bennett was not a "person in authority," within the rule excluding confessions induced by persons in authority.

So it has been held that a suspended policeman, drawing pay as a policeman and acting as a private detective, but wearing no badge or insignia of office, is not a person in authority, within the rule excluding confessions to such person, induced by a promise of benefit. Page v. Com. (1876) 27 Gratt. (Va.) 954.

Also it has been held that a mere private detective, employed to work up the case, is not a "person in authority" within the rule, so that a confession made to him is admissible, even though it may have been induced by a promise of gain. Early v. Com. (1890) 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. 795.

In Rex v. Todd (1901) 13 Manitoba L. R. 364, 1 B. R. C. 883, it appeared that the prisoner was induced to confess to the crime of murder on the strength of pretenses and representations held out by two detectives, acting under the authority and by the direction of the chief officer of the police force, but who were not members of the force or otherwise in authority in respect of the said matters, except by virtue of their special employment as detectives. Bain, J., said: "But another essential element that has to be considered in deciding whether a confession is voluntary or not is the position of the person who held out the inducement, for it is now clearly established, I think, that it is only an inducement held out by a person in authority that will make a confession involuntary. . . . A person in authority means, generally speaking, anyone who has authority or control over the accused, or over the proceedings or the prosecution against him. And the reason that it is a rule of law that confessions made as the result of inducements held out by persons in authority are inadmissible is clearly this: that the authority that the accused knows such persons to possess may well be supposed, in the majority of instances, both to animate his hopes of favor, on the one hand, and, on the other, to inspire him with awe, and so in some degree to overcome the powers of his mind. . . . Now it is expressly stated in the case that when the prisoner made the admissions, he was without notice or knowledge of any facts that could constitute either of the two men persons in authority; and, this being so, it could not be contended that, as to the prisoner, they were persons in authority, and cessante ratione, cessat lex."

VIII. Interpreter.

It has been held that an interpreter is a person in authority, within the meaning of the rule relating to the admissibility of confessions. State v. Kwiatkowski (1912) 83 N. J. L. 650, 85 Atl. 209.

IX. Master of slave.

In State v. Nelson (1848) 3 La. Ann. 497, it appeared that a slave, accused of murder, made a confession of guilt to his young master, who was also his overseer, on being advised by the latter "that it would be better for him to tell what he had done." The court said: "The confession of Nelson comes strictly within the rules which should have excluded it from evidence. It was made to his young master, who was also his overseer, to whose authority he habitually submitted, to whom he would naturally look for protection, and upon being advised 'that it would be better for him to tell what he had done.' The admonition, coming from such a source, was well calculated to inspire the slave with the hope of protection from the consequences of his act, if he fully confessed, and his confession, made under that impression, should have been rejected."

X. Employer.

Where a servant is charged with an offense against the property of his employer, the employer is "a person in authority," within the rule that a confession induced by a promise of immunity from such a person is inadmissible. State v. Bostick (1845) 4 Harr. (Del.) 563; Byrd v. State (1882) 68 Ga. 661; Com. v. Howe (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 153; Reg. v. Mansfield (1881) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 689; Reg. v. Rose (1898) 18 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 717, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 275; Rex v. Simpson (1834) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 410; Rex v. Upchurch (1836) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 465; Reg. v. Thompson [1893] 2 Q. B. 12, 62 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 93, 69 L. T. N. S. 22, 41 Week. Rep. 525, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 90.

In State v. Bostick (Del.) supra, it appeared that a girl twelve years of age, suspected of burning the house of her mistress, was induced to make a confession of guilt by the promise of her mistress that nothing would be done with her, but that she would be sent home to her mother. The court held the confession inadmissible.

A confession of larceny of meat by an employee, induced by a statement from his employer that if he would bring back the meat there was a probability that the whole business could be settled, is not admissible. Byrd v. State (1882) 68 Ga. 661.

In Com. v. Howe (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 153, in which it appeared that the prisoner charged with larceny was told by his employer that unless he settled for the stolen property he would be discharged, but that if he settled for the property he would be permitted to keep his position, and the employer further promised that he would say nothing about the affair to injure the prisoner, it was held that a confession made on the strength of these promises was inadmissible in evidence.

In Reg. v. Mansfield (1881) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 639, it appeared that the prisoner, a domestic servant, aged fifteen, was apprehended by a police constable, and charged in the presence of her mistress (the daughter of the prosecutrix) with setting fire to a stack of hay. The prisoner then said to her mistress: "If you will forgive me, I will tell you the truth." The mistress replied: "Ann, did you do it?" The prisoner then made a statement. Williams, J., said: "I hold the statement of the prisoner to be not admissible in evidence. The true principle which renders the confession of a prisoner not receivable in evidence seems to be that if the confession is made either under fear caused by a threat, or in the hope of ultimate forgiveness or gain held out by a person in authority, that then it is not admissible. In the present instance, the prisoner, while in the custody of a policeman, makes this appeal to her mistress, who is standing by. If her mistress did not mean to forgive her, the girl was under a complete delusion, for by her silence the mistress acquiesced in the prisoner's appeal for forgiveness. The mistress practically invites the prisoner to continue her statement, and she is consequently induced to do so by the expectation that she will be forgiven."

In Reg. v. Rose (1898) 18 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 717, it appeared that the prisoner, who had been employed by a farmer in a more or less confidential capacity, was charged with stealing a variety of articles, the property of his master. It appeared, further, that the prosecutor, having reason to suspect that some of his property had been improperly dealt with, spoke with the prisoner, telling him it would be better if he confessed. It was held that, the inducement having been held out by a person in authority, the confession was not admissible in evidence.

In Rex v. Simpson (1834) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 410, it appeared that a servant girl was accused of burning a house. She was induced to confess by promises of immunity held out to her by the mother of the prosecutor's wife. It was held that the confession should not have been received in evidence.

In Rex v. Upchurch (1836) 1 Moody, C. C. (Eng.) 465, the prisoner was a domestic servant to the prosecutor, who kept a beer house. The prisoner was induced to confess by promises held out by the prosecutor's wife, who lived with him and took her share in the management of the house. It was held that the prosecutor's wife was a person in authority, within the meaning of the rule, and that the confession should not be received.

In Reg. v. Thompson (Eng.) supra, it appeared that the prisoner, charged with embezzling the funds of a company, was induced to make a confession by a promise of favor held out by the chairman of the company, at whose instance the warrant for the prisoner's apprehension had been issued. It was held that the chairman was a person in authority, and the confession induced by him ought not to have been received in evidence.

So, where a servant girl, accused of setting fire to a house, was induced to confess by promises made by a private person in the presence of the wife of the prosecutor, who was also the mistress of the girl, it was held that it must be taken as if the inducement was held out by the prosecutor's wife, who was a person in authority, and that, therefore, the evidence of the confession was inadmissible. Reg. v. Taylor (1839) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 733.

In Rex v. Parratt (1831) 4 Car. & P. (Eng.) 570, the prisoner was a mariner, and was charged with having stolen a watch from a shipmate while on board their vessel, the watch having been found concealed in the cable. The captain of the ship threatened to commit him to jail immediately upon their arrival at Newcastle unless he would confess who his partner was, and the prisoner accordingly did make a confession. Here the felony was committed on board the vessel of which the party holding out the inducements was the master, and he had the right to arrest the prisoner and commit him to jail on reasonable suspicion that he was the guilty party. It was held that the confession was not admissible.

But in Reg. v. Moore (1852) 2 Den. C. C. (Eng.) 522, 3 Car. & K. 153, 21 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 199, 16 Jur. 621, 5 Cox, C. C. 555, the question arose as to the admissibility of a confession made to the prisoner's mistress, under inducements held out by her, the offense being unconnected with the person or property or dwelling house of the master or mistress. The charge was infanticide, and the prisoner, under inducements held out by her mistress, had made a confession, which was offered in evidence against her. It was held that the mistress was not one "in authority," within the rule excluding confessions.

So in Smith v. Com. (1853) 10 Gratt. (Va.) 734, it appeared that the prisoner, charged with rape, had been brought up by one Edmonson, a magistrate of the county, and was an indentured apprentice to the said Edmonson, and living with him. On the morning after the crime had been perpetrated, Edmonson went to the room where the prisoner was asleep, and said to him solemnly: "The die is cast. The dog is dead. She (meaning the prosecutrix) has sworn it, and you must suffer. Now will you suffer and let Campbell escape? Now I want you to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and I will save your neck if I can." And thereupon the prisoner made a full confession of his guilt. It was held that Edmonson was not such a person "in authority" as was contemplated by the rule excluding confessions made to persons in authority, unless voluntarily made, without threats or promises of benefit.

XI. Other person.

a. Generally.

There is a very grave conflict in the authorities as to the admission in evidence of confessions made under promises held out by private persons, bearing no relation of confidence to the accused and in no way connected with the offense, so that it is impossible to lay down any definite rule on the subject. But it would seem that each case must be left to the court to decide, under all the circumstances, whether the promises were such as to overcome the mind of the prisoner.

In Beggary v. State (1875) 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 520, wherein it appeared that the prisoner, accused of murder, was told by a private person that it would be better for him to confess and tell all about it, and that he might be used as a state's witness, the court stated what seems to be the true rule, as follows: "In regard to the person by whom the inducements were offered, there has been conflict in the authorities, some holding that the inducements held out by private persons, not being prosecutor, officer, or having any authority over the prisoner, are not sufficient to exclude confessions thus obtained; but the sounder rule manifestly is that this is a mixed question of law and fact for the judge, and while it is proper to note the difference between confessions obtained by prosecutor, officer, or person in authority, and those obtained by private persons, yet if, in fact, the confessions were forced from the prisoner through hope or fear presented to his mind by a third person, they should be rejected. In determining this, the judge should look not only to the position and character of the person offering the inducements, as well as of the prisoner, and all the attending circumstances."

In State v. Kirby (1846) 32 S. C. L. (1 Strobh.) 155, wherein it appeared that a private person told the defendant, who was accused of murder, that if he confessed he might be pardoned, the court said: "If the inducements held out to the prisoner be made by one having authority over him or over the prosecution, as by the prosecutor or his wife, if the prisoner be his servant, or by the officer having him in custody, or the magistrate, or even by a private person in the presence of one in authority, confessions under such circumstances, it would seem from the authority of decided cases, should be rejected. The power of such persons may well be supposed to animate the prisoner's hopes of favor on the one hand, and to inspire him with awe on the other, and in some degree to overcome the powers of his mind. . . . But where the confessions are made on inducements held out by private persons having no authority over the prisoner or the prosecution, there seems to be no satisfactory conclusion to be drawn from the authority of decided cases, so as to lay down any definite rule which can be applied to the almost infinite variety of cases which occur. The same difficulty does not exist where the confessions are made to one in authority. There, it is true, the rule may sometimes fail of meeting the truth on account of the difference in age, experience, and self-possession, in the midst of the most trying and difficult position in which man can be placed; yet in general, it has been found to be a wise rule which excludes confessions made to such persons; and as it is always wise to narrow the bounds of discretion, whenever it is practicable, it has been adopted as a rule. But in the case of confessions made on suggestions of benefits, by private persons having no authority, the difficulty of laying down a more specific rule than the general one that the confession must be voluntary has suggested the idea that the question is a mixed one of law and fact, and that it must be left in a great degree to the judge to decide, under all the circumstances, whether the threats or inducements were such as to overcome the mind of the prisoner. . . . That seems to be the result to which the more modern cases lead; and a late writer on the subject has come to the conclusion that a confession made to a private person, under inducements held out by him, is admissible."

In Rex v. Spencer (1835) 7 Car. & P. (Eng.) 776, it appeared that the prisoner was charged with stealing. It was proved that after the prisoner was in custody he was induced to confess by a person who was neither prosecutor nor constable, nor a person in any kind of authority. Parke, B., said that there was a difference of opinion among the judges whether a confession made to a person who has no authority, after an inducement held out by that person, is receivable.

In State v. Guild (1828) 10 N. J. L. 163, wherein it appeared that a confession of guilt was induced by the remark of a bystander that "if he would confess he would probably get off clear," it was held that the confession so induced was inadmissible as evidence, but subsequent confessions of the same nature were admissible if sufficient time and other circumstances had intervened to warrant the inference that the inducement which operated upon the mind of the accused at the time of the original confession were entirely dispelled at the time of the subsequent confession.

So, where a confession was induced by a promise held out by a private person that the prisoner would be made state's evidence, it was held inadmissible in evidence, though immediately previous thereto no promise was made, and immediately thereafter defendant declared it was made freely and voluntarily, and from a sense of duty. Re Thorn (1820) 4 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 81.

Also where a person accused of murder was induced to confess, by the promise of a private citizen that he would intercede with the judge in the prisoner's behalf, it was held that the confession thus induced was inadmissible. Johnson v. State (1906) 89 Miss. 773, 42 So. 606.

Statements in the nature of confessions, made by a prisoner, such as a declaration of intention to tell the truth about the matter, and an inquiry as to his power to turn state's evidence and the like, though not direct confessions, have been held to be inadmissible on his trial for the offense spoken of, it appearing that the witness to whom they were made told him that "if he turned state's evidence, and there were others implicated, and he could prove it, that he would get clear." Johnson v. State (1878) 61 Ga. 305.

So, where a man said to an accused boy, "If you will confess you will probably get clear," the confession thus obtained was held not to be admissible. State v. Guild (1828) 10 N. J. L. 163, 18 Am. Dec. 404.

In United States v. Nott (1839) 1 McLean, 500, Fed. Cas. No. 15,900, it appeared that the prisoner was charged with stealing bank notes from a letter. On being assured by the postmaster that the whole matter might be compromised, and that the prosecutor would probably be satisfied on the reimbursement of his expenses, he made a confession of guilt. It was held that the confession should be disregarded by the jury.

So, where the prisoner was induced to assent to the confession of an accomplice, thereby implying his own guilt, and the assent was given under the influence of a hope of pardon held out to him by his brother in the presence of a clergyman, it was held that testimony as to the assent, thus obtained, was incompetent evidence. Com. v. Knapp (1830) 9 Pick. (Mass.) 496, 20 Am. Dec. 491.

In Rex v. Royds (1904) 10 B. C. 407, it appeared that the prisoner was a choir boy, and along with several other choir boys, was implicated in an alleged assault that took place on the way to a choir reunion, to be held in the choirmaster's house. On the third day after the occurrence, the rector of the cathedral detained the boys after choir practice, and sent them into the church under the charge of the vergers; the choirmaster then called each of them separately into the vestry, and the rector questioned them in the presence of the bishop, the assistant curate, and the choirmaster, and took their statements in writing. He told them they were to speak the truth, and that their statements were to be used for the purpose of that inquiry only. On the trial, the statement made by the prisoner was offered in evidence by the Crown, and objected to. Irving, J., said: "Under the circumstances of this case, in my opinion, the rector was a person in authority, and, as the Crown has not satisfied me that the statement was voluntary, I cannot admit the evidence."

In Reg. v. Charcoal (1897) 3 Terr. L. R. (Can.) 7, it appeared that an Indian was induced to confess to the murder of another Indian, by a promise of favor held out by the Indian agent on the reserve to which the prisoner belonged. The agent testified that he made it a rule to tell Indians so charged that what they tell is to their benefit, to assist in their defense, and that he is there as their adviser, to help them. Wetmore, J., said: "The authorities are abundantly clear that an admission of guilt made by a party charged with an offense, to a person in authority, under the inducement of a promise of favor, or by menaces, or under terror, is inadmissible. This is so clear that it does not require authority to be cited in support of it. Whether, if the promise or threat is made by a person not in authority, that is sufficient to reject the admission, it is not now necessary to decide, because I am of opinion that James Wilson, the Indian agent, was, quoad the Indians on his reserve, a person in authority."

So, in a case where it appeared that a girl, accused of administering arsenic, was induced to make a confession by the surgeon who was called in to attend the victim, it was held that the confession was inadmissible. Rex v. Kingston (1830) 4 Car. & P. (Eng.) 387.

c. Confession held admissible.

In People v. Piner (1909) 11 Cal. App. 542, 105 Pac. 780, it appeared that the defendant, accused of larceny, was induced to make a confession of guilt by the promise of one Robison, a relative, who was also suspected of the crime, that the latter would help the accused out of his trouble. The defendant well knew that the said Robison was not an officer of the law, and that he was clothed with no authority for guaranteeing immunity from prosecution and punishment. The court held the confession voluntary, and admissible in evidence.

In a case where the prisoner was induced to make a confession by his stepfather, who advised him to go before the magistrate and make a complaint against the others concerned, and that he would be admitted as state's evidence, it was held that the confession was admissible in evidence against the prisoner. People v. Burns (1828) 2 Park Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 34.

In a case where one accused of murder was induced to confess by the advice of a friend, who told him that his only chance of getting rid of the charge was by confessing and turning state's evidence against the other parties who were jointly charged with him, it was held that the confession was admissible in evidence against him. Young v. Com. (1871) 8 Bush (Ky.) 366.

So, in a case in which it appeared that a county treasurer was induced to confess that he had misappropriated the funds in his hands, by one of his bondsmen, who said to him, "If you are short, and will come out and say so, we will try and fix it up," it was held that the bondsman was not a "person in authority" within the rule relating to the admissibility of confessions. State v. Carrick (1881) 16 Nev. 120.

In Rex v. Row (1809) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 153, wherein a man had been arrested for theft, and some of his neighbors, who had nothing to do with the apprehension, prosecution, or examination of the prisoner, officiously interfered, and held out inducements to the prisoner to confess, but the constable, who had the prisoner in custody, made no answer or observation thereon, it was held that the confession subsequently made to the constable was admissible in evidence, "because the advice to confess was not given or sanctioned by any person who had concern in the business."

In Rex v. Tyler (1823) 1 Car. & P. (Eng.) 129, it appeared that the prisoner, indicted for breaking into a house, while locked up alone in a room at a public house, was told by a man that the other prisoner had told all, and that he had better do the same to save his neck. It was held that, as the promise was by a person wholly without authority, the subsequent confession to the constable, who had held out no inducement, must be considered as voluntary, and was therefore evidence.

Where a newspaper writer said to the accused that her first statement was not accepted as true by the public, and suggested that she should make a correct statement, thereby raising a hope of immunity, but without making any promise of immunity, it was held not to be such an inducement as to make a confession thus induced inadmissible. State v. Griffin (1896) 48 La. Ann. 1409, 20 So. 905. B. R.

MORRIS ISAAC et al., Doing Business as Morris Isaac &amp; Sons.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit — February 6, 1919.

(168 C. C. A. 659, 257 Fed. 709.)

Sale — effect — restrictions — validity.

1. A manufacturer who sells his products outright parts with the right to have secret marks preserved on the inclosing cartons, which he placed there to enable him to identify jobbers who refused to comply with restrictions under which the goods were sold.

[See note on this question beginning on page 449.]

Injunction — in aid of price maintenance.

2. Injunction will not lie to prevent dealers from removing from cartons in which a manufacturer delivers his goods secret marks intended to aid the manufacturer in price maintenance.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio (Hollister, District, J.), dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from removing secret marks from boxes containing plaintiff's goods, purchased by them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Knappen and Denison, Circuit Judges, and Cochran, District Judge.

Messrs. Hans v. Briesen and Murray Seasongood, for appellant:

The special identifying mark in issue is used for a lawful purpose, and as a check against fraud, and as such will be protected against wilful erasure.

B. V. D. Co. v. Kommel, 119 C. C. A. 39, 200 Fed. 559; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite, 133 Fed. 794; Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham, 146 Fed. 190; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McConnell, 82 Fed. 65; Gillott v. Kettle, 3 Duer, 624; Ingersoll v. Doyle, 247 Fed. 620.

The essence of the right which is invaded by the defendant's unlawful erasures is not a trademark, but is the right to prevent and to be protected against fraud.

Knappen, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff manufactures the so-called "B. V. D." underwear, consisting of two-piece suits not protected by patent, as well as union suits, as to which rights under patent are claimed. It sells only to a selected list of jobbers, about three hundred fifty in number out of about eight hundred fifty applicants. Previous to the decision of the Sanatogen Case (Bauer v. O'Donnell) 229 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1041, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1185, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 150, it sold its union suits under a strict price maintenance agreement. As to the two-piece suits, there was no such agreement. Since December 7, 1916 (more than three years after the Sanatogen decision), plaintiff's acknowledgments of receipts from jobbers of orders for goods, both union and two-piece suits, have been accompanied by a form letter expressly designed to secure price maintenance in fact. The statement not only says: "We consider it important that in the distribution of these goods the prices to be received therefor shall not be either greater or less than those which are fairly reasonable to all concerned. A schedule of prices which we deem fair to all under present conditions is herein set forth;" but also: "Any B. V. D. goods which shall be shipped to you should not therefore be sold at prices greater or less than our latest retailers' prices."

Defendant is a jobber at Cincinnati. It had been unable to buy directly from plaintiff, although it had offered complete assurance that prices would not be cut. It was thus compelled to buy from others. Several years before the Sanatogen decision plaintiff inaugurated a system of placing a selected serial number upon the bottom of each carton contained in a given case. This secret mark, being entered on plaintiff's books, furnished means of identifying the jobber to whom the box had been shipped, and plaintiff claims this enabled it to prevent fraudulent substitution. Defendant claimed and exercised the right to remove these secret marks from cartons containing plaintiff's goods. It was to enjoin this action that the bill was filed. Defendant justifies its action as necessary to protect the jobbers from whom it has bought against the consequences of selling below plaintiff's prescribed prices.

The district court dismissed the bill on the grounds, first, that plaintiff parted with the title to its goods and their inclosing cartons when it sold them, and that it had no concern with defendant's treatment of the cartons after the latter had acquired full ownership; and, second, that one of the purposes, if not the real purpose, of plaintiff in putting the secret mark on the cartons is to enable it to determine which of its wholesalers is cutting prices, with a view of striking the offender from the selected list of jobbers.

The district court was clearly right in dismissing the bill. The broad rule that the seller of merchandise outright parts with all control over it is no longer open to question. While the decisions to this effect have been for the most part in suits where the protection with respect to price maintenance was claimed under patent, copyright, or trademark, yet the rule stated was applied, not because of such features, but in spite of them, and upon the fundamental ground that the control of the owner over the article sold ended with the complete passing of title. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Sanatogen Case, supra; Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. 243 U. S. 490, 61 L. ed. 866, L.R.A. 1917E, 1196, 37 Sup. its goods was absolute, and completely passed title, not only to the goods themselves, but to their inclosing cartons. No authorities are cited, nor have we found any, which, since the line of decisions above referred to, lend support to plaintiff's claim. In Coca-Cola Co. v. Bennett, 151 C. C. A. 449, 238 Fed. 513 (so far as material here), it was merely held unfair competition for the purchaser of plaintiff's goods in bulk to sell them in bottles bearing plaintiff's name and trademark when plaintiff had already sold to others the sole bottling privilege. Ingersoll v. Doyle (D. C.) 247 Fed. 620, was a case of trademark infringement. The recent "Associated Press" decisions seem to us not at all in point. Neither is there application in cases like Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham (C. C.) 146 Fed. 190, s. c. 79 C. C. A. 228, 149 Fed. 408; and Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite (C. C.) 133 Fed. 794, where (before the Sanatogen decision) provisions expressly designed to enforce price restrictions were sustained.

The case of B. V. D. Co. v. Kommel, 119 C. C. A. 39, 200 Fed. 559, specially relied upon by plaintiff, is not persuasive of its contention. Not only was that case decided several years before the Sanatogen Case, but what was there said favorable to plaintiff is merely obiter, and apparently not even the unanimously accepted view of the court. Manifestly, cases involving protection of marks on articles still belonging to a plaintiff have no application. Conceding that plaintiff's secret system is susceptible of entirely legitimate and proper use, and even that it was not used illegitimately in the present case, the action below was nevertheless right. There was here no invasion of trademark, and no breach or attempted breach of any legitimate trust relation on the part of either defendants or their vendors.

The suggestion that the erasure of the serial number will enable the sale of former season goods as if put out during the current season, and thus affect plaintiff's good will, relates to a condition too remote and unsubstantial to justify the attempted restriction, especially as the purchasers from the plaintiff's jobbers were under no obligation even to retain or use the boxes in which the goods were originally sold, and sales of past season goods were not forbidden.

It cannot, however, be said that the conclusion of the district court that plaintiff's reason for using its secret marking system embraced at least the enforcement of its price maintenance system, and thus was an unlawful restraint of trade, is without justification. To say the least, equity will not lend its aid to an attempt of that nature. True, the testimony of plaintiff's president denied such purpose, but in view of all the other testimony in the case, the court was not bound to accept that statement at its face value. The district judge heard and saw the witnesses, and his conclusions should not be disturbed.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.

NOTE.

The decision in the reported case

(B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC, ante, 440) rests upon two postulates: first, that the serial number placed by the complainant on the carton in which its goods were packed served no other purpose than to enable it to maintain its price restrictions; and, second, that the maintenance of the retail price is a matter with which a patentee who receives from the wholesaler all that he expects to receive for the goods sold by him has no concern. The validity of the second postulate is discussed in the annotation appended to UNITED STATES v. COLGATE & Co. post, 449, on "Right of manufacturer, producer, or wholesaler to control retail price."

If, however, as is indicated by the COLGATE & Co. CASE, a manufacturer has an absolute and unqualified right to refuse to sell to price cutters so long as the retail price which he is seeking to maintain is a reasonable one and the refusal to sell is not part of a scheme to maintain a monopoly, it would seem that it might logically be held that he is entitled to protection in the use of serial numbers which are employed by him for the purpose of detecting price cutters. Whether the courts will take this view or not, however, will probably depend upon their attitude upon the question of the desirability of permitting a manufacturer to name the price to be paid by the ultimate consumer. Those who refuse to interpose for the protection of the manufacturer may justify their decision by holding that the right to refuse to deal with another is merely a permissive rather than a protected right.

COLGATE & COMPANY.

Monopoly — unlawful combination — maintaining resale prices.

1. Conduct of a manufacturer which, as intended, has the effect of procuring adherence on the part of its wholesale and retail customers to resale prices fixed by it, does not offend against the unlawful combination provisions of the Sherman Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890, where there was no agreement which obligated any dealer not to resell except at the fixed prices, his course in this respect being affected only by the fact that he might, by his action, incur the displeasure of the manufacturer, who could refuse to make further sales to him.

Appeal — by government in criminal case — scope of review.

2. The Federal district court's interpretation of the indictment must be accepted by the Federal Supreme Court on a direct writ of error sued out under the Act of March 2, 1907, to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the indictment, which is based upon the construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded. Review in such case is confined to the question of the construction of the statute involved in the decision below.

Monopoly — combination — right to select customers.

3. In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the Sherman Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890, does not restrict the long-recognized right of trader or manufacturer, engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to the parties with whom he will deal, and to announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell.

[See 19 R. C. L. 72, 153 et seq.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia (Waddill, District J.) to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment charging the existence of a combination forbidden by the Sherman Anti-trust Act. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The Sherman Act does not deprive the manufacturer of his liberty to manufacture or not, as he pleases, or to sell or not, as he pleases.

The conduct here involved does not constitute a combination in restraint of trade, in violation of the act.

Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. v. Cream of Wheat Co. supra.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

Writs of error from district courts directly here may be taken by the United States "from a decision or judgment quashing, setting aside, or sustaining a demurrer to, any indictment, or any count thereof, where such decision or judgment is based upon the invalidity, or construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded." Act of March 2, 1907, chap. 2564, 34 Stat. at L. 1246, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1704, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 149. Upon such a writ "we have no authority to revise the mere interpretation of an indictment, and are confined to ascertaining whether the court in a case under review erroneously construed the statute." "We must accept that court's interpretation of the indictments and confine our review to the question of the construction of the statute involved in its decision." United States v. Carter, 231 U. S. 492, 493, 58 L. ed. 330, 331, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173; United States v. Miller, 223 U. S. 599, 602, 56 L. ed. 568, 569, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 323.

Appeal—by government in criminal case—scope of review.

Being of opinion that "the indictment should set forth such a state of facts as to make it clear that a manufacturer, engaged in what was believed to be the lawful conduct of its business, has violated some known law before it is haled into court to answer the charge of a commission of a crime," and holding that it "fails to charge any offense under the Sherman Act or any other law of the United States," that is to say, as to the substance of the indictment and the conduct and act charged therein, the trial court sustained a demurrer to the one before us. Its reasoning and conclusions are set out in a written opinion. 253 Fed. 522.

We are confronted by an uncertain interpretation of an indictment itself couched in rather vague and general language. Counsel differ radically concerning the meaning of the opinion below, and there is much room for the controversy between them.

The indictment runs only against Colgate & Company, a corporation engaged in manufacturing soap and toilet articles and selling them throughout the Union. It makes no reference to monopoly, and proceeds solely upon the theory of an unlawful combination. After setting out defendant's organization, place, and character of business and general methods of selling and distributing products through wholesale and retail merchants, it alleges:

"During the aforesaid period of time, within the said eastern district of Virginia and throughout the United States, the defendant knowingly and unlawfully created and engaged in a combination with said wholesale and retail dealers, in the eastern district of Virginia and throughout the United States, for the purpose and with the effect of procuring adherence on the part of such dealers (in reselling such products sold to them aforesaid) to resale prices fixed by the defendant, and of preventing such dealers from reselling such products at lower prices, thus suppressing competition amongst such wholesale dealers, and amongst such retail dealers, in restraint of the aforesaid trade and commerce among the several states, in violation of the act entitled, 'An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890 [26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8820, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 644]."

Following this is a summary of things done to carry out the purposes of the combination: Distribution among dealers of letters, telegrams, circulars, and lists showing uniform prices to be charged; urging them to adhere to such prices and notices, stating that no sales would be made to those who did not; requests, often complied with, for information concerning dealers who had departed from specified prices; investigation and discovery of those not adhering thereto, and placing their names upon "suspended lists;" requests to offending dealers for assurances and promises of future adherence to prices, which were often given; uniform refusals to sell to any who failed to give the same; sales to those who did; similar assurances and promises required of, and given by, other dealers, followed by sales to them; unrestricted sales to dealers with established accounts who had observed specified prices, etc.

Immediately thereafter comes this paragraph:

"By reason of the foregoing, wholesale dealers in the aforesaid products of the defendant in the eastern district of Virginia and throughout the United States, with few exceptions, resold, at uniform prices fixed by the defendant, the aforesaid products, sold to them by the defendant, and refused to resell such products at lower prices to retail dealers in the states where the respective wholesale dealers did business and in other states. For the same reason retail dealers in the aforesaid products of the defendant in the eastern district of Virginia and throughout the United States resold, at uniform prices fixed by the defendant, the aforesaid products, sold to them by the defendant and by the aforesaid wholesale dealers, and refused to sell such products at lower prices to the consuming public in the states where the respective retail dealers did business and in other states. Thus competition in the sale of such products, by wholesale dealers to retail dealers, and by retail dealers to the consuming public, was suppressed, and the prices of such products to the retail dealers and to the consuming public in the eastern district of Virginia and throughout the United States were maintained and enhanced."

In the course of its opinion the trial court said:

"No charge is made that any contract was entered into by and on the part of the defendant, and any of its retail customers, in restraint of interstate trade and commerce,—the averment being, in effect, that it knowingly and unlawfully created and engaged in a combination with certain of its wholesale and retail customers, to procure adherence on their part, in the sale of its products sold to them, to resale prices fixed by the defendant; and that, in connection therewith, such wholesale and retail customers gave assurances and promises, which resulted in the enhancement and maintenance of such prices, and in the suppression of competition by wholesale dealers, and retail dealers, and by the latter to the consuming public.

"In the view taken by the court, the indictment here fairly presents the question of whether a manufacturer of products shipped in interstate trade is subject to criminal prosecution under the Sherman Act, for entering into a combination in restraint of such trade and commerce, because he agrees with his wholesale and retail customers, upon prices claimed by them to be fair and reasonable, at which the same may be resold, and declines to sell his products to those who will not thus stipulate as to prices. This, at the threshold, presents for the determination of the court how far one may control and dispose of his own property; that is to say, whether there is any limitation thereon, if he proceeds in respect thereto in a lawful and bona fide manner. That he may not do so fraudulently, collusively, and in unlawful combination with others, may be conceded. Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Asso. v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 614, 58 L. ed. 1490, 1500, L.R.A.1915A, 788, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951. But it by no means follows that, being a manufacturer of a given article, he may not, without incurring any criminal liability, refuse absolutely to sell the same at any price, or to sell at a named sum to a customer, with the understanding that such customer will resell only at an agreed price between them, and should the customer not observe the understanding as to retail prices, exercise his undoubted right to decline further to deal with such person.

"The pregnant fact should never be lost sight of that no averment is made of any contract or agreement having been entered into whereby the defendant, the manufacturer, and his customers, bound themselves to enhance and maintain prices, further than is involved in the circumstance that the manufacturer, the defendant here, refused to sell to persons who would not resell at indicated prices, and that certain retailers made purchases on this condition, whereas, inferentially, others declined so to do. No suggestion is made that the defendant, the manufacturer, attempted to reserve or retain any interest in the goods sold, or to restrain the vendee in his right to barter and sell the same without restriction. The retailer, after buying, could, if he chose, give away his purchase or sell it at any price he saw fit, or not sell it at all, his course in these respects being affected only by the fact that he might by his action incur the displeasure of the manufacturer, who could refuse to make further sales to him, as he had the undoubted right to do. There is no charge that the retailers themselves entered into any combination or agreement with each other, or that the defendant acted other than with his customers individually."

Our problem is to ascertain, as accurately as may be, what interpretation the trial court placed upon the indictment,—not to interpret it ourselves; and then to determine whether, so construed, it fairly charges violation of the Sherman Act. Counsel for the government maintain, in effect, that, as so interpreted, the indictment adequately charges an unlawful combination (within the doctrine of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376) resulting from restrictive agreements between defendant and sundry dealers whereby the latter obligated themselves not to resell except at agreed prices; and to support this position they specifically rely upon the above-quoted sentence in the opinion which begins, "In the view taken by the court," etc. On the other hand, defendant maintains that, looking at the whole opinion, it plainly construes the indictment as alleging only recognition of the manufacturer's undoubted right to specify resale prices and refuse to deal with anyone who failed to maintain the same.

Considering all said in the opinion (notwithstanding some serious doubts), we are unable to accept the construction placed upon it by the government. We cannot, e. g., wholly disregard the statement that "the retailer, after buying, could, if he chose, give away his purchase or sell it at any price he saw fit, or not sell it at all, his course in these respects being affected only by the fact that he might by his action incur the displeasure of the manufacturer, who could refuse to make further sales to him, as he had the undoubted right to do." And we must conclude that, as interpreted below, the indictment does not charge Colgate & Company with selling its products to dealers under agreements which obligated the latter not to resell except at prices fixed by the company.

Monopoly—unlawful combination—maintaining resale prices.

The position of the defendant is more nearly in accord with the whole opinion and must be accepted. And as counsel for the government were careful to state on the argument that this conclusion would require affirmation of the judgment below, an extended discussion of the principles involved is unnecessary.

The purpose of the Sherman Act is to prohibit monopolies, contracts, and combinations which probably would unduly interfere with the free exercise of their rights by those engaged, or who wish to engage, in trade and commerce,—in a word, to preserve the right of freedom to trade. In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the act does not restrict the long-recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal. And, of course, he may announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell. "The trader or manufacturer, on the other hand, carries on an entirely private business, and may sell to whom he pleases." United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 320, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540. "A retail dealer has the unquestioned right to stop dealing with a wholesaler for reasons sufficient to himself, and may do so because he thinks such dealer is acting unfairly in trying to undermine his trade." Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Assn. v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 614, 58 L. ed. 1490, 1500, L.R.A.1915A, 788, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951. See also Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 56, 55 L. ed. 619, 643, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447. In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. supra, the unlawful combination was effected through contracts which undertook to prevent dealers from freely exercising the right to sell.

The judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

I. Existence of restrictions as to resale price.

The right of a manufacturer or other producer to fix the resale price of his product, where it can be exercised at all, must rest in contract. He cannot project his control beyond his own sales by imposing conditions as to the price at which goods can be resold which will follow them into the hands of third persons with whom he has no contractual relation. Such conditions are void as obnoxious to the public interest and repugnant to the absolute title conveyed. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 490, 61 L. ed. 866, L.R.A.1917E, 1196, 7 A.L.R.—29.

Thus, in Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 490, 61 L. ed. 866, L.R.A.1917E, 1196, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 955, it is said that attempts to sell property for a full price, and yet to place restraints upon its further alienation, have been hateful to the law from Lord Coke's day to ours, because obnoxious to the public interest.

So, also, in National Phonograph Co. v. Menck [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 336, 80 L. J. P. C. N. S. 105, 104 L. T. N. S. 5, 27 Times L. R. 239, 28 Rep. Pat. Cas. 229, 48 Scot. L. It is immaterial that the purchaser of the goods may have bought with notice of the condition. Garst v. Hall & L. Co. (1900) 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219; *Taddy v. Nor can the manufacturer create the necessary privity of contract between himself and persons into whose hands the goods may come, by notice attached thereto. *Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Thus, no contract between one who offers a book for sale to the general public and a purchaser of the book without previous knowledge of a restriction upon its resale is created by the latter's acceptance of a copy containing a notice upon the inner side of the cover, by which the seller seeks to impose such restriction. Authors & Newspapers Asso. v. O'Gorman Co. (1906) 147 Fed. 616.

A sale by a manufacturer of his product at a price which represents all that he expects to receive as a result of the transaction is not rendered conditional by a notice accompanying the goods, stating that "this package and its contents are sold conditionally by us with the distinct understanding, which understanding is a condition of the sale, that the package and contents shall not be retailed nor advertised nor offered for sale at less than 10 cents per package." United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78.

No contract between a manufacturer and one who purchases his product from a third person, paying the full retail price therefor, may be implied, so as to subject the purchaser to an action for the stipulated liquidated damages, from the presence of a notice on the box, stating: "This box of Phenyo-Caffein is sold to be consumed only, and the title continues in the Phenyo-Caffein Company, to prohibit a resale thereof by any purchaser at retail, except that it may be resold for not less than 25 cents, or 5 boxes for $1. The acceptance of this box by any person is assent to this condition of sale and a direct agreement with the Phenyo-Caffein Company, that for each violation the possession of the box may be recovered, and the party selling will pay the said company $21 as liquidated damages, it being impossible to ascertain the exact damages which the said company will suffer by violation,"—although the defendant and plaintiff had corresponded in regard to the sale of the plaintiff's product, and the former knew of the terms of the contract. Garst v. Wissler (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 532.

If any contract is to be created by the purchase by a retailer from a factor of an article upon the container of which is printed a condition that the article is not to be resold for less than the specified price, it is not one of which the manufacturer may claim the benefit. McGruther v. Pitcher [1904] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 306, 3 B. R. C. 292, 74 L. J. Ch. N. S. 653, 20 Times L. R. 652, 53 Week. Rep. 138, 91 L. T. N. S. 678.

No contract between the manufacturer of goods and a retailer who has purchased them from a wholesaler, which will bind the retailer to maintain the minimum selling price fixed by the manufacturer, is created by attaching to the goods a label or notice stating that acceptance of the goods will be deemed a contract between a purchaser and the manufacturer, that he will observe the conditions fixing the retail price, and that, in the case of a purchase by a retail dealer through a wholesale dealer, the latter shall be deemed to be the agent of the manufacturer. Taddy v. Sterious [1904] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 354, 3 B. R. C. 286, 73 L. J. Ch. N. S. 191, 52 Week. Rep. 152, 89 L. T. N. S. 628, 20 Times L. R. 102.

A notice by a book publisher to dealers, that the book must not be sold at less than a specified net retail price, violation of which will be treated as infringement of the copyright, will not entitle the publisher to an injunction and accounting against a dealer who does not obey the notice, on the theory that the purchase of books completed a contract to maintain the price, since the only penalty to which the dealer can be assumed to have assented is the stated one of having his act treated as an infringement of the Copyright law. Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus (1906) 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787, 77

C. C. A. 607, 147 Fed. 15, affirmed on another ground in (1908) 210 U. S. 389, 52 L. ed. 1086, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722.

But where, at the time of the sale, and as a part of it, a written statement of terms, containing an agreement not to resell for less than a certain price, is read to the purchaser and delivered to him, such agreement containing the stipulation that the acceptance of the goods with notice of the conditions of the sale should be an assent to the terms, the acceptance of the goods by the purchaser without an expression of dissent constitutes a contract. Garst v. Harris (1900) 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 174.

It should be noted, however, that, under certain circumstances, one who is not contractually bound to maintain the fixed resale price may nevertheless be required to do so, under penalty of being held answerable in damages. Thus, where a party, by the exercise of fraud or deception, obtains goods without signing the required agreement, he may be subject to the same liabilities as if he had been bound thereby. See V. b, infra. And one who knowingly induces or procures another to violate his contract to maintain a certain resale price may likewise be held answerable, where such agreement is one which the courts would enforce as between the immediate parties thereto. See V. b, infra.

II. Validity of various devices employed to control resale price.

a. In general; reasons for and against.

The devices which have been employed to control the price at which an article shall be resold may, for the purposes of this note, be described as the rebate system, the contract system, the agency system, and the plan pursued in UNITED STATES v. COLGATE & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 443, of refusing to sell to persons who fail to conform to the expressed wish of the manufacturer as to the prices at which his goods shall be resold.

Under the rebate system, the manufacturer undertakes to refund to dealers maintaining the selling price a portion of the purchase price paid by them. This, while operating as an inducement to the dealer to resell only at the price named, in no way binds him to do so.

The contract system is of various forms. In some cases the manufacturer deals directly with the retailer, who contracts to resell only at the fixed price. In other cases, it consists of contracts between the manufacturer and wholesalers whereby the latter agree to supply the trade at a stated price, and to sell only to such dealers as shall agree with them to maintain the fixed retail price. In still other cases, the contracts with the wholesalers require them to sell only to dealers approved by the manufacturer, with whom the manufacturer contracts directly that, in consideration of their being supplied with his product, they will sell only at the fixed retail price. The observance of these contracts is usually insured by affixing serial numbers to the packages in which the goods are to be retailed, to permit their being traced, and by requiring the wholesalers to make reports as to sales of goods effected by them. In another variant form, which, however, has been held only colorable, the contract with the wholesaler purports to make him a distributing agent for the manufacturer.

Under the agency system, the manufacturer is the retailer of his own products, maintaining agencies in various localities for the purpose. This method of marketing one's product is to be distinguished from that in which the so-called agent is really a vendee; albeit the dividing line is sometimes difficult to trace. See II. d, infra.

The only one of these devices concerning the essential validity of which (apart from any question of unlawful combination) there is any dispute is the contract system. This is due to a difference in judicial opinion as to whether a manufacturer or producer, having parted with the title to his goods, and having received for them all that he expects to receive, has any legitimate interest in regulating the price at which they shall be resold, so that the contract which he makes for that purpose may be regarded as something other than a cover for a combination among the dealers not to compete with one another; and as to whether or not, conceding such interest to exist, such contracts, are, upon the whole, detrimental to the public welfare.

As remarked by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1918) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447: "Whether a producer of goods should be permitted to fix by contract, express or implied, the price at which the purchaser may resell them, and if so, under what conditions, is an economic question. To decide it wisely, it is necessary to consider the relevant facts, industrial and commercial, rather than established legal principles."

And in United States v. Keystone Watch Case Co. (1915) 218 Fed. 502, it was said by McPherson, J., in discussing the question of the standard by which the reasonableness of a restraint of trade is to be determined: "Where is a court to find the standard of reason? It seems to us that it must be found in the gradually accumulated results of general experience and observation in the gathered wisdom of the community, for this is the product of a common and a prolonged effort by men who theorize and by practical men alike to deal as fairly, as justly, and as equitably as may be possible with situations that are often obscure and complicated and of high importance to large classes and to many individuals. Obviously, a standard should have a true relation to the subject measured; and since the inquiry here is whether in a given case trade is likely to be or has actually been unduly restrained, reason can answer the question only by going to the facts of life and drawing upon the accumulated store of knowledge."

Some consideration of the arguments by which it has been sought to demonstrate the advantages which accrue to the manufacturer and to the public from the maintenance of a fixed retail price is, therefore, appropriate.

Arguments in favor of price control.

The advantages alleged to accrue from the maintenance of a fixed retail price, and the effects which may follow the cutting of such price by dealers, are set forth by Mr. Gilbert H. Montague in his book, "Business Competition and the Law" (published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York), as follows: "In terms of distribution, the difference between unbranded goods and popular-branded goods is this: Unbranded goods are backed only by the selling force of the reputation and personal equation of a dealer trying to pose to the purchaser as a principal, while the purchaser is instinctively regarding him as only an agent. Popular-branded goods, however, are backed by the combined selling forces of the reputation and personal equation of the identified manufacturer, whom the purchaser regards as the real principal with whom he is dealing, and also of the reputation and personal equation of the dealer, whom the purchaser regards, and prefers to treat, as really only an agent between the manufacturer and himself. In the marketing of popular-branded goods the selling force of the manufacturer's own reputation and responsibility begins, as in the case of unbranded goods, with the manufacturer's immediate customers; but instead of stopping there, it continues down through all the wholesalers, middlemen, dealers, and retailers until the last retailer has parted with the goods to the ultimate consumer. After the wholesalers, or the middlemen, or the dealers, or the retailers have bought the popular-branded goods, and they in turn offer them to their respective customers, they appeal to audiences that are all in a very different mood from those which judge unbranded goods. If the brand is firmly and favorably fixed in the popular mind, the customer is measurably convinced at the outset regarding the quality of the goods and the reputation and responsibility of the manufacturer. If to this knowledge be now added knowledge of the standard price at which the goods may be bought of any dealer, and this standard price is also measurably satisfactory, then practically every factor that is determining in a sale is already favorably active. Wholesalers' salesmen do not need to call so frequently upon retailers, nor to exert so much effort in obtaining their orders. Retailers are relieved from the necessity of spending so much time assuring consumers regarding the price and quality of popular-branded goods. The manufacturer counts in each transaction of sale and resale, and his reputation and personal equation are the chief selling forces that at every stage sell popular-branded goods. Every dealer benefits equally in this selling force added by the manufacturer. For every purchaser knows that no matter from whom he buys these popular-branded goods, he will receive the same quality for the standard price. Competition, therefore, becomes transformed, and vastly increased, and expands into national dimensions. Every popular brand of goods competes with all unbranded goods of the same general class, and with all other brands of goods of the same general class. Prices on any popular brand of goods are prevented by this competition from being too high. For any excess in price of one brand over that of unbranded goods or other brands of goods of the same general class cannot exceed the sum that the consumer will be willing to pay for this insurance of quality and reliability. The pull of the consumer's reliance, that draws popular-branded goods swiftly through the hands of wholesalers, middlemen, dealers, and retailers, and into the hands of the ultimate consumers, and the preconceived conviction of purchasers in favor of the goods at every stage along the line, and the fortification of innumerable places where the purchasers' whim might otherwise break down the line,—achievements all of which the manufacturer himself, unaided except by his own labor and capital, creates by aggressive popularization of his brand,—all these are forces as real and potent as physical laws. Collectively, they are the forces that constitute 'goodwill.' While the manufacturer's popularization of his brand is to-day frequently accomplished through advertising the particular merit of the goods, this is only because advertising—as contrasted with the word-of-mouth salesmanship of the manufacturer's salesmen and the dealer's clerks—is the least costly way by which the manufacturer can increase distribution soon enough, and to such an extent as will enable him to expand his production and to obtain the lower costs that alone can justify the price at which he markets his goods. The traveling men's pay rolls, railroad tickets, and hotel bills, the solicitors' wages and expense accounts, the store and show-room rents, the overhead charges and the clerk hire that would be needed in order to offer for sale any specialty simultaneously in every city, town, and hamlet in the country so that every dealer and consumer in the United States could see it, would infinitely exceed the cost at which practically the same result can be accomplished through country-wide advertising in newspapers and periodicals and other mediums of local and national circulation. . . . Through some or all of these means, however, and always through unceasing delivery of quality, the manufacturer of branded goods must vest his brands with goodwill, before he can harness to them this pull of the consumer's reliance, or make the selling forces of his own reputation and responsibility the factors that shall play the chief part in the sales and resales of his branded goods down to the final sale of the last retailer to the ultimate consumer. Here, then, is the elemental reason why the manufacturer of popular-branded goods, who has achieved all this, feels the necessity, and claims the right, to fix the standard price beyond his immediate customers: It is the manufacturer's reputation, responsibility, personal equation, and goodwill, and not the wholesaler's or middleman's or dealer's or retailer's efforts, that constitute the chief selling force in each successive sale and resale. In the marketing of popular-branded goods, middlemen and dealers, in the business sense as distinguished from the legal sense, are really only agents of the manufacturer. The manufacturer is the real principal, and the real seller of the goods; and to the extent that he is the principal and the seller, the manufacturer claims the right that everyone else has always had to fix the price of his own goods to his own customers. The manufacturer of popular-branded goods has an interest in the success of his goods to the extent of the entire volume of sales of all the dealers that handle them. Each dealer has an interest in the success of those goods only to the extent of the relatively small quantity he handles. The manufacturer of popular-branded goods has his constant expenses for advertising and solicitation to increase the volume of their distribution. Middlemen and dealers in those goods do not have this burden, though it operates for their benefit. Nor is this extra cost passed on to the public. For the standard price on every popular brand of goods is first put at the figure which will take off the volume necessary in order to keep the manufacturer's costs low enough to justify the price. Increased volume thus lessens costs and permits increased quality for the same standard price; and this in turn increases volume again, with the result that the quality delivered to the consumer is several times compounded. The standard price on popular-branded goods does not tend to keep the manufacturer's profit per article high. Competition from unbranded goods and from other brands of goods of the same general class, as we have already seen, prevents that. The function of the standard price, in the distribution of popular-branded goods, is simply to enlarge the distribution, and to keep it large through continual fostering of the consumer's reliance; and thus, while keeping the manufacturer's profit per article low, to keep the number of articles sold, and therefore the number of these low profits, just as plentiful as the consumer's demand will dictate. Since the manufacturer of popular-branded goods assumes the chief part of the sales-manship in each successive sale and resale of the goods, and the consuming public does not have its standard price increased,—for competition, as we have seen, prevents this,—it would seem to be in the public interest to permit the manufacturer to use this reasonable means to expand his business for the sake of more effective competition with his rivals. . . . 'Price cutting' of unbranded goods necessarily can affect only the small field and narrow interest comprising the price cutter's own trade. Since the goods are unbranded, and therefore not readily comparable with others of the same general class, the price cutter's competitors have almost as good an opportunity as before to avail of their own reputation, personal equation and good will to preserve the confidence of their trade in the quality and prices of the goods on their shelves. No verdict expressed by the price cutter's customers, or the customers of his competitors, can, therefore, possibly prejudice other dealers handling the same goods elsewhere. For there is no ready way by which these unbranded goods can be identified with the other unbranded goods that the price cutter is sacrificing. Nor can it embarrass the manufacturer of the unbranded goods. For he is unknown in the transaction of the retail sale, and, indeed, in any sale beyond the sale which the manufacturer himself made to the middleman. 'Price cutting' of unbranded goods, therefore, has substantially no ulterior bad effects. 'Price cutting' of popular-branded goods, however, affects not only the price cutter's trade and competitors, but also everyone trading in that particular brand, up as high as the manufacturer himself and down as far as the ultimate consumer. As regards the economic forces involved in their distribution, unbranded goods and popular-branded goods, we have already found, are utterly different. Since the latter are all ear marked and standardized, and their price and quality have been familiarized widely by known brands, there can be no question of their quality nor of the manufacturer's rela-bility; and no appeal by the price cutter's competitors to their own personal equation can overcome this difference in price. Against 'price cutting' on popular-branded goods, therefore, the price cutter's competitors can present no ready argument. Until they throw out this brand, and take up another line, the 'price cutting' of their competitors on this brand threatens the dealers' actual existence. 'Price cutting' on popular-branded goods, therefore, affects their entire national distribution. The capture by the price cutter of his competitor's customers, under these circumstances, is seldom due to any enduring efficiency on the part of the price cutter. More often it is only a sudden raid, timed by the price cutter so as to produce the greatest possible demoralization and stampede of his competitor's trade, not only in the lines on which he is cutting prices but also in all other lines, and executed at a large initial loss to the price cutter in the confidence that, under cover of the resulting demoralization and stampede, he can more than recoup upon other lines. So immediate and so deadly is this kind of 'price cutting' that if a price cutter misses killing his dealer-competitor,—whom he generally aims to kill whenever he resorts to this kind of 'price cutting,'—he not infrequently kills, and always seriously hurts, the manufacturer of the popular-branded goods,—toward whom the price cutter, to give him credit, seldom has any real ill feeling whatsoever. For to the extent that the manufacturer has popularized his brand and developed a volume of trade, he begins to suffer the moment that dealers affected by the 'price cutting' of others become unable to handle the goods at a profit and cease to handle them at all. The manufacturer's own ability to distribute economically then stops. He cannot nationally distribute his goods direct to consumers—save, perhaps, in the case of a few high-priced articles—except at a vastly increased cost as compared with the normal basis. Since the goods are all identified by popular brands, the sensation which the 'price cutter' creates at the expense of his competitors fixes in the minds of consumers generally a depreciated price for the goods on the shelves of all other dealers who handle them, and prejudices every dealer in his struggle to obtain among his own trade the reputation for being an efficient and reliable dealer. Dealers everywhere, therefore, begin to avoid the goods like pestilence; distribution falls off, production has to be curtailed, the manufacturer's costs increase, and his ability to continue marketing the goods at the same price and quality is threatened, so that through the resulting loss in the reputation of the goods among dealers and consumers the manufacturer's business is always seriously hurt, and not infrequently is killed."

So, also, in deciding UNITED STATES v. COLGATE & CO. (reported herewith) ante, 443, in the court below (253 Fed. 527), it was said by Waddill, District Judge: "It cannot be said that the defendant has no interest in the prices at which its goods shall be sold. On the contrary, it had a vital interest, in so far as cutting the same would tend to demoralize the trade, and might have been more injuriously affected by the result of this disorganization than the public would be benefited by a temporary reduction in the prices of its products. The sale of the defendant's particular soaps cannot be said to be a necessity, or that the same bears a large proportion to the entire manufacture of soaps of the kind and grade involved. The successful prosecution of the defendant's business, and the continued use of its soap by the public, depend upon its ability to find and maintain a market for its output. Price cutting would almost inevitably result in reducing the defendant's business in a given community to only those engaged in that practice, and deprive it of the patronage of the great body of wholesalers and retailers engaged in what they believed to be a fair and legitimate conduct of their business. It by no means follows that, in the end, the public would be benefited, as the price cutter could easily raise prices after the demoralization caused by his conduct had been brought about, and profit individually by so doing. What the public is interested in is that only reasonable and fair prices shall be charged for what it buys, and it is not claimed that the defendant's manner of conducting its business has otherwise resulted."

In Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 86 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144, it is said: "In the absence of a monopoly, either actual or potential, as above defined, a contract fixing retail prices to the consumer cannot have an effect appreciably inimical to the public interest, because it cannot fix prices at an unreasonably high figure without defeating its own purpose by either signally failing to maintain the fixed price, or putting the individual manufacturer out of business. In either case, it fails to restrict competition. Either the consumers will not buy the product at the price fixed, or, if they do, the high price will stimulate competition in production and the price will inevitably fall. The given manufacturer will thus be compelled to accept one or the other alternative. He must either fix the price to cover only a reasonable profit, or he must retire from business; and this for the simple reason that, in the absence of a monopoly, either actual or potential, of the entire supply, the natural conditions of trade will defeat any attempted restriction of competition. Under our present competitive system, the public is as vitally interested in the maintenance of competition in the excellence of the product as it is in the competition in prices. The one is as essential to value received at any price as the other is to a reasonable price for any value. Lacking either, the public will eventually be the loser, either in quality of product or in enhancement of price, which comes to the same thing. No sound public policy will insist upon the complete sacrifice of competition in one of these elements to competition in the other. A monopoly, however, either complete or approximate, tends to the destruction of both; hence is on all scores against public policy. But where a given product is not in the hands of one man or a combination of men, there is no monopoly, either actual or proximate, and the public has no interest hostile to a contract by a single manufacturer among many, intended and reasonably calculated to enable him to maintain an unusual standard of excellence in that part of the aggregate of the given product which he puts out. On the contrary, the public interest, so far as it is touched by the contract, is in sympathy with it, because served by it. . . . Finally, it seems to us an economic fallacy to assume that the competition which, in the absence of monopoly, benefits the public is competition between rival retailers. The true competition is between rival articles, a competition in excellence, which can never be maintained if, through the perfidy of the retailer who cuts prices for his own ulterior purposes, the manufacturer is forced to compete in prices with goods of his own production, while the retailer recoups his losses on the cut price by the sale of other articles at, or above, their reasonable price. It is a fallacy to assume that the price cutter pockets the loss. The public makes it up on other purchases. The manufacturer alone is injured, except as the public is also injured through the manufacturer's inability, in the face of cut prices, to maintain the excellence of his product. Fixing the price on all brands of high grade flour is a very different thing from fixing the price on one brand of high grade flour. The one means destruction of all competition and of all incentive to increased excellence. The other means heightened competition and intensified incentive to increased excellence. It will not do to say that the manufacturer has no interest to protect by contract in the goods after he has sold them. They are personally identified and morally guaranteed by his mark and his advertisement. Mazetti v. Armour & Co. (1918) 75 Wash. 622, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 213, 135 Pac. 633, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 140. His reputation as a manufacturer, one of his chief assets, is bound up in them."

Another way in which price cutting may operate to the manufacturer's detriment is, that other dealers, instead of meeting the cut price and making a small profit or no profit at all, will endeavor to persuade their customers to purchase something else in which there is more money for the dealers.

Another argument in favor of resale price maintenance is that it enables the small producer to secure for himself the advantages which otherwise might only be achieved by one with sufficiently large capital to enable him to establish a system of actual agencies.

Arguments against price control.

The arguments against it, which are enumerated in the Annual Report of the Federal Trade Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1918, are that: (1) The power to fix prices will usually be abused by the allowance of too large profits; (2) resale price maintenance protects and encourages inefficient jobbers and prevents elimination in the overcrowded field of middlemen; (3) it tends to secure the co-operation of dealers and to prejudice them against brands whose prices are not fixed; (4) it forces other dealers to attempt the control of prices; (5) it encourages general standardization of prices and elimination of normal competition among dealers; and (6) it forces the ultimate consumer to pay higher prices and leaves him no bargaining power with respect to the article concerned.

In the arguments which are made in favor of price control, the advantages accruing to the manufacturer, and the evils attendant upon permitting the retailer to fix his own price, are doubtless rather highly colored. Even in the days of unrestricted price cutting, manufacturers contrived to remain in business and to accumulate comfortable fortunes; and the aggressive price cutter seldom, if ever, succeeded in eliminating competition. The little fish were not invariably gobbled up by the big ones, but preserved their existence by displaying superior activity.

Admitting, however, that some advantage accrues to the manufacturer from the maintenance of a uniform retail sale price, the question remains as to whether a fair share of the resultant benefits is returned to the man who foots the bill,—the ultimate consumer. The benefit claimed to be received by him is the lowering of price incident to quantity production, and an insurance that goods sold under a tradename will maintain a uniform quality which the manufacturer will seek not only to maintain, but to improve. But unfortunately these claims are not always justified by the facts. The consumer does not always share in the economies effected by increased production, nor does the quality of branded goods remain uniform. The public is not always attracted by the equally good article sold at a less price, or by the better article at the same price, but is prone to purchase the article which it has been in the habit of buying, or which is most effectively advertised. Accordingly the manufacturer, especially when confronted by increased cost of production, is subjected to the temptation of attempting to preserve his margin of profit by reducing quality and increasing his advertising appropriation.

b. The rebate system.

A manufacturer may agree to allow a rebate to those who will maintain a selling price indicated by him. John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. (1903) 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L.R.A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136.

A contract whereby the purchaser, in consideration of a certain rebate, agrees not to retail goods at less than the trade price fixed by the manufacturer, is not void as being in restraint of trade, even so far as it relates to goods which may be purchased of other dealers. Clark v. Frank (1885) 17 Mo. App. 602.

An agreement between the vendor and the purchaser of certain goods, that if the purchaser will for a designated period buy all his supply exclusively from the vendor's distributing agent, and will not resell it at any lower prices than the list prices of such distributing agent, the vendor will, upon a proper certificate of such fact, pay a rebate to such purchaser, is not in restraint of trade, since it places the purchaser under no contractual or other restraint in respect of prices at which the goods may be resold, but simply offers an inducement not to undersell the vendor's agent, and only secures to the vendor a reasonable protection in his business. Re Greene (1892) 52 Fed. 104.

Nor is such an arrangement a violation of the Federal Anti-trust Law, as an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce. Ibid.

c. The contract system.

1. In general.

(a) Essential validity.

A contract is not necessarily invalid, because it may operate in restraint of trade. If it is reasonable as between the parties themselves, and not at variance with the public interest, it will be recognized and enforced by the courts:

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, it was said by the court, through Mr. Justice Hughes: "With respect to contracts in restraint of trade, the earlier doctrine of the common law has been substantially modified in adaptation to modern conditions. But the public interest is still the first consideration. To sustain the restraint, it must be found to be reasonable both with respect to the public and to the parties, and that it is limited to what is fairly necessary in the circumstances of the particular case for the protection of the covenantor. Otherwise restraints of trade are void as against public policy. . . . Public welfare is first considered; and if it be not involved and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other party requires, the contract may be sustained."

In an early Ohio case, it is pointed out that the cases upon the question of the validity of contracts in restraint of trade may be separated into two classes, in one of which the question is whether the contracting party has, to a greater extent than fairly required for the protection of his private interests, disabled himself from carrying on his trade or business, and so not only deprived society of a useful member, but created a strong probability of adding to its burdens by reason of idleness or crime. The public in this class of cases is affected only indirectly, through the individual contracting. In the other class, the question arising upon agreements creating combinations of persons engaged or interested in the same kind of business is, whether their object and effect are directly to affect the public by preventing competition and enhancing prices. In the first class of cases, the interests of the public and those of the party are to a great extent the same. Both forbid any restriction of his earning power without an equivalent, and this is the reason why only a partial restriction is permitted, and that only for a valuable consideration. In the second class of cases, the immediate interests of the public and those of the contracting parties are in conflict. The former desire lower, and the latter higher, prices. Any prevention of competition injures the public in this regard. But when competition becomes so great that those engaged in the business cannot carry it on without a loss, the public becomes exposed to the same danger as in the first class. The law, therefore, applies an analogous rule. Those engaged in any trade or business may, to such limited extent as may be fairly necessary to protect their interests, enter into agreements which will result in diminishing competition, and so increasing prices. Hoffman v. Brooks (1884) 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1215.

And in Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 76 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144, it is said: "In considering this question much confusion may be avoided by marking the distinction not always observed in the adjudicated cases between those contracts which, since the earliest history of the law on the subject, have been designated as 'contracts in restraint of trade,' and those more correctly designated as 'contracts in restraint of competition.' The term 'contracts in restraint of trade' has so long been applied to undertakings not to pursue a particular profession, trade, or business, and has so thoroughly acquired that conventional significance, as to render its use in any other connection confusing. The rules relating to such contracts are of long standing and thoroughly established. Such contracts are valid only when restricted as to time and to place, and when reasonably necessary to the protection of the party in whose interest they are made. Conversely stated, such contracts when without limit as to time or place, are invalid. Long v. Towl (1868) 42 Mo. 545, 97 Am. Dec. 355. The broader doctrine inhibiting, as contrary to public policy, all contracts which, by any other means, tend unreasonably to restrict competition, is of much more recent development, and is much less thoroughly settled. This doctrine has to do with the rules of public policy relating to control of markets. See notes to Harding v. American Glucose Co. 64 L.R.A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 238, 239; Noyes, Intercompany Relations, § 336; 2 Eddy, Combinations, §§ 719, 722; Cooke, Combinations, Monopolies & Labor Unions, 2d ed. § 160. This broader doctrine is primarily directed against monopoly in any form, and seeks to protect the public interest by holding invalid all contracts by which monopoly of a given market may be either created or sustained, or, as such, made profitable to its beneficiaries, where the right to make them is not incidental to a legal monopoly such as is accorded by the patent laws. With these last we are not here concerned. It is manifest that in case of such contracts the public interest is not conserved by mere limitations either as to time or space. The public interest can only be secured by a prohibition of all contracts having a tendency to create or foster monopoly by a control of any given market. Noyes, Intercompany Relations, 2d ed. § 357. Since limitations of time and space do not serve as the test of the validity of contracts in restraint of competition, the test must be sought in the reason which underlies the rule of public policy. It must be found in the tendency of the given contract to control the given market. If the contract has that tendency, it is against public policy. If it does not have that tendency, it is not. In applying this test, the public interest is always the first and controlling consideration."

In applying these principles to contracts by which a manufacturer has sought to control the resale price of his product, the courts have reached various conclusions.

The validity of such contracts is denied on the ground that they are not reasonably necessary for the protection of the manufacturer, in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1918) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1913) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007; United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78; Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156; Ford Motor Co. v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 335; B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC (reported herewith) ante, 440; W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Walker (1917) — Ala. App. —, 77 So. 70 (semble); W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803; Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1916) 58 Okla. 344, L.R.A.1917A, 1276, 159 Pac. 1187; Hunt v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1918) — Okla. —, 176 Pac. 410.

Other courts have held such contracts valid as reasonably necessary to the protection of the good will of the manufacturer, and not injurious to the public interest, so long as the restriction does not cover all or a controlling fraction of a given commodity, and the price fixed is fair to the public in that it furnishes only a reasonable profit to the contracting parties, and also so long as a controlling number of the manufacturers or wholesale dealers in such commodity have not made identical contracts with the retailers in such locality. See Ford Motor Co. v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 335; Grogan v. Chaffee (1909) 156 Cal. 611, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 395, 105 Pac. 745; D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsiker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041; Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co. (1915) 28 Cal. App. 660, 153 Pac. 737; Garst v. Harris (1900) 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 174; *Garst v. Cases supporting the view that contracts to control prices are invalid as being in undue restraint of trade.

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, contracts between a manufacturer of proprietary medicines and the dealers whom he permitted to sell his product, comprising most of the dealers in similar articles throughout the country, which fixed the price for all sales, whether at wholesale or retail, were held to operate as a restraint of trade, unlawful both at common law, and, as to interstate commerce, under the Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890. The court said: "The present case is not analogous to that of a sale of good will, or of an interest in a business, or of the grant of a right to use a process of manufacture. The complainant has not parted with any interest in its business or instrumentalities of production. It has conferred no right by virtue of which purchasers of its products may compete with it. It retains complete control over the business in which it is engaged, manufacturing what it pleases and fixing such prices for its own sales as it may desire. Now we are dealing with a single transaction, conceivably unrelated to the public interest. The agreements are designed to maintain prices after the complainant has parted with the title to the articles, and to prevent competition among those who trade in them. The bill asserts the importance of a standard retail price, and alleges generally that confusion and damage have resulted from sales at less than the prices fixed. But the advantage of established retail prices primarily concerns the dealers. The enlarged profits which would result from adherence to the established rates would go to them, and not to the complainant. It is through the inability of the favored dealers to realize these profits, on account of the described competition, that the complainant works out its alleged injury. If there be an advantage to the manufacturer in the maintenance of fixed retail prices, the question remains whether it is one which he is entitled to secure by agreements restricting the freedom of trade on the part of dealers who own what they sell. As to this, the complainant can fare no better with its plan of identical contracts than could the dealers themselves if they formed a combination and endeavored to establish the same restrictions, and thus to achieve the same result, by agreement with each other. If the immediate advantage they would thus obtain would not be sufficient to sustain such a direct agreement, the asserted ulterior benefit to the complainant cannot be regarded as sufficient to support its system. But agreements or combinations between dealers, having for their sole purpose the destruction of competition and the fixing of prices, are injurious to the public interest and void. They are not saved by the advantages which the participants expect to derive from the enhanced price to the consumer. People v. Sheldon (1893) 139 N. Y. 251, 23 L.R.A. 221, 36 Am. 54 U. S. App. 723, 85 Fed. 271, on appeal in (1899) 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96; W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry (1904) 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307; Chapin v. Brown Bros. (1891) 83 Iowa, 156, 12 L.R.A. 428, 32 Am. St. Rep. 297, 48 N. W. 1074; Craft v. McConoughy (1875) 79 Ill. 346, 22 Am. Rep. 171; W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803. The complainant's plan falls within the principle which condemns contracts of this class. It, in effect, created a combination for the prohibited purposes. No distinction can properly be made by reason of the particular character of the commodity in question. It is not entitled to special privilege or immunity. It is an article of commerce, and the rules concerning the freedom of trade must be held to apply to it. Nor does the fact that the margin of freedom is reduced by the control of production make the protection of what remains, in such a case, a negligible matter. And where commodities have passed into the channels of trade and are owned by dealers, the validity of agreements to prevent competition and to maintain prices is not to be determined by the circumstance whether they were produced by several manufacturers or by one, or whether they were previously owned by one or by many. The complainant having sold its product at prices satisfactory to itself, the public is entitled to whatever advantage may be derived from competition in the subsequent traffic."

Mr. Justice Holmes dissented upon the ground that the interests of the public, at least where the necessities of life are not involved, are not unduly prejudiced by agreements seeking to maintain a fixed retail price, saying: "The only question is whether the law forbids a purchaser to contract with his vendor that he will not sell below a certain price. This is the important question in this case. I suppose that in the case of a single object, such as a painting or a statue, the right of the artist to make such a stipulation hardly would be denied.

In other words, I suppose that the reason why the contract is held bad is that it is part of a scheme embracing other similar contracts, each of which applies to a number of similar things, with the object of fixing a general market price. This reason seems to me inadequate in the case before the court. In the first place, by a slight change in the form of the contract the plaintiff can accomplish the result in a way that would be beyond successful attack, if it should make the retail dealers also agents in law as well as in name, and retain the title until the goods left their hands, I cannot conceive that even the present enthusiasm for regulating the prices to be charged by other people would deny that the owner was acting within his rights. It seems to me that this consideration by itself ought to give us pause. But I go farther. There is no statute covering the case; there is no body of precedent that, by ineluctable logic requires the conclusion to which the court has come. The conclusion is reached by extending a certain conception of public policy to a new sphere. On such matters we are in perilous country. I think that at least it is safe to say that the most enlightened judicial policy is to let people manage their own business in their own way, unless the ground for interference is very clear. What, then, is the ground upon which we interfere in the present case? Of course, it is not the interest of the producer. No one, I judge, cares for that. It hardly can be the interest of subordinate vendors, as there seems to be no particular reason for preferring them to the originator and first vendor of the product. Perhaps it may be assumed to be the interest of the consumers and the public. On that point I confess that I am in a minority as to larger issues than are concerned here. I think that we greatly exaggerate the value and importance to the public of competition in the production or distribution of an article (here it is only distribution) as fixing a fair price. What really fixes that is the competition of conflicting desires. We, none of us, can have as much as we want of all the things that we want. Therefore, we have to choose. As soon as the price of something that we want goes above the point at which we are willing to give up other things to have that, we cease to buy it and buy something else. Of course, I am speaking of things that we can get along without. There may be necessities that sooner or later must be dealt with like short rations in a shipwreck, but they are not Dr. Miles's medicines. With regard to things like the latter, it seems to me that the point of most profitable returns marks the equilibrium of social desires, and determines the fair price in the only sense in which I can find meaning in those words. The Dr. Miles Medical Company knows better than we do what will enable it to do the best business. We must assume its retail price to be reasonable, for it is so alleged and the case is here on demurrer; so I see nothing to warrant my assuming that the public will not be served best by the company being allowed to carry out its plan. I cannot believe that in the long run the public will profit by this court permitting knaves to cut reasonable prices for some ulterior purpose of their own, and thus to impair, if not to destroy, the production and sale of articles which it is assumed to be desirable that the public should be able to get."

The decision of the Supreme Court in the foregoing case is followed without discussion in Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. v. Buck (1913) 208 Fed. 383.

And in Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1913) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447, it was likewise held that a contract between the general sales agent of a manufacturer and a dealer in its manufactured product, restricting the price at which such products shall be resold, is contrary to the general law, and, so far as it affects interstate commerce, a contravention of the Federal Anti-trust Law.

And in Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156, it is said to be the general and well-settled rule that a system of contracts between a manufacturer and retail dealers by which the manufacturer, in connection with absolute sales of his product, attempts to control the retail prices for all sales by all dealers, eliminating all competition and fixing the amount which the ultimate purchaser shall pay, amounts to a restraint of trade, and is invalid both at common law, and, so far as it affects interstate commerce, under the Sherman Anti-trust Act.

In Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1916) 58 Okla. 344, L.R.A. 1917A, 1276, 159 Pac. 1187, it is said that the general rule is well settled that a system of contracts between manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers, by which the manufacturer attempts to control the prices for all sales by all retailers, at wholesale or retail, whether purchasers or subpurchasers, eliminating all competition and fixing the amount which the consumers shall pay, amounts to restraint of trade, and is invalid, both at common law, and, so far as it affects interstate commerce, under the Sherman Anti-trust Act,—citing United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78. And this decision is followed in Hunt v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1918) — Okla. —, 176 Pac. 410.

One who parts with the title to merchandise has no further concern with the price at which it may be resold. B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC (reported herewith) ante, 440.

Public policy forbids the affixing of a condition to the sale of an article whereby the purchaser and dealer must sell at a price fixed by the manufacturer. Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1913) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007, writ of certiorari denied in (1914) 232 U. S. 724, 58 L. ed. 815, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602.

In John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24, reversing on this point (1906) 145 Fed. 358, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, it was held that a system of contracts whereby a manufacturer, who required wholesalers handling his products to resell for a certain price and only to such dealers as should contract with the manufacturer to maintain the retail price, the effect of which was to destroy competition between wholesalers and retailers of his goods, was not shown to impose only such restraints as are necessary to protect the manufacturer by averments that the competition theretofore in force had "demoralized," "confused," "troubled," and "damaged" complainant's business. The court, speaking through Judge Lurton, said: "The general averment that, under the 'cut-rate' plan of doing business, demoralization and damage resulted, while, under the 'contract system' enlarged sales and increased emoluments have and will follow, does not answer the question as to why such covenants are necessary to protect complainant against consequences which may fairly require protection. Looking to the averments of the bill as a whole, and to the scheme of business as disclosed by the contracts themselves, we cannot escape the conclusion that the covenants restricting sales and resales have as their prime object the suppression of competition between those who buy to sell again. Any benefit to the retained business to result from them is manifestly but an incident of the main purpose, which is to benefit his vendees and subvendees by breaking down their competition with each other. Restraints which might be upheld if ancillary to some principal contract cannot be enforced if, when unmasked, they appear to be the main purpose of the contract, and not subordinate. The covenants in the contracts signed by the retailers are not even collateral to any sales by the complainant, but to sales made by the wholesalers. Although they run to the complainant, their prime purpose is neither the protection of the retained business of the complainant, nor of the wholesaler, but only to prevent competition between retailers. Covenants protecting the seller of property against the competition of the buyer, by its use against the business retained by the seller, which are upheld if not wider than necessary for the purpose, have been covenants where the main purpose has been to protect the seller himself against competition directed against his retained business. No instance has been called to our attention where the main purpose and principle, if not only result, is to protect buyers against the competition of each other. If such a principle shall find lodgment in the law, it must be upon economic reasons which are in conflict with those which now prevail. The single direct effect of the 'system of contracts' is to limit and restrain the right of each wholesaler and each retailer to transact business in the ordinary way. Each obtains a price enhanced by the 'system' over the 'cut-rate' or 'cut-price' method which had before prevailed, and which it was the object of the new plan to abolish. It may be that sales went on as before, but at a higher price to the consumer than would otherwise have been paid."

In W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Walker (1917) — Ala. App. —, 77 So. 70, the court, although finding it unnecessary to decide the question, expressed the opinion that a provision in a contract by which one party agrees to sell the other on credit and at wholesale prices, for resale to consumers, certain articles manufactured and put up by it, that such goods should be resold only at regular retail prices, to be indicated by the manufacturer, was void as tending to place a burden upon the alienation of property not necessary for the protection of the parties.

But compare W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Osborne (1916) 177 Iowa, 208, L.R.A.1917B, 803, 153 N. W. 566, as set out under catchline, "Cases supporting the view that contracts to control prices may be valid."

In W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803, the court, adopting the reasoning in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24, held that a system of contracts by which a manufacturer of medicine under a secret formula undertakes to control the retail price by fixing the price at which it shall be sold, and the dealers who may secure it, is void as in restraint of trade.

Where commodities have passed into the channels of trade and are owned by dealers, the validity of agreements to fix and control the price paid therefor by the consumer is not determined by the circumstance whether they were produced by several manufacturers or by one, or whether they were previously owned by one or by many. The manufacturer having sold its product at prices satisfactory to itself, the public is entitled to whatever advantage may be derived from competition in the subsequent traffic. Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1916) 58 Okla. 344, L.R.A.1917A, 1276, 159 Pac. 1187.

In Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (Okla.) supra, it is said: "Recurring to the facts of the case at hand, it will be seen that plaintiff's plan or scheme of sale of its manufactured products eliminated all form of competition therein. Its goods were sold only to those who entered into a contract to sell to the consumer at the prices fixed by plaintiff. While but a single contract is involved here, it was admitted that the plaintiff transacted business only in pursuance of like contracts. It was shown that the medical company had a capital and surplus of over $1,000,000 invested in its business, and that an 'army of Rawleigh men' was engaged in selling its products throughout the United States. There was no competition in its products between its so-called agents and others, for its sales were confined to those who entered into its restrictive contracts. There was, or could be, no competition between its so-called salesmen, and in no other means than through a purchase from such salesmen could the consumer buy its products. The contracts left no room for the usual competition between the dealers in the products sold by plaintiff; and this was the obvious purpose of the plan. It was not shown, nor can we conceive it to be the case, that the restraints fixed by the manufacturer upon the price to be paid by the consumer were necessary to its retained business, and therefore ancillary to the principal purpose of the agreement; but, on the other hand, the plain effect of its system of contracts was to destroy all competition in the sale of its manufactured products. Well may we, in this connection, use the language of the court in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 185, 82 C. C. A. 158, 158 Fed. 24. Now, in what way is only a fair protection afforded the interests of complainant by stifling all competition between the jobbers of the United States who deal in complainant's preparations? In what way are the covenants which forbid them to resell to anyone who will buy "necessary," to use Judge Taft's phrase, "to protect the covenantee in the enjoyment of the legitimate fruits of the contract, or to protect him from the dangers of an unjust use of those fruits by the other party?" In what way are covenants which compel retailers to maintain prices, to quote Chief Justice Tindal, "such only, as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public?" Horner v. Graves (1831) 7 Bing. 785, 131 Eng. Reprint, 284, 5 Moore & P. 768, 9 L. J. C. P. 192. To sustain the validity of the restrictive agreements of plaintiff would be to give effect to a system of doing business by which all the sales of all its products would be, under all circumstances, controlled by it. Applied to modern conditions, the public interest is of first importance in determining the validity of contracts in restraint of trade. If the restraint is sustained, it can only be in cases where it is found to be reasonable both with respect to the public and to the parties, and that it is limited to what is fairly necessary in the circumstances of the particular case, for the protection of the covenantee. The fact that here there was no agreement between different manufacturers, wholesalers, jobbers, or others, to fix and maintain a selling price, is, in the language of Justice Hughes in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, unimportant. In that case it was said: "The bill asserts the importance of a standard retail price, and alleges generally that confusion and damage have resulted from sales at less than the prices fixed. But the advantage of established retail prices primarily concerns the dealers. The enlarged profits which would result from adherence to the established rates would go to them, and not to the complainant. It is through the inability of the favored dealers to realize these profits, on account of the described competition, that the complainant works out its alleged injury. If there be an advantage to a manufacturer in the maintenance of fixed retail prices, the question remains whether it is one which he is entitled to secure by agreements restricting the freedom of trade on the part of the dealers who own what they sell. As to this, the complainant can fare no better with its plan of identical contracts than could the dealers themselves if they formed a combination and endeavored to establish the same restrictions, and thus to achieve the same result, by agreement with each other. If the immediate advantage they would thus obtain would not be sufficient to sustain such a direct agreement, the asserted ulterior benefit to the complainant cannot be regarded as sufficient to support its system."

Cases supporting the view that contracts to control prices may be valid.

Where the view is taken that contracts to control prices may be valid, the question where the line is to be drawn between a lawful and unlawful restriction of competition must depend largely upon the facts and circumstances of each case; and this fact makes it difficult to state by definition, except in the broadest way, any rule for determining the validity of a contract looking toward the maintenance of a fixed retail price. Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 76 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144.

In Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (Wash.) supra, the court, after alluding to the difficulty of laying down the rule by which the validity of such a contract is to be determined, said: "Perhaps the following is as near a complete definition as we can formulate from the adjudicated cases: Contracts fixing prices as incidental to some main contract, and involving less than a controlling part of a given commodity in a given market, not proceeding from, nor tending to create, or to maintain, a monopoly, will be sustained when the restriction is, under the circumstances of the particular case, reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties, and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public; that is to say, when the price fixed is fairly necessary to the protection of the covenantee, and fair to the public in that it furnishes only a reasonable profit to the contracting parties. Lacking these elements, such contracts are invalid as contrary to public policy."

Under an economic system founded upon competition, every general restriction—that is, every restriction covering all or a controlling fraction of a given commodity—is essentially unreasonable, being neither fairly necessary to the protection of the manufacturer, who already has a monopoly, nor beneficial to the public, because it does not tend to create an incentive to increase the excellence of the product in order to maintain the better price. Ibid.

The fact that the contract does not involve the whole of the product to which it relates, as in cases where the manufacturer is not the sole producer of that product, is material in the determination of the question whether such restraint of trade as results from the contract is such as to render the contract void as imposing an unreasonable restraint. D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041.

If a controlling number of manufacturers or wholesale dealers in a given commodity should make identical contracts with the retailers in a given locality, as the result of an agreement between them all, such contracts would be invalid as in aid of a combination in restraint of competition.

Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (Wash.) supra.

But the possibility that all, or nearly all, of the dealers in a given commodity in a given area, have made contracts of the same character with all retailers for the maintenance of a fixed retail price for their products is too remote to furnish a reason for declaring a contract with a single manufacturer, who has no monopoly or approximation thereto, void. Ibid.

The validity of a condition that the dealer shall adhere to the retail selling price fixed by the manufacturer is sustained in Ford Motor Co. v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 335, in which it is said: "It being a well-recognized principle of law that the vendor may retain title to the thing sold until the full stipulated consideration therefor shall have been paid (Bailey v. Baker Ice Mach. Co. (1915) 239 U. S. 268, 60 L. ed. 275, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50), it would seem that, if we are to hold the stipulation to that effect in this contract invalid, it must be because, under the circumstances of the case, such a transaction would be violative of some rule or principle of public policy. But, when the conditions are analyzed, what public interest would be subserved by striking down the contract and thwarting the intent of the parties thereto? As already suggested, it would be entirely possible for the plaintiff to accomplish all the objects which it seeks under the present plan, by marketing its product through its own agencies, so constituted that there could be no doubt that its salesmen were its agents merely, and not vendees. But, were it otherwise, what benefit would result to the public by opening the door for the bushwhacking competition which, and which only, is likely to follow? It is to be borne in mind that the plaintiff has no monopoly of the automobile business, but only of one out of almost innumerable kinds of cars, all differing in detail one from the other, but of the same general type and all designed to be used in the same general manner, and for the same general purpose. If, as was admitted to be the fact in Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 502, 61 L. ed. 871, L.R.A.1917E, 1187, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 959, the plaintiff's car were wholly indispensable to the carrying on of a great industry, and if its plan of marketing were such as to constitute an instrument of oppression or favoritism, then the courts should perhaps be astute to discover means by which to disorganize its system and to encourage competitive effort as between the salesmen or distributors of its product; but such is not the case. Whatever its merits, the Ford car is not, except in the most remotely relative sense, essential to the well-being of the public or any group thereof, or any individual. There are other automobiles in great variety available to anyone who has need and desires to purchase, some cheaper, some more expensive, some less efficient, some more efficient, some less attractive in appearance, others more attractive. Cole Motor Car Co. v. Hurst (1915; C. C. A. 5th C.) 142 C. C. A. 572, 228 Fed. 280. Obviously, therefore, the public already has competition to the fullest extent desirable; not a competition entailing the waste of duplication and overlapping effort in marketing the product, with sporadic price cutting of an irrational sort, but the competition of many products, each independently seeking public favor, against one of like character, but slightly different. Is not each manufacturer now under the highest sort of pressure from without? Must it not be alert to discover new improvements and conveniences and to keep down to the minimum the cost of construction and distribution? It is a matter of public knowledge that fortunes are spent in advertising these competitive products, in an effort to attract and cultivate public favor. Under such conditions will the public be benefited by requiring the manufacturer to assume the further burden of internal guerrilla competition, with the confusion and waste entailed thereby? It is futile to say that such a burden will fall not upon the manufacturer or the public, but upon the local dealer or distributor. If there were ten dealers selling Ford cars in Portland, where there is now but one, would not the expense of marketing be greatly increased, and if, as is contended, the contract under consideration is harsh to the 'dealer,' does it not follow that, with the trade divided into ten parts, and with the expense of rentals and personal service multiplied, the price of the car to the public would increase? Does anyone suppose that such dealers would for any considerable length of time cut the price? In the light of experience, is it not so probable as virtually to amount to a certainty that the prices would soon reach a common level, and that level would be higher than the present one? Upon the other hand, will the public not have the benefit of the freest and most effective competition if each patentee manufacturer of automobiles is permitted to market his product in his own way? May it not be assumed that, impelled by considerations of self-interest, he will select the most economical method, and that the keen and vigorous competition of innumerable other manufacturers will force him to give to the public the major benefit arising from his economies? At least, we do not think that we would be warranted in holding that the contract here is inherently vicious. If, in fact, it is prejudicial to the public interest because to an unreasonable degree it operates in restraint of trade and interferes with the free play of wholesome competition, the defendants may plead and show the facts. When we come to consider the decided cases, we find that no decision cited by either party from the Supreme Court of the United States involves the precise question, and that court, it is to be noted, appreciating from an early day the growing complexity of our industrial life and the importance of curtailing the liberty of contract only in so far as positive law or considerations of public policy might from time to time clearly require, has been careful to limit its decisions strictly to the matters directly in issue. Adams v. Burke (1873) 17 Wall. (U. S.) 453, 21 L. ed. 700; Bauer v. O'Donnell (1913) 229 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1041, 50 L.R.A.

(N.S.) 1185, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 150. And in reading the cases these considerations should be kept in mind: There is no attempt here to bind the purchasing public by a mere notice attached to the machine, nor is there any claim that a patent is of such force that a violation of the warning or the provisions of a notice of that character constitutes an infringement. If involved at all, the rights of the public are only remotely affected. The issue is between the patentee manufacturer and the consignee, who have expressly contracted with each other. In the second place, as we have seen, the plaintiff is not in the exclusive control of a useful or desirable article of commerce, whether patented or copyrighted, for which there is no substantial substitute; that is, it is without the power to oppress the public by fixing grossly excessive prices or imposing onerous and unreasonable conditions upon the use of its product. It controls but one of many similar devices which may be purchased upon the open market. In the third place, the plaintiff makes no attempt to restrain trade in unpatented or copyrighted articles of commerce by requiring the use thereof upon or in connection with its cars."

In Grogan v. Chaffee (1909) 156 Cal. 611, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 105 Pac. 745, it was held that a contract by one producing olive oil, with persons selling it at retail, that they will maintain the price fixed by him, was not void as in restraint of trade. The court said that the producer was in the first instance under no obligation to sell his oil, and when he did sell it he had the right to exact as part of the consideration for the sale a promise by the purchaser that he would not sell it at less than a stipulated price. "There is nothing either unreasonable or unlawful in the effort by a manufacturer to maintain a standard price for his goods. It is simply a means of securing the legitimate benefits of the reputation which his product may have attained."

In D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Munsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041, it was held that an agreement by a retailer to maintain the fixed retail selling price of plaintiff's product was valid as being no more than necessary to afford a fair protection to the business of the complainant, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public, where the output of the manufacturer did not constitute the whole supply of the product in question.

In Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co. (1915) 28 Cal. App. 660, 153 Pac. 737, an action for damages under the California Anti-trust Act, it is said that a manufacturer or wholesaler not only has the right to fix his own price, but also the right to establish the price at which his goods are to be sold by retail dealers to whom such goods are sold for retail sale, so long as those acts are not the direct effect or result of a combination formed and maintained by himself and others to create restrictions in trade or commerce, or to maintain a monopoly of the trade.

In Garst v. Harris (1900) 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 174, which was an action to recover a sum of money stipulated as liquidated damages for breach of a covenant not to sell a proprietary medicine purchased by the defendant of the plaintiff below a stipulated price, it was held that the contract was not in unlawful restraint of trade, the court saying: "When, as here, there is a secret composition, which the defendant presumably would have no chance to sell at a profit at all, but for the plaintiff's permission, a limit to the license in the form of a restriction of the price at which he may sell is proper enough." The sentence above quoted has caused this decision to be regarded by some courts as turning upon the circumstance that the article in question was made under a secret formula; while other courts regard this as being simply an accidental feature of the case, which they accordingly cite as authority for the proposition that a restriction of the seller's right to fix the retail price of an article is not of itself an undue restraint of trade.

The restraint imposed by a contract between a manufacturer of watches sold under a tradename and advertised at a fixed retail price, and a retailer, that the watches shall not be resold at less than the fixed retail price without first removing the name, trademark, and guaranty, is valid as being reasonable both with respect to the public and to the parties, and limited to what is fairly necessary in the circumstances of the case for the protection of the covenant, where it appears that the only way in which the watches can be sold for the low price fixed by the manufacturer is to manufacture them in immense quantities, and the only way to produce customers upon a big scale is by extensive advertising, and that the direct effect of a cutting of the fixed retail price by a dealer is that other dealers in the neighborhood cannot sell the watches at such price, and consequently will discontinue their sale. Robert H. Ingersoll & Bro. v. Hahne & Co. (1918) 89 N. J. Eq. 332, 108 Atl. 128. In this case, the court said: "In those cases in which the right to fix a resale price has been under consideration, the prohibition against the resale has been against the resale of the article itself. The name or trademark or what not has been so much an integral part of the article as that a resale of the article without reference to the trademark or tradename would be practically impossible. In the case at bar the prohibition is not against the resale of the article, nor is it impracticable to resell the article without reference to the tradename. Indeed, complainant offers to manufacture watches similar to those marked with its tradename without the tradename. Complainant does not seek to retain any right in the article itself; it merely seeks to restrain the use of its tradename and good will, except under conditions fixed by it. It may permit the purchaser of the article to use its tradename and good will under such conditions as it sees fit. It has an interest in addition to that of mere protection to its tradename and good will, for it guarantees the article sold, and scrupulously performs its guaranty, maintaining a large and expensive repair department for this purpose.

It seems to me that there is a clear distinction between those cases in which the nature of the restraint is such as necessarily to affect the resale of the article itself and the case at bar, where the nature of the restraint is not such."

The owner and manufacturer of a proprietary medicine may lawfully enter into agreements with dealers that they will not sell it for less than a specified retail price. Garst v. Charles (1905) 187 Mass. 144, 72 N. E. 839.

Contracts by which a manufacturer agrees with jobbers and dealers to supply them with his products at a reduced price in consideration of their agreeing not to sell the goods at a less price than that named, and not to sell the goods of other manufacturers at a less price, are not illegal as in restraint of trade, or as tending to create a monopoly. Walsh v. Dwight (1899) 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91.

In John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. (1896) 50 N. Y. Supp. 1064, it is said that it is lawful for manufacturers individually to agree with their customers that those customers shall sell the particular goods manufactured by the vendor for a certain price, so far as not to render the manufacturer liable to third parties thereby affected for doing an unlawful act.

In Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 76 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144, a contract by the manufacturer of a particular brand of flour sold in a certain market, with retailers, as ancillary to his wholesaling the product to them, that they would maintain a minimum price, was held to be valid if it was necessary to the continued production of his product, involved less than a controlling part of that commodity in the market, and the price fixed was fairly necessary to his protection, and afforded only a fair profit to the contracting parties. The complaint in this case alleged that the cost of manufacturing plaintiff's flour was greater than that of ordinary flour, that the plaintiff had incurred great expense in advertising it to the public, that it was necessary to operate the mill to its full capacity in order to continue the business at a profit, and that, as it was necessary to sell the flour to all retail dealers in his community, rather than through one or two, the good will of the retail dealers was necessary to the success of the company, and that, in order to keep this good will, it was necessary to maintain a minimum retail price, offering a reasonable profit to the retailer, and that by reason of defendant's price cutting for the purpose of attracting customers to his store, the sales of plaintiff's flour had been decreased by rendering it unpopular with the retailers.

In Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Selfridge & Co. [1915] A. C. (Eng.) 847, 8 B. R. C. 221, [1915] W. N. 184, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1680, 118 L. T. N. S. 386, 31 Times L. R. 399, 59 Sol. Jo. 439, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 714, a price maintenance contract was said by Lord Dunedin to be "not in itself unfair," and one which the manufacturer "has a legitimate interest to enforce."

A contract between the manufacturer of goods and wholesale dealers, whereby such dealers bind themselves not to resell the goods for less than certain specified prices, and, if they sell to the trade, to procure a similar signed agreement from every retailer who pays the price, is not unlawful as being in undue restraint of trade, since the manufacturers are not bound to sell or to manufacture their products, and in selling have the right to impose such conditions as they see fit. Elliman Sons & Co. v. Carrington & Son [1901] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 275, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 577, 49 Week. Rep. 582, 84 L. T. N. S. 858.

Contracts between a manufacturer of phonographs and records, and wholesalers handling such goods, that they shall not be sold to dealers on the manufacturer's suspended list, will not be considered void as being an unreasonable restraint of trade where it appears that the sale of a phonograph carries with it a considerable business in records. Per Lord Alverstone, in National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. [1908] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 385, 6 B. R. C. 42, 77 L. J.

Ch. N. S. 218, 98 L. T. N. S. 291, 24 Times L. R. 201.

A case which is frequently cited as upholding the validity of contracts of the kind under consideration is John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. (1903) 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L.R.A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136. This was an action brought to recover damages for alleged injuries to plaintiff's business through a conspiracy on the part of the defendants, and involved the validity of the plan devised by an association of wholesale druggists, and adopted at their instance by manufacturers of proprietary medicines, looking to the maintenance of prices, and intended to do away with the advantage enjoyed by the larger dealers,—such plan being that the manufacturers should sell at fixed prices, with a rebate only to concerns who could be relied upon to maintain the selling price, and should accept orders only from such concerns. The majority opinions, however, appear to proceed upon the supposition that the plaintiff was not prevented from purchasing goods at the so-called "long" price. It was held that such plan was not in restraint of trade, Haight, J., writing the principal opinion, saying: "It is true that it does away with the competition among dealers as to prices, but it creates no restriction upon them as to the quantities that they may be able to sell, or the territory within which they may confine their transactions; but upon the question of prices we must bear in mind that the goods are covered by patent rights and trademarks, which give the proprietors the exclusive right of specifying prices at which the articles shall be sold, and, following this, the right also to require dealers to maintain the prices specified. The plan does not operate to restrict sales in any localities, but contemplates a ready method of distributing the goods throughout the entire country. It is, in effect, the creating of an agency on the part of the proprietors, by which every druggist throughout the United States may receive the goods and dispose of them as agents of the principal, receiving the commissions agreed upon therefor." This decision has accordingly been explained (as in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24) as based upon the assumption that the proprietary medicines forming the subject of the contracts there involved were made under patents, and so fall within a special class of cases which will be hereinafter discussed.

The suggestion has been made that where the seller has undertaken to sell an unlimited quantity of goods and to extend credit therefor, and the amount of the respective instalments to be paid is to be measured by an aliquot part of the sales made during the previous period, a provision for the maintenance of a fixed retail price, with a limitation of the territory within which the goods are to be resold, and a stipulation that the buyer shall devote his time and attention exclusively to the sale of such goods, may be considered as tending to operate as security for the payment of the purchase price, and, as affording merely a reasonable protection to the seller, not to be illegal and void as being an unreasonable restraint of trade. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Osborne (1916) 177 Iowa, 208, L.R.A.1917B, 803, 158 N. W. 566. But compare W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Walker (1917) — Ala. App. —, 77 So. 70, as set out under catch line, "Cases supporting the view that contracts to control prices are invalid as being in undue restraint of trade."

A contract between a company engaged in the manufacture and distribution of artificial gas, whereby it agreed to purchase a natural gas franchise and a supply of natural gas from another company, which, although giving the natural gas company the right to fix the price of natural gas to consumers, is subject to the qualification that the natural gas company shall meet any reduction in price offered by others, is not one in restraint of trade, since by its terms the distributor's pipes are open to every producer who should apply for admission at a lower rate, the necessary result of which was to bring down the price of gas to the consumer to the lowest possible price at which it could be supplied on a remunerative basis to the distributor. Ft. Smith Light & Traction Co. v. Kelley (1910) 94 Ark. 461, 127 S. W. 975.

Under Federal Anti-trust Act.

As to the circumstances under which a refusal to sell to price cutters is a violation of the Federal Anti-trust Act, see II. e, infra.

As to whether an agency agreement fixing the price at which goods shall be resold effects an unlawful combination under the Federal Anti-trust Act, see II. d, infra.

As to whether the operation of the Federal Anti-trust Act is affected by the circumstance that the goods to which the contracts relate are protected by patent, copyright, or trademark, see II. c, 2, 3 and 4, infra.

The view taken by the courts of the essential validity of contracts giving the manufacturer control of the retail price is largely determinative of their attitude upon the question whether such contracts are in violation of the Federal Anti-trust Act. As holding that a system of contracts between an individual manufacturer and wholesale or retail dealers constitutes an unlawful combination under the Sherman Act, see Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1918) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447; Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. National Window Glass Jobbers Asso. (1907) 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 972, 81 C. C. A. 658, 152 Fed. 864; United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78; Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 166 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156; Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917A, 1276, 159 Pac. 1187; Hunt v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1918) — Okla. —, 176 Pac. 410.

But in D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 855, 128 Pac. 1041, the opinion was expressed that agreements for the maintenance of a fixed retail price of a certain commodity which do not involve the whole market supply of such commodity, entered into for the benefit of the manufacturer, are not unenforceable as being in restraint of trade under the Sherman Act; although, as the case did not involve any question of interstate commerce, the effect of the act was not properly involved.

And in Robert H. Ingersoll & Bro. v. Hahne & Co. (1918) 89 N. J. Eq. 332, 108 Atl. 128, it is held that the restraint upon the resale of an article, imposed by a notice subject to which it is sold, that it shall not be sold, offered, advertised, or displayed for sale at any other retail price than that named without first removing such notice and the manufacturer's name, trademark, and guaranty, the manufacturer agreeing either to repurchase the article, if then merchantable, at its cost, or, if damaged, at such rate as shall be agreed upon, or to leave the dealer free after removing the manufacturer's name, trademark, and guaranty to dispose of the article as he shall see fit, is not invalid under the Sherman or Clayton Acts. The court said: "To say that Congress intended to prohibit an act which had the effect of stimulating interstate commerce and stimulating competition rather than putting a restraint upon either is, I think, to state an absurdity. The proofs before me demonstrate that, if defendant and others are permitted to pursue their practice of price cutting, the business of complainant will be ruined and thereby the volume of interstate trade be reduced, or a method of distribution will have to be adopted which will greatly increase the price to the consumer, which will necessarily result in reducing the volume of interstate traffic; that in either event competition will be effectively reduced. And to what useful purpose? So that retailers may make use of the tradename and good will established after extensive advertising, to the extent that the public have associated with the article a standard of value, to fool the public into a belief that because a standard priced article can be sold at a cut price, all other goods sold are similarly low priced; in other words, to defraud the public. It is no answer to say that full value is given by the retailer for each article sold. If such be the fact, a person is defrauded if he buys an article at full price for which he has no immediate need, because he is induced to believe it is a bargain, and thereby deprive himself of the use of the purchase price for other purposes for which he might have used it if he did not think he was getting a bargain."

There can be no doubt, however, that such contracts are necessarily violative of the Federal Anti-trust Act where they are the instrument by which a combination of manufacturers attempts to obtain a monopoly in interstate commerce. See Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Louis Voight & Sons Co. (1909) 212 U. S. 227, 53 L. ed. 486, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280, in which a contract between a jobber and a corporation which was the selling agent of a combination of wall paper manufacturers, which in effect bound him to buy from such corporation all the wall paper needed in his business at certain fixed prices, and to sell only according to a schedule of prices and terms of credit stipulated therein, which was but one of a system of identical agreements whereby the combination sought to monopolize the wall paper business, was held illegal under the Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890.

In Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. National Window Glass Jobbers Asso. (1907) 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 972, 81 C. C. A. 658, 152 Fed. 864, the court, in holding a system of contracts between a manufacturer and wholesale dealers throughout the United States, by which the former was to give the latter terms more favorable than he gave other dealers, and they were to sell his product exclusively, and have the quantity of the product taken by them determined by him, and which fixed the price to be charged retailers, to be illegal under the Sherman Anti-trust Act, said: "It is argued with much force and ingenuity by the defendant in error that the combination set out in the declaration was only an agreement by which a certain number of wholesalers were to trade exclusively with a certain manufacturer; with the reciprocal understanding that the manufacturer was to sell to no one else, except at a price higher than that paid by the parties to the contract; that this was, in effect, nothing more than an agreement to sell to one person, or to several, at a price advantageously lower than the general price, on condition that such person or persons would buy exclusively from the manufacturer so agreeing. In other words, the American Window Glass Company had the right to select its customers and charge one price to one and another price to another; it had the right to offer certain inducements to certain customers in exchange for their exclusive trade; and it had the right to do all or any of these things. But it is always to be borne in mind, in considering arguments of this kind, that the act of Congress has made, and was intended to make, illegal, many sorts of contracts and agreements that, prior thereto, were not only legal, but were regarded as meritorious and beneficial; and has materially restricted the area within which freedom of contract may be exercised. There is something more, however, set forth in the declaration affecting the character and operation of this contract. Prices to retail dealers were to be arbitrarily fixed by those wholesale dealers, to which prices they were all required to conform. The quantity of glass to be purchased by each of said wholesale dealers was to be arbitrarily determined by the American Window Glass Company, and they were to be prohibited from purchasing from any manufacturer who should not close his factories and restrict the output of glass when and as required so to do by the American Window Glass Company. These stipulations clearly tended toward the creation of a monopoly, and, if adhered to and carried out, manifestly restricted the scope of competition in the commodity referred to. It may be quite true that such an agreement would have been valid at common law, or, if invalid as to the parties, would not have been illegal;

but the act of Congress has affected it with illegality so far as the trade or commerce restrained by it is interstate in its character."

In United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78 (a suit in equity charging a violation of the Sherman Act), it was held that a manufacturer selling to jobbers, who were not merely the agents, but the vendees, of the manufacturer, sales not being conditional, but absolute, violated the Federal Anti-trust Act in exacting from the jobber an agreement to charge the retailer a specified price, under a penalty of discontinuance of future dealings, and in seeking, by a notice printed on the carton, to fix the price at which the goods should be resold at retail, notwithstanding such notice did not constitute a legally effective and enforceable contract between the manufacturer and the retailer; the court saying: "The system of contracts between manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers, by which the manufacturers attempt to control the prices for all sales by all dealers, at wholesale or retail, whether purchasers or subpurchasers, eliminating all competition and fixing the amount which the consumer shall pay, amounts to restraint of trade, and is invalid both at common law and, so far as it affects interstate commerce, under the Sherman Anti-trust Act."

A contract of absolute sale, made by a manufacturer, of its various manufactured preparations, in which the purchaser agrees to sell the goods purchased "at regular retail prices to be indicated by" the manufacturer, whose entire product is sold throughout the country only by the means of like restrictive contracts, operates as a "restraint of trade" unlawful as to interstate commerce, under the Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890. Stewart v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917A, 1276, 159 Pac. 1187.

Under state anti-trust laws.

As to the applicability of a state anti-trust law where the goods to which the contracts relate are patented, see II. c. 2, infra.

As in the case of the Federal Antitrust Law, the courts which hold that a system of contracts by which an individual manufacturer seeks to control the retail price serves a legitimate purpose likewise uphold the validity of such contracts under the local anti-trust laws.

As holding such contracts not to be violative of the state anti-trust laws, see D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041; Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co. (1915) 28 Cal. App. 660, 153 Pac. 737; Com. v. Grinstead (1901) 111 Ky. 203, 56 L.R.A. 709, 63 S. W. 427; Walsh v. Dwight (1899) 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91.

As holding such a system of contracts to be invalid, see J. R. Watkins Medical Co. v. Johnson (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 394; W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Gunn (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 186 S. W. 385; W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 549; Armstrong v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 178 S. W. 582; W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Mayberry (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 199; Pictorial Review Co. v. Pate Bros. (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 309; Butterick Pub. Co. v. Mistrot-Munn Co. (1915) 167 App. Div. 632, 153 N. Y. Supp. 61, affirmed on opinion below in (1916) 217 N. Y. 678, 112 N. E. 1055 (construing Texas Anti-trust Act); Wampole v. F. E. Karn Co. (1906) 11 Ont. L. Rep. 619.

But such contracts are necessarily to be regarded as violative of the Anti-trust Law where they are the instrumentality of an unlawful combination. See International Harvester Co. v. Com. (1907) 124 Ky. 543, 99 S. W. 637, set forth infra.

In Ft. Smith Light & Traction Co. v. Kelley (1910) 94 Ark. 461, 127 S. W. 975, it was held that a contract between a company engaged in the manufacture and distribution of artificial gas, whereby it agreed to purchase a natural gas franchise and a supply of natural gas from another company, was not void under the Arkansas Anti-trust Law of 1905, subjecting to a penalty any corporation, partnership, or individual who shall become a party to any agreement or combination to regulate or fix the price of any commodity or thing whatsoever,—by reason of a provision therein giving the natural gas company the right to fix the price of natural gas to the consumers for all purposes except for illumination, where, under the contract, the right to fix the price was subject to the qualification that the natural gas company should meet any reduction in price offered by others.

An agreement for the maintenance of the retail price fixed by a manufacturer of ground chocolate whose output does not constitute the whole supply of such product, the object of which is to enable the manufacturer to conduct his operations at a reasonable profit, is not invalid under the Cartwright Act (Stat. 1907, p. 984), as amended in 1909 (Stat. 1909, p. 593),—especially in view of the proviso in the amendatory Act of 1909 that “no agreement, combination or association shall be deemed to be unlawful or within the provisions of that act the object and business of which are to conduct its operations at a reasonable profit.” D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041.

The refusal of a manufacturer to sell at the usual trade discount to a dealer who fails to maintain the fixed retail price will not subject it to an action for damages under the provisions of the Cartwright Anti-trust Law (Cal. Stat. 1907, pp. 984, 987), Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co. (1915) 28 Cal. App. 660, 153 Pac. 737, where it does not appear that the prices at which the manufacturer and others connected with him sell the articles to retail dealers, or the price at which the retail dealers are required to sell to the public, are in excess of what ought to afford only a fair and reasonable profit.

An agreement with the manufacturer not to resell the goods furnished by him at less than a specified price is not within Ky. Stat. § 3915, for the suppression of conspiracies and trusts. Com. v. Grinstead (1901) 111 Ky. 203, 56 L.R.A. 709, 63 S. W. 427.

v. Com. (Ky.) supra, it was held that a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of harvesting machinery, which had become the owner of the businesses of several formerly competing concerns, in making contracts with its sales agents whereby such agents were bound to sell all machines or property received under the contract at such prices and on such terms as might be fixed by the company, and to confine their sales to a certain territory, and stipulating that if they should sell outside such territory, their commissions should be paid to the agent within that territory, was properly found guilty of violating § 3915 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that if any corporation, partnership, company, firm, or individual, or any association of persons, shall create, establish, organize, or enter into, or become a member of or party to or in any way interested in any pool, trust, combine, agreement, consideration, or understanding, of any other corporation, partnership, individual, or a person or association of persons, for the purpose of regulating or controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured articles, or property of any kind, it shall be deemed guilty of the crime of conspiracy.

An agreement on the part of the purchaser of goods, in consideration of a reduced price, not to resell such goods, or the goods of any other manufacturer, at less than the stipulated price, is not within § 1 of chap. 716 of the Laws of 1893, which provides that every contract or combination whereby competition in the supply or price of any article or commodity in common use may be restrained or prevented, for the purpose of advancing prices, is illegal; since there is nothing in the contract in question that restrains or prevents competition in the supply or the price of any article or commodity. Walsh v. Dwight (1899) 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91.

In J. R. Watkins Medical Co. v. Johnson (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 394, it was held that a contract by which a manufacturer agreed to furnish to other party thereto its medicines at the usual wholesale prices, to be sold by him at the regular retail prices in certain territory, he agreeing that he would sell no other goods or articles during the term of the contract except those purchased by him from the manufacturer, and that he would sell them only to customers at their residences in the prescribed district, was to be treated as a contract for the sale of goods, and as such violative of the Texas Anti-trust Law, it clearly showing by its terms an intention to combine the capital, skill, and acts of the parties to fix and maintain a standard of prices upon a certain commodity, and to prevent competition in a given territory.

A stipulation in a contract by which the purchaser is bound not to resell except at prices fixed by the manufacturer is unlawful under the Texas Anti-trust Act of March 31, 1903. Butterick Pub. Co. v. Mistrot-Munn Co. (1915) 167 App. Div. 632, 153 N. Y. Supp. 61, affirmed on opinion below in (1916) 217 N. Y. 678, 112 N. E. 1055.

In W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Gunn (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 186 S. W. 385; W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 549; Armstrong v. W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 178 S. W. 582; and W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Mayberry (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 199, it was held that provisions in a contract of sale whereby the purchaser bound himself to buy from no one but the seller, and to resell the goods purchased by him at certain fixed prices, and further agreed to have no other business or employment, rendered the contract void as in violation of the Texas Anti-trust Law.

A contract for the purchase of patterns and books by which the purchaser agreed not to sell them for less than catalogue prices, and not to deal in any other publication, is illegal under the Texas Anti-trust Act, which defines a trust as a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms or corporations, to create, or which may tend to create, restrictions in trade or commerce, to fix, maintain, increase, or reduce the price of merchandise, to fix or maintain a standard price, or to make, enter into, maintain, execute, or carry out any contracts binding persons to sell or to refrain from selling any goods. Pictorial Review Co. v. Pate Bros. (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 309; Segal v. McCall Co. (1916) 108 Tex. 55, 184 S. W. 188.

In Wampole v. F. E. Karn Co. (1906) 11 Ont. L. Rep. 619, it was held that an agreement between the manufacturers of certain proprietary medicines and preparations manufactured by them under their private formula, by which the defendant, in consideration of the plaintiffs supplying their preparations at a schedule of prices set out in the agreement, undertook not to sell at wholesale any of such preparations at a price below those mentioned in the agreement, and not to sell such preparations to any retailer except at the schedule of prices mentioned in the agreement, and then only when such retailer should have signed an agreement with the plaintiff to the same effect, was contrary to the provisions of the Canada Criminal Code which declares everyone guilty of an indictable offense who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, or sale of any article. The court said: "This agreement is used not simply in relation to these commodities between the plaintiffs and their various customers, but is the form adopted by the committees representing a large part of the wholesale and retail trade of Canada. It means that nearly every commodity in common use is to be subject to a hard-and-fixed contract which fixes the manufacturer's price, the wholesale price, and the retail price, below which none can sell, and no one can purchase who is not a member of the association and agrees to sign the contract in question. It means that competition is not only unduly prevented or lessened in the purchase, barter, and sale of this article, but is absolutely destroyed. In the present case the evidence also shewed, I think, that the price was unreasonably enhanced by reason of this agreement."

B. Patented articles.

The fact that an article is patented was formerly supposed to have the effect:

(a) To enable the patentee to impose by notice accompanying the goods a restriction as to the resale price which would accompany them into the hands of subsequent purchasers, so as to render them liable as contributory infringers if they knowingly violated such restriction (see Edison Phonograph Co. v. Kaufmann (1901) 105 Fed. 960; Edison Phonograph Co. v. Pike (1902) 116 Fed. 863; The Fair v. Dover Mfg. Co. (1908) 92 C. C. A. 43, 166 Fed. 117; Winchester Repeating Arms Co. v. Olmsted (1913) 121 C. C. A. 615, 203 Fed. 493);

(b) To settle any question as to the validity of contracts with purchasers thereof, fixing the price at which such purchasers might resell (see Edison Phonograph Co. v. Pike (1902) 116 Fed. 863; Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. The Fair (1903) 61 C. C. A. 58, 123 Fed. 424; National Phonograph Co. v. Schlegel (1904) 64 C. C. A. 594, 128 Fed. 733; Hartman v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1906) 145 Fed. 358, s. c. on appeal (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Fonotipia Limited v. Bradley (1909) 171 Fed. 951; Edison v. Smith (1911) 138 Fed. 925; United States v. Keystone Watch Case Co. (1915) 218 Fed. 502; American Graphophone Co. v. Boston Store (1915) 225 Fed. 785, reversed in (1918) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257; Straus v. American Publishers Asso. (1908) 193 N. Y. 496, 86 N. E. 525, affirming (1908) 127 App. Div. 935, 111 N. Y. Supp. 830; Butterick Pub. Co. v. Rose (1910) 141 Wis. 533, 124 N. W. 647);

(c) To take such contracts out of the operation of the Federal or local anti-trust acts (see Edison Phonograph Co. v. Pike; Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. The Fair; and National Phonograph Co. v. Schlegel (Fed.)—supra; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82

C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Milwaukee Rubber Works Co. (1907) 83 C. C. A. 336, 154 Fed. 358; Indiana Mfg. Co. v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. (1907) 83 C. C. A. 343, 154 Fed. 365; United States v. Keystone Watch Case Co. (1915) 218 Fed. 502; Butterick Pub. Co. v. Rose (Wis.) supra).

But the law, as settled by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, now is that a patentee cannot, by virtue of his statutory monopoly, impose conditions as to the resale price so as to render one who fails to observe them a contributory infringer of the patent (Bauer v. O'Donnell (1913) 229 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1041, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1185, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 150; Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 490, 61 L. ed. 866, L.R.A.1917E, 1196, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 955; Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1913) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007; Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. v. Buck (1913) 208 Fed. 383; Ford Motor Co. v. International Automobile League (1913) 209 Fed. 235; United States v. Keystone Watch Case Co. (1915) 218 Fed. 502; Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Straus (1915) 222 Fed. 524, affirmed in (1917) 140 C. C. A. 519, 225 Fed. 535); and that after the right of sale has been once exercised and the patentee has received his price, the article passes beyond the limits of the monopoly; and, in considering the validity of a contractual restraint as to the price at which the article is to be resold, either at common law or under an anti-trust act, the case is to be considered as if there were no patent (Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. (1918) 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447; Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1913) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007; United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78; Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156, affirming (1915) 225 Fed. 373; Ford Motor Co.

v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 385).

In Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1918) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007, it is said: "If several owners of patents or licensees under patents, capable of conjoint use, and having the right to manufacture and sell or not to manufacture and sell at all, as they please, agree that they will not manufacture and sell, they have but agreed to not do that which they have a right not to do. But, when agreeing to both manufacture and sell, they go beyond, and not only fix the sale price at which they will sell, thus doing away with competition between themselves, but fix the price at which all future sales must be made by jobbers and dealers generally, thus doing away with all competition between jobbers and retail dealers as to articles which they have put on the market, they have clearly agreed and combined to restrain trade, and every jobber and dealer who comes in and assents becomes a party to such illegal combination, which is illegal principally because it has for its purpose the fixing prices for sales to the general public, the consumers, and the destruction of competition, which, if existing, would inure to the benefit of such consumers. Can it be that a patentee, himself manufacturing under his patent and the sole manufacturer, and thus controlling the entire output of the article, can bring into combination with himself all jobbers and dealers, or all jobbers and dealers in that article, and by agreement fix not only the price, including royalty, at which the patentee sells, but the prices on resale to consumers, and thus do away with all competition and deprive the public of the benefits of competition? If the one transaction of combination transcends what is 'necessary' to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly which the law conferred upon it,' it seems to me clear that the other does. The effect on the public is precisely the same in both cases. If two patentees, or licensees of a patentee, cannot combine with each other and jobbers to control prices on the sales of articles made by such patentees or licensees, how is it that one patentee or licensee who manufactures under his patent can so combine? There is a combination in both cases, and, so far as the public is concerned, the one is as detrimental to the public interests as the other."

The fact that the article sold is packed in a patented container does not prevent contracts controlling the price of resale from being violative of the Federal Anti-trust Act, whether the value of the container is negligible as compared with the value of the contents, and its purchase is a mere accident in the contract of sale, or whether the carton itself has a substantial value, where the sales are not conditional, but absolute, and the container was not sold for use with subsequent purchases of the article. United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78.

There is, however, a distinction between the sale of the patented articles themselves and an assignment of the right to produce and vend such articles.

Thus, in E. Bement & Sons v. National Harrow Co. 186 U. S. 70, 46 L. ed. 1058, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, it was held that the Federal Anti-trust Law clearly does not refer to that kind of a restraint of interstate commerce which may arise from reasonable and legal conditions imposed upon the assignee or licensee of a patent by the owner thereof, restricting the terms upon which the article may be used and the price to be demanded therefor. With reference to the stipulation as to the price to be demanded, the court said: "The provision in regard to the price at which the licensee would sell the article manufactured under the license was also an appropriate and reasonable condition. It tended to keep up the price of the implements manufactured and sold, but that was only recognizing the nature of the property dealt in, and providing for its value so far as possible. This the parties were legally entitled to do. The owner of a patent may assign it, or sell the right to manufacture and sell the article patented, upon the condition that the assignee shall charge a certain amount for such article."

And it has been held that the requirement of a licensee to join other licensees in a combination or pool to control the prices and output of the patented article does not violate the Federal Anti-trust Law, as it does not touch any matter outside of the monopoly under the patent. Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Milwaukee Rubber Works Co. (1907) 83 C. C. A. 385, 154 Fed. 358, writ of certiorari granted in (1907) 207 U. S. 589, 52 L. ed. 354, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, but dismissed in (1907) 210 U. S. 439, 52 L. ed. 1138, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 764.

Transaction as a sale or a license.

In consequence of the distinction above pointed out, the attempt has sometimes been made to give the transaction the character of a license to use a patented invention, but without success.

In Bauer v. O'Donnell (the Sanatogen Case) (1913) 229 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1041, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1185, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 150, it is held that attaching a notice to a patented article which states that the article is licensed for sale and use at a specified price, that a purchase is an acceptance of the conditions, and that all rights revert to the patentee in the event of a violation of the restrictions, cannot convert an otherwise apparently unqualified sale into a mere license to use the invention.

In the course of the opinion, it is said: "It is contended in argument that the notice in this case deals with the use of the invention, because the notice states that the package is licensed 'for sale and use at a price not less than $1;' that a purchase is an acceptance of the conditions; and that all rights revert to the patentee in event of violation of the restriction. But in view of the facts certified in this case, as to what took place concerning the article in question, it is a perversion of terms to call the transaction in any sense a license to use the invention. The jobber from whom the appellee purchased had previously bought, at a price which must be deemed to have been satisfactory, the packages of Sanatogen afterwards sold to the appellee. The patentee had no interest in the proceeds of the subsequent sales, no right to any royalty thereon, or to participation in the profits thereof. The packages were sold with as full and complete title as any article could have when sold in the open market, excepting only the attempt to limit the sale or use when sold for not less than $1. In other words, the title transferred was full and complete, with an attempt to reserve the right to fix the price at which subsequent sales could be made. . . . The patentee relies solely upon the notice quoted to control future prices in the resale by a purchaser of an article said to be of great utility and highly desirable for general use. The appellee and the jobbers from whom he purchased were neither the agent nor the licensees of the patentee. They had the title to, and the right to sell, the article purchased without accounting for the proceeds to the patentee, and without making any further payment than had already been made in the purchase from the agent of the patentee."

In Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Straus (1915) 222 Fed. 524, affirmed in (1917) 140 C. C. A. 519, 225 Fed. 535, it was held that one who had acquired from an authorized dealer, by paying the full list price, talking machines manufactured under patents, the manufacturer of which assumes to convey only a right to use during the life of the patent for a stated royalty to be paid in advance, upon the expiration of such patent the goods to become the property of the licensee if he shall have observed the conditions of the license, cannot be treated as an infringer because he proposes to dispose thereof at less than the list price. The court said: "Whether the various documents evidence a lease of each machine for a stated period, with privilege to the lessee at the end of such period to take full title provided he has complied with the conditions of the lease, as to use solely of complainant's needles, records, etc., or whether it be a conditional sale, need not be decided. It seems clear that if the license to use one of these machines on the named conditions has passed from complainant through its distributors or dealers to one of the public, who has paid the full list price for the same, the person who has thus acquired license to use in accordance with the specified conditions may assign such license to any other member of the public, who, by such assignment, will himself obtain the right to use in accordance with the specified conditions. We are not satisfied that there is any obligation on the part of any one member of the public who thus assigns his lease, or whatever it may be, to another member of the public, to exact any particular sum from the latter as a consideration for the transfer. We do not see why he may not give the lease to whomsoever he pleases for no consideration at all, as a free gift, provided he has not himself violated any of the conditions, and turns the machine over with the license label or other company marks affixed to the machine intact and unaltered, so that his assignee may be fully advised of the conditions under which use of the machine is licensed."

The illegal function of controlling the price at which a patented machine may be resold after the manufacturer has been paid therefor, and after it has passed into the hands of dealers and the public, is the sole purpose that can be attributed to the attaching of a notice to such machine which states that such machine is licensed for the term of the patent having the longest time to run, and that it may not be delivered to any unlicensed member of the general public until "the full license price" stated in the notice is paid, since this notice is not intended as a security for any further payment, as the full price, called a "royalty," is paid before the manufacturer parts with the possession of the machine, and is not to be used as a basis for keeping the manufacturer informed as to the condition or use of the machine, as no report of any character is required from the "ultimate user" after he has paid the stipulated price, and since such notice, notwithstanding its apparently studied avoidance of the use of the word "sale," and its frequent reference to the word "use," omits the most obvious requirements for securing a bona fide enforcement of the restrictions of the notice as to "use," and under it, even by its own terms, the title to the machines ultimately vests in the "ultimate users" without any further payment or action on their part upon the expiration of patents which, so far as the notice shows, may or may not be incorporated in the machine. Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 490, 61 L. ed. 866, L.R.A.1917E, 1196, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 955.

In Edison v. Ira M. Smith Mercantile Co. (1911) 188 Fed. 925, it is said that the force of restrictions as to the price at which a patented article may be resold, as running with such article, depends in each case upon the transaction by which the patentee embarks the article upon its voyage. Such transaction is not necessarily unconditional and absolute because it is denominated a "sale;" nor is it necessarily any less than a complete sale because denominated a "conditional sale" or "license." Its dominant character is a question of construction in each case.

A provision made in contracts between a manufacturer of phonograph records and jobbers and dealers, and in a notice on the carton containing the records, that they shall not be resold except for a specified price, and that "upon any breach of said conditions the license to use and vend this record implied from such sale immediately terminates," is a license condition attaching to the article, and not merely a personal covenant by the first purchaser,—at least, until the article has reached the ultimate user and has been used. Ibid.

In Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene (1913) 202 Fed. 225, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 126 C. C. A. 668, 209 Fed. 1007, the court, in discussing the question whether the violation of a so-called license agreement or restriction fixing the price at which plaintiff's product might be resold by dealers constituted infringement of the patent, said that the alleged right under the contract to retake the property on paying to the purchaser the price paid by him in case it is less than that fixed by the patentee or his assignee does not operate to make the sale in the first instance a conditional one which the law will recognize.

Although the holding of the United States Supreme Court that the right to impose price restrictions is no part of the monopoly enjoyed by a patentee renders the subjoined decision of no practical value, it is herein set forth for the information of the reader.

If a license restriction fixing the resale price is imposed, not for the purpose of protecting the patent or for securing its benefits, but for the purpose of evading the provisions of the Anti-trust Act, then it is void, because such restriction is not "a reasonable condition imposed upon the licensee of a patent by the owner thereof," nor "a condition suitable to protect the use of their patent and to secure its benefits." Ingersoll v. McColl (1913) 204 Fed. 147.

A license restriction nominally for the purpose of protecting a patent will not be upheld where it appears that the manufacturer sells other goods embodying the patent without such restriction. Ibid.

Right of licensee to impose restriction.

Although the denial by the Supreme Court of the right of a patentee to impose price restrictions has rendered the following decisions of purely academic interest, they are herein set forth for the information of the reader.

Where the owner of a patent has neither imposed any restriction as to the price at which the patented article may be sold to the ultimate purchaser at retail, nor has authorized its imposition, an exclusive licensee to sell cannot impose such a restriction. Ingersoll v. Snellenberg (1906) 147 Fed. 522.

In Edison v. Ira M. Smith Mercantile Co. (1911) 188 Fed. 925, it was held to be immaterial that the sales were made and the license conditions inaugurated, not by the patentee, but by a licensee operating under a grant of exclusive right to make, use, and sell the patented invention throughout the United States, the court saying that the opinion in Ingersoll v. Snellenberg (Fed.) supra, holding that such restrictions are not valid when imposed by a licensee, appears to rest upon the idea that the license there in question was not shown to be exclusive, so as to supersede the rights of the patentee.

English and Canadian decisions.

In National Phonograph Co. v. Menck [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 336, 80 L. J. P. C. N. S. 105, 104 L. T. N. S. 5, 27 Times L. R. 239, 28 Rep. Pat. Cas. 229, 48 Scot. L. R. 733, a case arising under the Australian Commonwealth Patent Act, which, so far as material to the matters in issue in the case, is identical with the British Patent Design and Trademark Act (46 & 47 Vict. chap. 57), it was held that the general doctrine of absolute freedom of disposal of chattels of an ordinary kind is, in the case of patented chattels, subject to the restriction that a person purchasing them with knowledge of the conditions attached by the patentee, clearly brought home to himself at the time of sale, shall be bound by that knowledge, and accept the situation of ownership subject to the limitations.

In Gillette v. Rea (1910) 15 Ont. Week. Rep. 345, 1 Ont. Week. N. 448, it is stated that under the Canadian patent act the sale of a patented article conveys an absolute title, and that this is fatal to any attempt to impose conditions as to price, extending beyond the first purchaser.

3. Copyrighted productions.

As in the case of patented articles, so also in the case of copyrighted productions, it was formerly supposed that the exclusive right to produce and vend enjoyed by the owner of the copyright included the right to fix a price at which the copyrighted production might be resold.

It was accordingly held that agreements between the purchasers of copyrighted books and the proprietor of the copyright, as to the price at which such books shall be resold, were not illegal. See Straus v. American Publishers' Asso. (1904) 177 N. Y. 473, 64 L.R.A. 701, 101 Am. St. Rep. 819, 69 N. E. 1107, affirming (1903) 85 App. Div. 446, 83 N. Y. Supp. 271, s. c. on subsequent appeal in (1908) 198 N. Y. 496, 86 N. E. 525, affirming (1908) 127 App. Div. 935, 111 N. Y. Supp. 830; Murphy v. Christian Press Asso. Pub. Co. (1899) 38 App. Div. 426, 56 N. Y. Supp. 597.

But the authority of these cases is virtually nullified by the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court.

In Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus (1906) 210 U. S. 339, 52 L. ed. 1086, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722, affirming (1906) 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 767, 77 C. C. A. 607, 147 Fed. 15; and Scribner v. Straus (1908) 210 U. S. 352, 52 L. ed. 1094, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 735, it is held that the copyright statutes, while protecting the owner of the copyright in his right to multiply and sell his production, do not create the right to impose by notice a limitation as to the price at which the books shall be sold at retail by future purchasers with whom there is no privity of contract, so as to subject such purchasers to an action for infringement.

The owner of a copyright cannot, by virtue of the copyright statute, restrain the sale of copies of the copyrighted books the title to which he has transferred, but which are being sold in violation of an agreement entered into between himself and the purchaser, but the only remedy of the original owner is by action for a breach of contract. Harrison v. Maynard, M. & Co. (1894) 10 C. C. A. 17, 26 U. S. App. 99, 61 Fed. 689.

A copyright is not infringed by selling in violation of express restrictions placed on the dealer as to the mode of sale or price at which the copyrighted work is to be sold. Authors & Newspapers Asso. v. O'Gorman Co. (1906) 147 Fed. 616.

In Garst v. Hall & L. Co. (1901) 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219, it is said, obiter, that even under the law of copyright, when the owner of a copyright and of a particular copy of a book to which it pertains, has parted with all his title to the book, and has conferred an absolute title to it upon the purchaser, he cannot restrict the right of alienation, which is one of the incidents of ownership of personal property.

The copyright monopoly conferred by the Federal laws does not protect, as against condemnation under the Sherman Anti-trust Act of July 2, 1890, agreements between associations embracing probably 75 per cent of the book publishers and a majority of the booksellers in the United States, which operate to restrict the sale of copyrighted books to those only who will maintain the fixed net retail price, and result in almost completely destroying competition in such books at retail. Straus v. American Publishers' Asso. (1913) 231 U. S. 222, 58 L. ed. 192, L.R.A.1915A, 1099, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 84, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 369.

4. Trademarked goods.

It is settled that the fact that an article is trademarked gives the owner of the trademark no greater right to impose restrictions as to the resale price than he would otherwise enjoy.

Thus, the owner of a trademark cannot control the price of the trademarked article in the hands of a dealer with whom he has no contractual relations (Ingersoll v. McColl (1913) 204 Fed. 147), though the dealer knows that the manufacturer sells only subject to such stipulation (Garst v. Hall & L. Co. (1901) 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219).

And in determining the validity of a price maintenance agreement, the fact that the product to which it relates is trademarked is immaterial. D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041.

5. Goods made by secret process.

In some cases the view has been taken that contracts seeking to control the resale price of goods manufactured by a secret process, or medicines compounded under a secret formula, are but in aid of a natural monopoly, and so are exempt from the principles which apply to contracts which tend to create a monopoly or restrain trade in other articles. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite (1904) 133 Fed. 794; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Jaynes Drug Co. (1906) 149 Fed. 838; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Platt (1906) 142 Fed. 606; Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham (1906) 146 Fed. 190, affirmed in (1907) 79 C. C. A. 228, 149 Fed. 408; Jayne v. Loder (1906) 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 78 C. C. A. 653, 149 Fed. 21, 9 Ann. Cas. 294; Garst v. Harris (1900) 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 154; Garst v. Wissler (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. Rep. 532.

It is said in support of this view that as the goods to which the agreement relates are such as the purchaser presumably would have no chance to sell at a profit at all, but for the manufacturer's permission, a limit to the license, in the form of a restriction of the price at which he may sell, is proper enough. Garst v. Harris (1900) 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 154.

But this view fails to distinguish between the necessary monopoly of the secret itself and the unnecessary monopoly of the articles made according to the secret process and offered for sale and resale to the consuming public; and the weight of authority, both in courts which hold contractual limitations on the retail price to be in undue restraint of trade, and in courts which uphold such limitations under certain conditions, is to the effect that a restraint of trade which would be unlawful as to other manufactured articles cannot be justified because the article in question is made by a secret process or under a secret formula. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 158 Fed. 24, affirming (1906) 145 Fed. 358; D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041; W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803.

In Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D.

Park & Sons Co. (1908) 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803, Judge Lurton, in holding that the fact that the manufacture of an article is a trade secret will not warrant the regarding of contracts in respect of such article as either outside of the mischief intended to be remedied by the Federal Anti-trust Law or the rules of the common law, or within the statutory protection afforded by the patent and copyright statutes, said: "Any other conclusion would be to sanction a monopoly in that class of goods vastly more far-reaching than the monopoly extended upon high grounds of public policy to the inventor. The statutory monopoly has a limitation of a few years. To obtain it the inventor must put on record his invention. At the end of the term the public will be free to employ the discovery without the burden theretofore imposed as a compensation to the inventor. Not so with the monopoly asked for by those who control the enormous proprietary trade of this country. Their monopoly will go on forever, and, if there be merit in their formula, they may not only preserve it through all time, but continue to restrain prices and prevent competition in the sale of the product. It is said that the proprietor of such a secret remedy need never communicate his formula. Concede this. To say that he need never compound his medicine, and that, if he does, he need not sell it unless he chooses, is undoubtedly true. But as much may be said about any article which the producer may choose to make or not to make, sell or not sell, as he wills. So much pertains inherently to the natural freedom of man in respect to his own actions. But if he elects to make and sell a product according to his formula, a public interest is affected if he be permitted to restrain freedom of trade in the article when it has once passed under the dominion of a buyer. A free right of alienation is an incident to the general right of property in articles which pass from hand to hand in the commerce of the world. 2 Co. Litt. § 360. The mere fact that one article or class of articles is made under an unknown and private formula, and another class is not, is an undeniable fact which may serve for some purposes to differentiate them. But that single fact does not afford an economic reason, and still less a legal reason, for saying that it operates to exempt such articles from rules against unlawful restraints of trade."

No unlawful restraint of trade is involved in the fixing by a manufacturer of the price at which its agent shall sell its product (Cole Motor Car Co. v. Hurst (1915) 142 C. C. A. 572, 228 Fed. 280); nor does a contract which creates the relation of principal and agent between the parties, and binds the agent to adhere to the selling price fixed by the manufacturer, constitute such a combination as is within the purview of anti-trust laws.

Thus, a contract by which a manufacturer constitutes another an exclusive sales agent and fixes the list price of the product does not violate the prohibition of the Sherman Act against combinations in restraint of commerce. Virtue v. Creamery Pack-aga Mfg. Co. (1913) 227 U. S. 8, 57 L. ed. 393, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202.

And the Texas Act of March 30, 1889, defining trusts and conspiracies against trade, does not apply to a contract which is not one of sale, but which merely creates the relation of principal and agent between the parties, there being in such case no union or association of otherwise independent separate and possibly competing capital, skill, or acts, and hence no combination. Welch v. Phelps & B. Wind Mill Co. (1896) 89 Tex. 653, 36 S. W. 71.

In Locker v. American Tobacco Co. (1914) 184 C. C. A. 247, 218 Fed. 447, it was held that an agreement whereby a manufacturer made a certain jobber its sole agent in certain territory on condition that it should not sell the manufacturer's product at more than list prices did not violate the Federal Anti-trust Law.

But it is immaterial that the contracts in question purport to be of bailment or agency, and not of sale, where, according to the meaning and intent of such instrument as a whole, the purchaser must be regarded as the general owner, and engaged in selling for himself, and not as a mere agent of the manufacturer. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1908) 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803.

In John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24, it is said: "The transactions described in the bill plainly constitute sales of complainant's medicine, and the general title passes to every such purchaser and subpurchaser. . . . To call such a purchaser an agent is to juggle with words."

A jobber by whom goods are purchased is to be considered as the vendee, and not merely the agent of the manufacturer in entering into an agreement as to the resale price. United States v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1915) 222 Fed. 725, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 78.

In Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156, a contract between an automobile manufacturer and dealers handling its products, which styled the one party as the "manufacturer-licensor" and the other party as "dealer-licensee," and in terms granted the "full right and license to use and vend" the manufacturer's product within the licensed territory, the manufacturer agreeing to "sell its product to the dealer-licensee" at a certain discount from list prices, and to allow a certain additional rebate, scaled on the "net amount of business" done, the dealer agreeing to take deliveries and to "purchase the said Ford automobiles," preserving title to the articles sold only until the full purchase price should be paid, with right of repossession only in case of default in such payment, and under which the manufacturer was under no obligation to take back any of the goods purchased by the dealer, and which expressly stated that the "dealer-licensee is in no way the legal representative or agent of the manufacturer-licensor,"—was held to be essentially a contract of absolute, as distinguished from conditional, sale.

On the other hand, in Ford Motor Co. v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 335, a presumably identical contract, binding the "agent" to sell cars only to users residing in certain defined territory, and only at the list retail prices fixed by the manufacturer, to pay 85 per cent of such list price in advance at the time of ordering the cars, and to pay freight charges and other expenses as well as taxes and insurance, and to suffer any loss that may be sustained by injuries to the cars from the time they leave the factory until they are delivered to the purchasing user, and under which the manufacturer, although receiving only the 85 per cent cash advance, retains complete title until a bill of sale signed by it has been delivered to the ultimate purchaser, the contract also providing for additional compensation for the "agent" over and above the 15 per cent of the retail price by way of graduated commissions, depending upon the aggregate amount of sales during the year,—did not operate to transfer an unqualified title to the "agent," so that the title to the cars would pass only upon a compliance with the other conditions of the contract, as well as that of paying the 85 per cent.

As to the validity of contracts between a manufacturer and wholesalers handling his goods, not to resell to dealers on the manufacturer's suspended list, see II. c, 1, supra.

The courts have uniformly recognized the principle applied in UNITED STATES v. COLGATE & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 443, that the inherent right of every individual to refuse to deal with any person, for any reason, or for no reason whatever, includes the right to refuse to deal with one who refuses to comply with his wishes as to the price at which his products shall be resold. See Union P. Coal Co. v. United States (1909) 97 C. C. A. 578, 173 Fed. 787; Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. v. Cream of Wheat Co. (1915) 224 Fed. 566, affirmed in (1915) 141 C. C. A. 594, 227 Fed. 46;

Cudahy Packing Co. v. Frey & Son (1919) — C. C. A. —, 261 Fed. 65; Welch Grape Juice Co. v. Frey & Son (1919) — C. C. A. —, 261 Fed. 68, writ of certiorari denied in (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 67) 251 U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56; New York Ice Co. v. Parker (1851) 21 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 302; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. (1896) 50 N. Y. Supp. 1064; Locker v. American Tobacco Co. (1907) 121 App. Div. 443, 106 N. Y. Supp. 115, affirmed on opinion below in (1909) 195 N. Y. 565, 88 N. E. 289.

In Locker v. American Tobacco Co. (N. Y.) supra, it is said: "It is the well-settled law of this state that the refusal to maintain trade relations with any individual is an inherent right which every person may exercise lawfully for reasons he deems sufficient, or for no reasons whatever; and it is immaterial whether such refusal is based upon reason or is the result of mere caprice, prejudice, or malice. It is a part of the liberty of action which the Constitutions, state and Federal, guarantee to the citizen. It is not within the power of the courts to compel an owner of property to sell or part with his title to it, without his consent, and against his wishes, to any particular persons."

In Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. v. Cream of Wheat Co. (1915) 224 Fed. 566, affirmed in (1915) 141 C. C. A. 594, 227 Fed. 46, it was likewise held that a manufacturer may lawfully refuse to sell to a dealer who refuses to maintain a fixed retail price, the court saying: "Let it be assumed that defendant declines business with all who refuse to maintain prices. If such refusal affected a necessity of life, or even a staple article of trade, the matter might be serious, and history might be appealed to for instances of statutory punishment,—e. g., the engrossing acts. But mere abstention from dealing cannot per se be price fixing, because the price is not made to depend upon any contract or agreement even thought by the parties to be enforceable. To call defendant's acts price fixing is inaccurate, and evades obvious legal questions; viz., whether defendant has the right to decline business, and whether it is anybody's business why the business is declined."

In Union P. Coal Co. v. United States (Fed.) supra, it was held that the mere refusal of a coal company to sell coal to a retail dealer unless he would discontinue an advertisement he had caused to be inserted in the newspapers to the effect that he would sell coal at a price which was less than the regular retail price then prevailing was not a violation of the Federal Anti-trust Act.

In Cudahy Packing Co. v. Frey & Son (1919) — C. C. A. —, 261 Fed. 65, it was held, upon the authority of the COLGATE & Co. CASE, that a jobber who was unable to obtain goods at the usual discount from the list price, in consequence of his noncompliance with the manufacturer's request that he maintain a fixed resale price, could not maintain an action for damages under the Federal statute forbidding combinations and discrimination in restraint of trade, the court saying: "Since the defendant, under the COLGATE & Co. CASE, merely exercised the right reserved by the Clayton Act (Act of Congress, Oct. 15, 1914, chap. 323, § 2, 38 Stat. at L. 730, Comp. Stat. § 8835b, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 731) to dealers of 'selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions, and not in restraint of trade,' the plaintiff cannot recover under its charge of unlawful discrimination in price."

A similar decision, upon the authority of the foregoing case, was made in Welch Grape Juice Co. v. Frey & Son (1919) — C. C. A. —, 261 Fed. 68, writ of certiorari denied by the Supreme Court (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 67), 251 U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56.

A dealer in ice who has failed to live up to his agreement to resell at a certain price ice purchased by him of the defendant, under penalty of having his supply stopped, cannot, upon breaking his agreement and having his supply cut off, recover damages therefor. New York Ice Co. v. Parker (1851) 21 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 302.

While it is lawful for a manufacturer to refuse to sell to any customer for any reason, however capricious, any goods manufactured by him, it is in restraint of trade and unlawful for such manufacturer to become a party to a combination which shall prevent any of his customers obtaining other goods of other manufacturers because those customers have violated the agreement with him in respect to cutting of prices, and to make such violation the cause of a general exclusion of customers from the power to purchase any kind of goods from any of the other members of the association. Mines v. Scribner (1906) 147 Fed. 927; Jayne v. Loder (1906) 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 78 C. C. A. 653, 149 Fed. 21, 9 Ann. Cas. 294; Denver Jobbers' Asso. v. People (1912) 21 Colo. App. 326, 122 Pac. 404; Straus v. American Publishers' Asso. (1904) 177 N. Y. 473, 64 L.R.A. 701, 101 Am. St. Rep. 819, 69 N. E. 1107; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. (1896) 50 N. Y. Supp. 1064.

But, as pointed out in Jayne v. Loder (1906) 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 78 C. C. A. 653, 149 Fed. 21, 9 Ann. Cas. 294: "It is true that a common plan or policy does not necessarily mean a combined one. The individual manufacturer or proprietor may be persuaded, for example, that the retailer or jobber who cuts the medicines of his neighbor to-day, will likely cut his medicine to-morrow, and so decide not to sell him; and it will not make out a conspiracy that others are of the same mind."

A manufacturer may shape his own policy, and sell or withhold from selling as he pleases, according to supposed self-interest or when, fixing the prices and naming the terms and conditions at and upon which alone he will do so, refusing to sell to those who will not comply. And so far as this is confined to his own goods, and pursued by independent and individual action, it cannot be challenged. It is quite a different matter, however, when two or more combine and agree that neither will sell to anyone who cuts the prices of any of the others. This concerted policy, by which it is sought not only to maintain by each the price of his own goods, in which he alone is interested, and which he has alone the right to control, but also the prices on those of all who are thus banded together, is manifestly a direct interference with and restraint upon the freedom of trade and commerce between the states which it was the object of the Federal Anti-trust Act to preserve. Ibid.

In Mines v. Scribner (Fed.) supra, it was held that a dealer who could not buy books because of a rule adopted by a publishers' association controlling 90 per cent of the book business of the country, that they would not sell any books to anyone who cut prices on copyrighted books, nor to anyone who should be known to have sold to others at cut prices, had a cause of action under the Federal Anti-Trust Law for damages to his business occasioned thereby.

An agreement between publishers and dealers in books, whereby the publishers agree not to sell books of any kind to dealers who shall be suspected of selling copyrighted books at less than the net price fixed by the publishers, or to dealers who shall supply books to dealers who are suspected of making such sales, violates the provision of the New York Anti-trust Law (Laws 1899, chap. 690, § 1) that "every contract, agreement, arrangement or combination, whereby a monopoly in the manufacture, production or sale in this state of any article or commodity of common use, is or may be created, established or maintained, or whereby competition in this state in the supply or price of any such article or commodity is or may be restrained or prevented or whereby for the purpose of creating, establishing or maintaining a monopoly within this state, of the manufacture, production or sale of any such article or commodity, the free pursuit in this state of any lawful business, trade or occupation is or may be restricted or prevented is hereby declared to be against public policy, illegal and void." Straus v. American Publishers' Assn. (1904) 177 N. Y.

473, 64 L.R.A. 701, 101 Am. St. Rep. 819, 69 N. E. 1107, affirming (1903) 85 App. Div. 446, 88 N. Y. Supp. 271.

Comment on the Colgate Case.

To those who believe that the experience of mankind teaches that, in the long run, the public interest is best served by free and unrestricted competition, and that such competition is "worth what it costs," the decision of the Supreme Court in the COLGATE CASE (reported herewith) ante, 443, comes as a distinct disappointment, in that it permits to be accomplished by indirection an end which the Supreme Court has previously held to be at variance with sound public policy. To say that the announced policy of refusing to have further dealings with those who may not comply with the manufacturers' known wishes imposes no restraint on trade because "the retailer, after buying, could, if he chose, give away his purchase, or sell it at any price he saw fit," is a mere quibble. It is idle to suppose there are such numbers of retailers who are willing to forego the advantages of handling the Colgate or any other widely advertised goods, that the public can obtain them at prices fixed upon a competitive basis.

As a matter of fact, and notwithstanding certain incidental advantages to the manufacturer and even to the public (pointed out in II. a, supra), the dealer is the chief beneficiary of the policy of retail price maintenance, since he is absolutely protected against price competition from his fellow dealers. Court records disclose that this policy has not always originated with the manufacturer, but has often been adopted at the insistence of a dealers' association. It is not to be wondered at that the president of the largest association of retail dealers in the United States—an association avowedly formed for the purpose of promoting price maintenance and price protection—publicly referred to the decision in the COLGATE CASE as "a distinct victory, not alone for the Colgate Company, but also for the cause of price maintenance." See report of the 21st Annual Convention, National Association of Retail Druggists, published in N. A. R. D. Journal, vol. 28, pp. 1222-1225.

Although the decision in the COLGATE CASE is not subversive of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376,—the two together amounting to a declaration that while the Federal courts will not enforce or protect contracts for the maintenance of a fixed retail price, neither will they visit an individual manufacturer with the penalties of the Sherman Act because he follows the policy of refusing to sell goods to known price cutters,—it, at least, suggests the speculation whether the Supreme Court has repented of its attitude towards retail price fixing schemes, or, at least, whether the minority whose dissent is registered in its earlier decisions, and who believe that excessive or unfair prices are held in check by the operation of economic laws, has received reinforcement.

The COLGATE CASE, however, is not to be taken as affirming that the right of a manufacturer to refuse to deal with price-cutters is absolute and unqualified. It does not appear therein that the resale prices fixed by the defendant were other than fair and reasonable; or that such right was employed by the defendant in furtherance of a purpose to create or maintain a monopoly. What these presumptive limitations of the scope of this decision may amount to, only the future can determine.

III. What amounts to a violation of resale price agreement.

A contract whereby a purchaser, in consideration of certain rebates in price, agrees to maintain a certain price in selling at retail a brand of goods thus purchased, is violated by selling such brand of goods at a lower price than that agreed upon, although the goods so sold are purchased of a third person. Clark v. Frank (1885) 17 Mo. App. 602.

In Edison v. Ira M. Smith Mercantile Co. (1911) 188 Fed. 925, the court held that the manufacturer of a patented article who sold it under contracts with jobbers and retail dealers, containing a restriction as to the retail price, was entitled to an injunction restraining a sale under such price by a dealer who, with knowledge of such restriction, had purchased the articles from a salvage company to which they had been sold by an insurance company after the destruction by fire of the stock of a presumably authorized dealer.

See also in this connection, Lovell-McConnell Mfg. Co. v. International Automobile League (1913) 120 C. C. A. 619, 202 Fed. 219, set forth in V. e. infra.

IV. Right of manufacturer to enforce contract made by retailer with middleman.

In England, it has been held that a manufacturer who has sold goods of his manufacture to a middleman, who agreed, in consideration of a stipulated discount, to buy a given quantity of goods within a specified time; also, not to sell or offer such goods at less than the list price, with a right, however, to allow a discount to genuine trade customers, and to obtain from such customers a similar undertaking, and to forward such undertaking to the manufacturer,—is a stranger to the consideration for an agreement so obtained from a retailer, purporting to be made between the middleman and the retailer in consideration of the allowance of a certain discount, and therefore, cannot enforce it. Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Selfridge & Co. [1915] A. C. (Eng.) 847, 8 B. R. C. 221, [1915] W. N. 184, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1680, 113 L. T. N. S. 386, 31 Times L. R. 399, 59 Sol. Jo. 439, reversing [1914] W. N. 59, 83 L. J. K. B. N. S. 923, 110 L. T. N. S. 679, 30 Times L. R. 250.

But the English doctrine that (with certain exceptions which need not be here enumerated) a third person for whose benefit a contract is made cannot maintain an action thereon, although followed in Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Wyoming, has been, nominally at least, rejected in the majority of the state courts; although it is questionable whether some of the decisions which purport to reject it are not really referable to some of the exceptions thereto. However, cases are not wanting which have gone the length of holding that if the person for whose benefit the contract is made has either a legal or an equitable interest in its performance, he need not necessarily be privy to the consideration. See 6 R. C. L., title, "Contracts," § 271.

And under the Code provisions of some states the contract must be made expressly for the benefit of the third person in order to entitle him to sue thereon.

But even in those jurisdictions in which one benefited by the performance of a contract may enforce it, though a stranger to the consideration, the question still remains whether a price maintenance agreement made between a middleman and a retailer may, in view of the fact that it is made by the middleman in order to exonerate himself from liability under his own contract to the manufacturer, be considered as having been entered into primarily for the benefit of the manufacturer.

In one instance, however, it has been held that an agreement made between a retailer and a jobber from whom the retailer purchased goods, that he would not resell them for less than the retail selling price fixed by the manufacturer, is enforceable by the manufacturer under a statute (Cal. Civ. Code, § 1559) providing that "a contract made expressly for the benefit of third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it." D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041.

V. Protection against interference with price control system.

a. As against one who has violated his agreement.

Where an agreement to maintain a fixed retail price is regarded as valid, the promisee may maintain an action thereon for actual (Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 76 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144) or liquidated (Garst v. Harris (1908) 187 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 154) damages; or may obtain an injunction against its breach (Grogan v. Chaffee (1909) 156 Cal. 611, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 105 Pac. 745; D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041; Robert H. Ingersoll & Bro. v. Hahne & Co. (1917) 88 N. J. Eq. 222, 101 Atl. 1030, s. c. on final hearing (1918) 89 N. J. Eq. 382, 108 Atl. 128; Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (Wash.) supra).

But the court will not enjoin the breach of an agreement to maintain a retail price where such agreement is contrary to law. Wampole v. F. E. Karn Co. (1906) 11 Ont. L. Rep. 619.

b. As against one who has procured goods by deception.

If one by the exercise of fraud or deception obtains goods without signing the required agreement, he may be subject to the same liability as if he had been bound thereby. Edison Phonograph Co. v. Kaufmann (1901) 105 Fed. 980; Authors & Newspapers Assn. v. O'Gorman Co. (1906) 147 Fed. 616; Edison Phonograph Co. v. Pike (1902) 116 Fed. 863; *National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. A manufacturer who sells his goods to wholesalers upon the terms of an agreement which provides that the wholesalers shall sell only to dealers who will sign a retailer's agreement in the form provided by the manufacturer, both agreements providing that the goods shall not be sold at less than the specified current list prices applicable respectively to wholesalers and retailers, or to dealers on the manufacturer's suspended list, has a right of action against a dealer who, being on the suspended list, procures others to obtain goods from wholesalers who had signed the agreement by falsely representing themselves as independent dealers and dealing in fictitious names, irrespective of whether such act was intended to damage the manufacturer, and though the immediate party to the contract, having acted innocently, may not himself be liable, National Phonograph Co. v.

Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. (Eng.) supra.

One who knowingly induces or procures another to violate his contract to maintain a certain resale price may be held answerable in damages therefor, or may be enjoined from attempting to induce further violations, if the contract is one which the courts would enforce as between the immediate parties thereto. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite (1904) 133 Fed. 794; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Platt (1906) 142 Fed. 606; Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham (1906) 146 Fed. 190, affirmed in (1907) 79 C. C. A. 228, 149 Fed. 408; Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus (1906) 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 767, 77 C. C. A. 607, 147 Fed. 15; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Jaynes Drug Co. (1906) 149 Fed. 838; *Ford Motor Co. v. R. C. 42, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 218, 98 L. T. N. S. 291, 24 Times L. R. 201.

A person who unlawfully or maliciously persuades another person to break his contract with a third person, to the injury of such third person, is liable for the damages which are the natural result of such act; and when by reason thereof he has acquired title to property wrongfully, he may be adjudged a trustee ex maleficio in respect to such property, and enjoined from disposing thereof. Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus (1906) 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 767, 77 C. C. A. 607, 147 Fed. 15.

It has been held that an action is maintainable against a third person who has procured a violation of contract by fraud and misrepresentation, even though, as between the immediate parties to the contract, there is no right of action in respect of the violation. National Phonograph Co. v.

Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. (Eng.) supra. The general question whether an action for procuring a breach of contract will lie where there is no right of action as between the immediate parties is, however, one upon which the decisions are at variance. See note in 6 B. R. C. 80.

Where a contract by which the manufacturer seeks to control the resale price is invalid, one who causes it or attempts to cause it to be broken does the manufacturer no wrong cognizable by the law. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1917) 156 C. C. A. 584, 244 Fed. 156; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803.

d. As against one who has procured goods without fraud or knowingly inducing a violation of contract.

Where there is no privity of contract between the complainant and the defendant, the latter may resell at any price he sees fit goods obtained from dealers under contract with the complainant, unless there was fraud or deceit in the transaction. Ford Motor Co. v. International Automobile League (1913) 209 Fed. 235.

One may not be enjoined from selling or disposing of goods purchased by him where it is not shown that he has procured their sale to him at a price less than that which the dealer has agreed to charge. L. E. Waterman Co. v. Waterman (1898) 27 App. Div. 133, 50 N. Y. Supp. 131.

In the absence of notice on the part of the defendant of the contract between the complainant, the author of a book, and his sales agents who purchased such books from the author as they might sell, to sell by subscription only, and not to the trade, for the full retail price, the defendant will not be restrained from selling or advertising for sale books purchased from such agents, at any price the defendant may see fit, although less than that fixed by such contract, it not appearing that the defendant tried to induce the agent to sell the books or to break any contract; but the author's remedy is against the agent for a violation of the contract. Clemens v. Estes (1885) 22 Fed. 899.

A manufacturer has no right of action in respect of a transaction by which the defendant obtained goods through a retail dealer who, not knowing the defendant to be on the suspended list, let him, as matter of accommodation, have goods at the price which he himself paid for them, no fraud or misrepresentation being employed. National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. [1908] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 385, 6 B. R. C. 42, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 218, 98 L. T. N. S. 291, 24 Times L. R. 201.

The fact that all means of identification are removed has been held sufficient to show that the goods were purchased from a person interdicted by contract from selling. Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham (1906) 146 Fed. 190, affirmed in (1907) 79 C. C. A. 228, 149 Fed. 408.

e. As against one who falsely represents himself to be the manufacturer's agent.

It is unfair competition for one who sells below the retail price fixed by the manufacturer to represent himself as the manufacturer's agent. Ford Motor Co. v. Benjamin E. Boone (1917) 156 C. C. A. 621, 244 Fed. 335.

f. As against one who erases serial numbers.

Where a contract for maintenance of a uniform retail price is legal and enforceable, the manufacturer is entitled to enjoin a third person from mutilating the packages and destroying the numbers thereon, so they cannot be identified. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite (1904) 133 Fed. 794.

But where the system of contracts under which the goods are marketed is in unlawful restraint of trade, the court will not enjoin a third person from obliterating the serial numbers placed upon goods for the purpose of enabling the manufacturer to trace them. John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 125, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; W. H.

In B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC (reported herewith) ante, 440, it was held that an injunction would not lie to prevent a jobber from removing from cartons in which a manufacturer delivered his goods, secret marks intended to aid the manufacturer in price maintenance, by enabling it to determine which of its wholesalers cut prices, in order that it might refuse to have further dealings with him. As to whether this decision can stand in the face of the Supreme Court's decision in the COLGATE CASE (reported herewith) ante, 443, see comment made thereon in the note appended thereto.

No right to protection in the use of a serial number as a means employed by a manufacturer to identify his goods is conferred by a statute making it a misdemeanor knowingly to sell, offer, or expose for sale, any goods which are represented to be the manufacture of another "unless such goods are contained in the original packages, box or bottle, and under the labels, marks or names placed thereon by the manufacturer who is entitled to use such marks, names, brands or trademarks." B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC.

In the majority of cases it has been held that where the system of contracts by which the selling price is sought to be maintained is not invalid as being in undue restraint of trade, a manufacturer is entitled to equitable relief against violations of such contracts or other acts of interference with his system of price maintenance, such as the cutting of prices by one who has fraudulently obtained goods, or inducing persons under contract to maintain the price to violate such contract, or the erasure of serial numbers. See Edison Phonograph Co. v. Kaufmann (1901) 105 Fed. 960; Edison Phonograph Co. v. Pike (1902) 116 Fed. 863; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite (1904) 133 Fed. 794; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Platt (1906) 142 Fed. 606; Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus (1906) 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 767, 77 C. C. A.

607, 147 Fed. 15; Authors & Newspapers Asso. v. O'Gorman Co. (1906) 147 Fed. 616; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Jaynes Drug Co. (1906) 149 Fed. 838; Wells & R. Co. v. Abraham (1906) 146 Fed. 190, affirmed in (1907) 79 C. C. A. 228, 149 Fed. 408; Grogan v. Chaffee (1909) 156 Cal. 611, 105 Pac. 745, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395; D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker (1912) 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041; Garst v. Charles (1908) 187 Mass. 144, 72 N. E. 239; Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson (1913) 76 Wash. 649, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 522, 137 Pac. 144; National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. [1908] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 335, 6 B. R. C. 42, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 218, 98 L. T. N. S. 291, 44 Times L. R. 201.

This is on the ground that there is no complete and adequate remedy at law. Garst v. Charles (1908) 187 Mass. 144, 72 N. E. 839.

But in Elliman Sons & Co. v. Carrington & Son [1901] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 275, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 577, 49 Week. Rep. 532, 84 L. T. N. S. 858, the court refused to enjoin a breach of contract on the part of a purchaser to maintain the selling price, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had the remedy in their own hands, by refusing to supply their products except upon their own terms.

But equitable relief will, of course, not be granted where the system of price control for which protection is sought is regarded as an unlawful restraint of trade. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911) 220 U. S. 873, 65 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman (1907) 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Ford Motor Co. v. Union Motor Sales Co. (1916) 156 C. C. A. 534, 244 Fed. 156, affirming (1915) 225 Fed. 373; B. V. D. Co. v. ISAAC (reported herewith) ante, 440; W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray & Worcester (1910) 163 Mich. 12, 80 L.R.A. (N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803; Wampole v. F. E. Karn Co. (1906) 11 Ont. L. Rep. 619.

Sufficiency of bill.

Sufficient damage to justify the granting of an injunction to restrain a dealer in phonographs and their accessories from unlawfully interfering with the contractual relations between the plaintiffs, who were manufacturers of phonographs and phonographic records, and persons handling their goods, whereby the latter undertook not to sell to dealers on the manufacturers' suspended list, is established by evidence that purchasers of machines through authorized dealers are more likely to purchase records of the plaintiffs' manufacture, and that, in fact, there has been a falling off in their sale of records since the time when the defendant interfered with their system, coupled with the inference which may fairly be drawn from the fact that the defendant, a firm of some standing, should have cared so much to get hold of plaintiffs' machine that it condescended to a system of deception in order to attain this object. National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. [1908] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 335, 6 B. R. C. 42, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 218, 98 L. T. N. S. 291, 44 Times L. R. 201.

A bill for an injunction which sets forth with great fullness the title and rights of the complainant, and the violation of those rights, and which alleges in various forms and with sufficient definiteness the substantial facts of collusion, combination, and persuasion by the defendants with wholesale and retail dealers who are under contract with the complainant, is sufficiently certain although it does not name the particular dealers with whom the defendants have combined and conspired, where it appears from the bill that the defendants obliterate the identifying serial numbers upon the packages they sell, by which means the complainant is prevented from ascertaining the jobber or retailer to whom the package was originally sold. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Jaynes Drug Co. (1906) 149 Fed. 838.

What amounts to violation of injunction.

An injunction against an automobile owner's association which sells accessories to members at manufacturers' prices, from violating a license restriction inhibiting it from selling a certain article at less than the stipulated retail price, is evaded where the association, although charging the full retail price, returns a discount to the purchaser in the form of a check drawn to the order of some charitable association to be designated by him.

ERROR to the District Court for Eagle County (Cavender, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the price of certain goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, in which defendant filed a cross complaint for damages for alleged breach of contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Hogan & Bonner and H. Riddell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Dana, Blount, & Silverstein and Richard A. Smith for defendant in error.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the Hercules Powder Company, hereinafter designated as the plaintiff, against J. W. Dowd, defendant, to recover the price of certain goods sold and delivered. The defendant filed a cross complaint for damages for an alleged breach of contract. Issues were joined and upon trial the court found for the plaintiff.

The defendant was denied any recovery upon his counterclaim.

The cause is brought here for review by the defendant, and the matters complained of, or presented for our consideration, relate only to the defendant's counterclaim for damages and the trial court's denial of the same.

The contract, upon which the defendant relies, was entered into on January 6, 1914, and continued in effect for a period of two years from that date. The contract was made between the defendant, designated therein as "purchaser," and the Independent Powder Company, described as "vendor." The plaintiff is the successor to the last-named company, and now stands in its place under the contract.

Paragraph 2 of the contract reads as follows:

"2. Witnesseth: That, in consideration of all the business of the purchaser, the vendor hereby agrees to sell to the purchaser, and the purchaser, in consideration of the prices and terms hereinafter stated, hereby agrees to buy from the vendor all the dynamite and other blasting supplies which may be required by the said purchaser during the term of this contract, for his own consumption or in the conduct of his own business at Red Cliff, Colorado, district."

The defendant alleged in his cross complaint that "within and during the life of this contract he placed with said plaintiff orders for goods to an amount of 250,000 caps, 100 cases of White Monarch fuse, and one carload of powder; . . ." that plaintiff refused to furnish the goods; and that by such act of the plaintiff the defendant was damaged.

The plaintiff interposed several defenses to the defendant's counterclaim, one of which appears from the following allegations: "That if defendant ordered . . . the caps, fuse and powder referred to, . . . such merchandise was not required by defendant during the term of said contract for his own consumption or in the conduct of his own business, . . . and was ordered by defendant, . . . in quantities, which as he then well knew, were far beyond the requirements of himself or his business, and for the purpose of obtaining such merchandise at cheap prices and selling it during the years 1916 and 1917, and thereafter at such advanced prices as he would then be able to obtain."

At the trial, evidence relevant to this defense was received by the court. It is incumbent upon the plaintiff in error to show wherein the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. Dailey v. Aspen Democrat Pub. Co. 46 Colo. 145, 150, 103 Pac. 303. In our opinion, the plaintiff in error has failed to do this. The presumption therefore obtains that the evidence supports the judgment. 4 C. J. 786. What appears in the record as to <sup>—most favorable</sup> matters of fact is <sup>view.</sup> to be viewed in the light most favorable to the successful party. Sebold v. Rieger, 26 Colo. App. 209, 142 Pac. 201.

Reviewing the record in the light of the principles above stated, we find that the evidence fairly sustains the defense above mentioned, and that the trial court would have been warranted in finding the issue, in this respect, for the plaintiff, and for that reason denying defendant any recovery upon his counterclaim.

The term of the contract expired January 6, 1916. The order for goods, given by the defendant, and which the plaintiff refused to fill, was made on January 1, 1916, at a time when the defendant knew that the period fixed by the contract for furnishing goods was about to expire. The evidence also warrants the inference that the defendant knew that if the order was filled by the plaintiff, the goods could not be delivered until after the expiration of the term fixed by the contract. At the time the order was given the defendant already had on hand a reasonable quantity of material of the kind ordered. The evidence shows that the single order of January 1, 1916, was for more material than had been ordered during the previous month, and that the December, 1915, and January, 1916, orders together amounted to more material than the defendant had ordered during the entire remainder of the two-year term of the contract. The record appears to uphold the contention of the plaintiff, to the effect that the testimony fails to show that the defendant required the dynamite and blasting materials, ordered January 1, 1916, to meet the demands of his business during the term of the contract, and that the order was given as an attempt to use the terms of the contract for the purpose of speculating on the advanced and rising market price of the materials. The contract in question does not require or provide that the plaintiff furnish all the material sought by defendant, but only so much "as may be required by the said purchaser (the defendant) during the term of this contract, for his own consumption or in the conduct of his own business."

The contract does not permit the defendant to stock up, to an undue extent, with goods just before the term of the contract should terminate.

In our opinion the evidence is sufficient and of such a character to uphold the judgment of the trial court, and the same is therefore affirmed.

Garrigues, Ch. J., and Bailey, J., concur.

NOTE.

The general question as to the construction of contracts for the sale of a commodity to the extent of the buyer's requirements is the subject of an annotation appended to DIAMOND ALKALI Co. v. ÆTNA EXPLOSIVES Co. post, 498. As will appear from this annotation, the courts generally sustain the doctrine of the reported case (Dowd v. HERCULES POWDER Co. ante, 493) that a contract with a manufacturer to furnish his requirements of a designated commodity for a certain period of time has reference to the buyer's requirements in his business during the life of the contract. And the contract imposes upon the seller no duty to fill the buyer's order for a large quantity of the commodity, much more than he had ordered during the previous period of the contract, the order having been sent by the buyer at a time when the commodity could not be delivered during the life of the contract.

In this connection compare with DIAMOND ALKALI Co. v. ÆTNA EXPLOSIVES Co., which holds that under the contract in that case the buyer is entitled to the maximum quantity of the commodity contracted for although he does not need that amount in his manufacturing business, and intends to resell it at a profit. And see reference to this case in the annotation appended thereto.

DIAMOND ALKALI COMPANY

v.

ÆTNA EXPLOSIVES COMPANY, Appt.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—April 12, 1919.

(264 Pa. 304, 107 Atl. 711.)

Sale — contract for supply for manufacturing business — profit on resale.

A manufacturer who, having contracted for his entire requirement during a certain year of a commodity used in his business, with a specified minimum and maximum quantity, is not bound to account to the seller for profits on a quantity of the commodity taken under the contract, and not used in his business but resold.

[See note on this question beginning on page 498.]

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in a suit for an accounting. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. B. J. Jarrett and McCook & Jarrett for appellant.

Messrs. Edwin W. Smith and William M. Robinson for appellee.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree brought up on this appeal is that the appellant, the defendant below, account to the appellee for profits which it realized on the sales of soda ash delivered to it by the appellee in pursuance of a written contract between them, dated October 15, 1915. It is as follows: "The Diamond Alkali Company (seller) hereby agrees to manufacture for and sell to Ætna Explosives Company, New York, New York (buyer), and buyer hereby agrees to buy from seller: Quantity: Buyer's entire requirements during 1916; minimum quantity 180 tons per month and maximum 250 tons monthly. Also 230 tons for shipment in equal monthly quantities during November and December, 1915. Kind: 58 per cent light soda ash. Shipment: In carload lots. Price: $1 per hundred pounds, basis 58 per cent, packed in bags. If shipped in bulk, 7½ c. per cwt. to be deducted from above price. Deliveries: F. o. b. Painesville, Ohio. Terms: Cash in ten days, less 1 per cent. Payable in New York or Pittsburgh exchange. Each shipment to constitute a separate sale, but failure of buyer to fulfil terms of payment or to accept any shipment tendered in accordance herewith shall, at seller's option, operate as an express refusal to receive any and all further shipments. Buyers must give sellers at least thirty days' notice of their requirements for each ensuing month. Claims for errors, deficiencies, or imperfections must be made in writing by buyer to seller within ten days after receipt of goods. Serious fires, strikes, differences with workmen, accidents to machinery, shortage of cars, or any other causes unavoidable or beyond seller's reasonable control, shall excuse any delay in shipments caused thereby. There are no understandings or agreements relative to this contract or its subject-matter that are not fully expressed herein."

The case was disposed of below on bill and answer, from which the learned chancellor found six facts; the third and fifth being the only ones material in considering the question before us. They are:

"Third. The shipments of soda ash, pursuant to orders from defendant, were less than the minimum specified in the agreement."

"Fifth. Defendant purchased and plaintiff delivered soda ash which defendant did not use in its business as a manufacturer of explosives, and the excess quantity so obtained was sold by defendant at a profit."

The decree was made on this last finding; the court below sustaining the chancellor's construction of the contract, that under it the appellant could order only such quantities of soda ash between the minimum and maximum limits as were required in its manufacture of explosives. There is not a doubtful or ambiguous word in the contract, and its concluding clause is: "There are no understandings or agreements relative to this contract or its subject-matter that are not fully expressed herein."

Notwithstanding this explicit declaration by the parties, the court below read into the contract: "Buyer's entire requirements in its business as a manufacturer in 1916."

What the appellant's business was at the time the contract was entered into cannot be gathered from it. As a matter of fact it was a manufacturing concern, and the requirements of its business as a manufacturer during 1916 may not have been 180 tons of soda ash a month; but, whether they were or not, it was bound by the terms of its contract to take that quantity from the plaintiff. The latter furnished it less. The minimum and maximum quantities fixed in the contract were not merely probable estimates of the quantities which the appellant was to take, as was the case in Marx v. American Malting Co. 95 C. C. A. 80, 169 Fed. 582, one of the authorities relied upon by learned counsel for appellee, but were definitely fixed quantities, which the appellant could demand and the appellee was required to deliver. The latter was bound to hold itself in readiness to make shipments ordered by the appellant under the contract, and it, in turn, was bound to receive from the appellee the minimum quantity contracted for. Dimmick v. Banning, C. & Co. 256 Pa. 295, 100 Atl. 871. Though the appellant was so bound, it could not, under the lower court's construction of the contract, resell any portion of the minimum quantity which it was required to take, if it found that the entire quantity was not actually required in its business. There is no averment in the bill that it had acted in bad faith, or even knew that its orders, when given, were in excess of its requirements. The mere averment is that it had ordered soda ash in excess of its requirements in its business of manufacturing explosives, and had resold the same. The question of bad faith on its part towards the appellee is not to be regarded as involved in this controversy between them. Their mutual rights and obligations under the contract are alone involved, and they are that for one year the appellee was to be prepared to deliver, and the appellant to take, not less than 180 tons of soda ash per month, with the right to demand 70 more each month. The right of each party to the contract is to enforce it against the other. The learned chancellor below, however, was of opinion: "If 250 tons monthly was the quantity required to meet defendant's needs, it could have called for delivery of that quantity; but if 50 tons were sufficient, it could not demand more."

The complaint of the appellee, sustained by the court below, is that the appellant perverted the contract in reselling what it was bound to take from the appellee. What terms in the contract did it pervert? What did it do that it was forbidden to do? To find the appellant guilty of "perversion" of the contract, as styled by the court below, words must be written into it, in the face of the clearly expressed intention of the parties to it that there were to be "no understandings or agreements relative to this contract or its subject-matter that are not fully expressed herein." Reading of words into a contract was attempted in Highlands Chemical Co. v. Matthews, 76 N. Y. 145, where the contract provided that the plaintiff should supply the defendant with oil of vitriol for one year, "total amount to be called for during that time to be not more than ten thousand (10,000) or less than seven thousand (7,000) carboys." The defendant called for the maximum quantity, which the plaintiff failed to deliver. In a suit to recover for what had been delivered, the defendant claimed as a set-off the difference between the market price and the contract price of what had not been delivered to him. The plaintiff thereupon attempted to import into the contract words to the effect that the acid was to be used in the defendant's business, and that he had therefore no right to demand more than was required for that purpose. In holding that the contract could not be so construed, the court of appeals said: "The defendant was bound to take the minimum amount, whether he needed or desired it for the purposes of his business or not; and the correlative obligation rested upon the plaintiff to deliver any amount within the maximum fixed by the contract, if called for by the defendant. The contract of the plaintiff is not to supply an amount within the limits named; if needed by the defendant in his business. To introduce this qualification would be adding a new term to the contract."

In the present case the parties to the contract fixed definitely the quantity of soda ash the appellant was obliged to receive and the appellee was obliged to deliver. It was therefore no concern of the latter what the former may have done with what it was bound to receive. If the price of the material had fallen, it would have been compelled to bear the loss, and there is no right in the appellee to an accounting from it for what it did with what was delivered to it under the contract between them.

The fourth, fifth, seventh, and ninth assignments of error are sustained, the decree is reversed, and the bill dismissed, at the costs of the appellee.

As to the meaning of the term "require" used in reference to the amount of material to be furnished by the seller to the buyer, in Moran Bolt & Nut Mfg. Co. v. Caldwell (1912) 240 Mo. 358, 144 S. W. 472, it is pointed out that "every word has its own radical meaning, which is the symbol of the idea expressed by it. If it had two such meanings, it could not represent one idea. No two terms of the same tongue are absolutely identical in etymological meaning. Synonyms do exhibit those nuances of thought and expression which give variety and vividness to speech and writing; they enrich language by obviating the narrow monotony of reiterated terms, and increasing its play and scope by giving expression to all the variations of meaning taken by words when used in a synonymous sense. The problem in this case is not to declare the delicate gradation [gradation] of meaning which the term 'require' takes when expanded as a synonym, but to ascertain its natural import and accepted meaning in the particular sentence of the contract under review. To do this, the law does not investigate the meaning of words in the abstract, but deals only with the concrete meaning in concrete contracts of the words used. All other inquiries are linguistic, not legal, quests. To serve its own purpose, the law puts itself in the shoes of the contracting parties and ascertains the natural and accepted sense of the words used in their agreement, viewed in the light of the objects had in view and the circumstances surrounding the actors."

It has been held that the word "required," as used in government contracts for stone to be delivered for a certain construction, refers to the needs of the government in that matter, and any unreasonable delay in construction entitles the seller to recover the damage occasioned him thereby. Mueller v. United States (1884) 19 Ct. Cl. (Fed.) 581.

In National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co. (1884) 110 Ill. 427, a contract by a manufacturer to purchase all his requirements of certain material was held to bind him to take his entire supply from the seller, that is, such quantity in view of the situation and business of the buyer as was reasonably required and necessary in its manufacturing business, and the seller was held bound to furnish that amount.

In Semon Bache & Co. v. Coppes, Z. & M. Co. (Ind.) supra, a contract for furnishing a buyer's requirements demanded during a certain period was held to impose upon the latter the duty of buying his requirements of such articles from the seller, and to impose upon the latter the duty of furnishing such articles of this character as the buyer required in his business.

In Golden Cycle Min. Co. v. Rapson Coal Min. Co. (1911) 112 C. C. A. 95, 188 Fed. 179, it is held that a contract to furnish a mining company with all the coal it would use in a certain mine within a designated period of time binds the seller to furnish all the buyer's requirements of coal during said time, and the buyer is bound to purchase his requirements of the seller.

2. Obligation to furnish current needs of buyer although exceeding needs of preceding years.

The fact that the buyer's business was such that he required a much larger quantity of the commodity than was indicated by his business for previous years is no ground for a refusal by the seller to furnish the additional amount where in good faith required by the buyer.

For example, in New York Cent. Iron Works Co. v. United States Radi- ator Co. (1908) 174 N. Y. 331, 66 N. E. 967, it is held that a contract to deliver the buyer's entire radiator needs for a certain year includes the buyer's needs although largely in excess of its needs in prior years, which had also been furnished by the seller, and this is true although the needs of the buyer under the later contract was due in part to a large advance in material which the seller was to furnish.

Followed in Oscar Schlegel Mfg. Co. v. Peter Cooper's Glue Factory (1919) 189 App. Div. 843, 179 N. Y. Supp. 271, and applied to a contract to furnish a jobber his requirements. Jobber was held entitled to require much greater quantity of article last three months of contract than preceding nine months, although increased demand was due to jobber taking advantage of greatly increased market price of the article. This holding is attacked in a dissenting opinion.

In Excelsior Wrapper Co. v. Messinger (1903) 116 Wis. 549, 93 N. W. 459, it is held that an agreement to sell all of a certain kind of paper needed by the buyer in his business for a year requires the seller to furnish the quantity necessarily required by the buyer in its business, even though it exceeds the amount the buyer has used during previous years, it appearing that the character of the business was known to the seller and it had been customary for it to contract with the buyer in advance for the latter's supply. The court said that "the plaintiff had an established business, of character and magnitude well known to the defendant: It could not, with profit to itself, seriously modify the volume of that business for the mere purpose of increasing or diminishing the amount of any given class of supplies. The exact quantity of paper, therefore, which it would want or need in that business during a prospective year, while uncertain at the time of the making of the contract, was sure to become reasonably certain in the course of the year; and the contract was not merely an optional one with the plaintiff, but bound it as well to take, as it did the defendant to furnish, such paper, of the quantity designated, as should be needed for that business."

In E. G. Dailey Co. v. Clark Can Co. (1901) 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761, it is held that in the absence of fraud on its part, the fact that a purchaser of all the cans it should use in its canning plant for a certain period of time greatly increased the capacity of the plant during the life of the contract does not entitle the seller to refuse to carry out the contract by refusing to furnish the buyer with all the cans his increased capacity in business requires, although greatly in excess of the quantity he had formerly used.

3. Obligation to furnish any amount the buyer may choose to demand.

The doctrine that a contract by the seller to furnish the buyer his requirements in a certain commodity is to be construed to impose on the seller the obligation to furnish the amount of the commodity which the buyer in good faith requires in his business during the term of the contract places an apparent limitation upon the quantity of the commodity which the buyer is entitled to under the contract, the term "requirement" being construed in this regard to mean the actual needs of the buyer in his business during the life of the contract. Hence it is held that the buyer is entitled under the contract, and the seller is under obligation to furnish, only the quantity of commodity which the former's business actually requires as distinguished from the amount which he might choose to order or want.

In this regard it is pointed out in Russell, Burdsall & Ward v. Excelsior Stove Mfg. Co. (Ill.) supra, that a contract to furnish a manufacturer its requirements of certain material means the amount of such material which it needs in the regular course of its business, and not what it may choose to require.

In Lima Locomotive & Mach. Co. v. National Steel Castings Co. (1907) 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 718, 83 C. C. A. 593, 155 Fed. 77, in sustaining the validity of an agreement to furnish a manufacturing company all their requirements of steel castings for a designated period of time the court said that the seller was not proposing to make castings beyond the current requirements of the buyer's business, and would not have been obligated to supply castings not required in the usual course of that business.

In Whitehouse v. Liverpool New Gaslight & Coke Co. (Eng.) supra, a contract by a manufacturer of iron to furnish a gas company with all pipes which should from time to time be required by it during a certain period of time was held to bind the seller to furnish the buyer all the pipes which it might reasonably require for such works as it was actually carrying on, under the authority of its incorporation. The seller, however, was not under any obligation to furnish more pipes than those needed, although ordered by the buyer.

In Asahel Wheeler Co. v. Mendleson (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that defendants contracted to furnish the plaintiff their supply of a certain material for a period of one year, the quantity not to exceed 25 tons; the defendants had furnished material of this character to the plaintiff in previous years, a large part of which remained in the plaintiff's hands at the time he ordered practically the entire amount of material to be furnished by the defendants under the later contract. This order was not given until about one month before the expiration of the contract, the plaintiff not having ordered any material thereunder for the preceding eleven months. This material had in the meantime greatly increased in price. Under these circumstances it was held that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that he needed this large amount of material in his business for the short period of time the contract was to run.

In Moore v. American Molasses Co. (N. Y.) supra, under a contract to supply the plaintiff with all the molasses he should require in his regular business as veterinarian and dealer in stable supplies, which contract was the continuance of a contract which had previously existed between the same parties, the defendant supplied plaintiff with over 100 barrels of molasses more than he had ever used in previous years, and he refused to furnish more, although the plaintiff ordered nearly 8,000 more barrels. Under these circumstances it was held that unless the molasses which the plaintiff ordered was needed by him in his usual business, the defendant was under no obligation to furnish it.

In Dowd v. Hercules Powder Co. (reported herewith) ante, 498, a contract to furnish all the dynamite and other blasting supplies which would be required by the buyer for his own consumption or for the conduct of his own business during a certain period of time was held to justify the seller in refusing to furnish a very large order of the buyer made but a few days before the expiration of the contract, and which could not be filled during the life thereof, the size and date of the order clearly indicating that the material could not be used during the life of the contract.

Compare on this point with McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder (1902) 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664, where, in a contract of this character, the term "require" was construed to refer merely to such articles as the buyer might want during the period of the contract, the term "want" being used in the sense of desire, and hence not to impose on the buyer the obligation to purchase of the seller any of his requirements.

Where the buyer makes a claim for damages for breach of contract by the seller, on the ground that the latter failed to furnish all the commodity it ordered, the buyer should make definite proof that it actually needed in its business the amount of the commodity which it had ordered of the seller and which the latter had failed to furnish. Russell, Burdsall & Ward v. Excelsior Stove & Mfg. Co. (1905) 120 Ill. App. 23, supra. And see also Asahel Wheeler Co. v. Mendleson (1917) 180 App. Div. 9, 167 N. Y. Supp. 435, supra.

4. Obligation to furnish commodity for resale by buyer.

Under the rule that, by a contract for the purchase of the buyer's requirements of a certain commodity in his business, the seller is bound to furnish such a quantity of the commodity as the business of the buyer necessitates, the business necessities of the buyer are the test of the quantity of the commodity he is entitled to have the seller furnish him, and the latter is under no obligation to furnish the buyer with such commodity for the purpose of resale by the latter. H. D. Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield (1902) 53 C. C. A. 28, 115 Fed. 119; Cullinan v. Standard Light & P. Co. (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 65 S. W. 689.

In Cullinan v. Standard Light & P. Co. (Tex.) supra, it is held that a contract to furnish oil at a designated price per barrel, the buyer agreeing to receive oil sufficient to run its plant for a certain period of time only, requires the seller to furnish the amount of oil required by the buyer in the operation of its plant, and where the buyer, under pretense of securing oil to be used in its plant, had large quantities of oil shipped to it, and then diverted the shipment and sold the oil to others at a profit, this conduct amounted to a fraud upon the seller, rendering the buyer liable for the loss thereby occasioned the former. The court said: "It is manifest that appellee was bound, under the contract, to receive only a limited quantity of oil,—that is, an amount sufficient to run its plant for the specified time,—and appellant was not bound to furnish any greater amount. It is clear from the language of the contract that it was not the intention of the parties thereto that the oil company should be bound to deliver more oil than appellee was bound to accept. That the oil was sold for a special purpose is disclosed by the terms of the contract. The stipulations concerning the putting in of burners and tanks, and of the purchase thereof by the oil company in certain contingencies, as well as the provision guaranteeing a price not exceeding 50 cents per barrel, show that the principal, if not the only, inducement to the sale, was to introduce the oil to appellee as a successful and profitable substitute for coal, and thus secure to the oil company a permanent customer, and widen the market for its product. It is plain that the oil was not sold to appellee to be used by it in speculation. Such being the case, had appellee demanded of appellant that he furnish it with oil to be used, compliance with the demand could not have been enforced, even though the quantity demanded had been within the amount necessary to operate its plant. . . . In other words, appellee, having bought the oil for its own use, and having thereby secured special terms, could not require appellant, under the contract, to supply it with oil for other purposes. The pretense that the oil bought was to be appropriated to the purposes of the contract, when in fact it was diverted therefrom and sold on profit to strangers, was, in legal contemplation, a fraud upon appellant, and justified this proceeding."

But a mere resale of a portion of the commodity ordered under a contract of this character as a matter of convenience to another party does not necessarily constitute a breach of the contract. H. D. Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield (Fed.) supra. Upon this point it is said that, "whether the sale of these barrels was such a breach as operated to discharge the contract depends, in our judgment, upon whether they were originally ordered in good faith by the plaintiffs for their own use, and to meet the supposed requirements of their business during the year 1899, or for such ulterior purpose as was alleged in the defendants' answer. It cannot be, we think, in a case like the one in hand, where by the contract the quantity of goods agreed to be sold and delivered was uncertain, and depended upon the requirements of the plaintiffs' trade, that the plaintiffs could not sell any barrels which they had ordered in good faith for their own use without discharging the opposite party from its agreement. An unexpected decrease in the demand for oil, and other causes, might render it necessary to dispose of a part of a stock of barrels which the plaintiffs had accumulated in good faith with the expectation of using them. It must be presumed that the parties to the contract foresaw that such events might occur, and that it was also understood that the plaintiffs would conduct their business in the usual way, extending such courtesies to rival concerns as were customary in the trade."

As hereinafter more specifically pointed out, the term "requirement" as used in contracts of this character may be qualified by other language in the contract indicating more specifically the actual amount of the commodity to be furnished. For example, it has been held that where the contract calls for the buyer's requirements of a certain commodity for a certain period of time without indicating that it is his requirements in the business in which he is engaged, and with a specific statement as to the minimum and maximum amount the seller is obliged to furnish, this latter statement will control to the extent that the buyer is entitled to the maximum quantity of the commodity without reference to whether or not he actually needs that amount in his business, even though his purpose is to resell it. DIAMOND ALKALI CO. v. ÆTNA EXPLOSIVES CO. (reported herewith) ante, 495.

5. Obligation to furnish commodity to be carried by buyer in stock beyond term of contract.

The buyer is entitled to order a reasonable amount of the commodity in advance of his actual needs, and where the custom of the buyer is to carry over some of the commodity from one season to another, he may require the seller to furnish the usual amount of commodity to be carried over to the next season although it is beyond the life of the contract.

For example, where the contract is for a certain commodity used in the buyer's factory up to a certain date, not less than a certain amount or more than a certain amount, the buyer is entitled to the maximum amount of the commodity if this amount is necessary to keep the requisite supply on hand for the buyer's future use up to the date designated, even though this amount had not been actually used by the buyer up to that time. Staver Carriage Co. v. Park Steel Co. (1906) 220 Ill. 412, 77 N. E. 174.

In McLean County Coal Co. v. Bloomington (1908) 234 Ill. 90, 84 N. E. 624, a contract to furnish a city its supply of coal, ordered by the city as required or needed, was construed to give the city some discretion as to the quantity it should order in advance of its actual needs, and one month's supply in advance was held not an unreasonable requirement. It was, however, held that the contract did not give the city the right to order in advance practically its entire supply of coal for the life of the contract. The court said: "The intention of the parties in making this contract plainly authorized appellee to order coal as required or needed by its various departments, but it would not be a reasonable construction to say that, in anticipation of a strike, during the first month of the contract it could order at once all the coal which it had the right to order during the whole life of the contract. While a certain amount of discretion under this contract rested with appellee as to the amount it might order at any given time, this discretion must be reasonably exercised. What constitutes such reasonable discretion? Taking into consideration the words 'ordered,' 'directed,' 'required,' and 'needed,' as used in their various connections in the request, bid, and contract, we think it would not be an unreasonable construction to say that the discretion rested with appellee to order coal at least a month in advance."

Compare with Manhattan Oil Co. v. Richardson Lubricating Co. (1902) 51 C. C. A. 553, 113 Fed. 923, holding that a contract to furnish all the oil the buyer should require for its own use in its manufacturing business for a designated period of time did impose upon the seller the obligation to furnish the buyer only as much oil as it would require for use in its manufacturing business within the time designated. It authorized the buyer to use more or less as long as it observed good faith and did not reduce or increase its consumption beyond the legitimate requirements of its manufacturing business. The buyer could not, however, require the seller to furnish oil for use beyond the term of the contract.

In H. D. Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield (1902) 53 C. C. A. 23, 115 Fed. 119, it is held that a contract to furnish all the barrels required by a certain company for a season imposed upon the seller the duty to furnish all the barrels required by the buyer in its business for that season, but it did not require the seller to furnish barrels to the buyer for use the following season or for the purpose of reselling the same at a profit.

A covenant by the seller to supply a sufficient quantity of an article to meet the requirements of the buyer, and the implied covenant by the latter to order only such quantity of such article as he needs in his business, are dependent, and not independent, covenants, hence a breach of the covenant by the buyer ordering more goods than he needs in his business for the time specified discharges the seller from the duty of making further deliveries. H. D. Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield (1902) 53 C. C. A. 23, 115 Fed. 119.

In order for the foregoing rule to apply, it is not necessary that the seller shall have known of the breach of the contract in this regard by the buyer at the time he refused to make further deliveries under the contract. Ibid.

Upon this point the court said: "If the plaintiffs ordered from the defendants barrels which were not needed for use in their business during the year 1899, with intent to stock up for the year 1900, or to sell the barrels so ordered at a profit, they violated a material obligation which was imposed on them by the contract, and did so deliberately. The implied promise to order only such barrels as they needed for the year 1899 was a substantial part of the consideration for the defendants' promise to furnish barrels during that year at the price specified. If the defendant company had been requested to supply barrels to meet the requirements of the plaintiffs' business during a period of two years, or to enable them to sell barrels to third parties at a profit, it might, and very likely would, have charged a higher price for its barrels than the price specified in the contract. The breach of the contract complained of was not one of those unintentional or enforced violations of the provisions of a contract in some minor particular, which will sometimes be excused to the extent that the opposite party will only be allowed to take advantage of the breach by recouping his damages."

If the buyer fraudulently orders and receives more of the commodity than is necessary for use in his business, for the purpose of reselling the same at a profit, his conduct in this regard constitutes a fraud upon the seller, entitling the latter to maintain an action against the buyer for the fraud thus practised upon him, in which the seller may recover the loss he suffers by reason of the fraud. Cullinan v.

Tex. Civ. App. —, 65 S. W. 689.

1. In general.

A contract for the sale of the buyer's requirements in a certain commodity, where the buyer is in some established business requiring the use of such commodity therein, imposes upon him the duty of purchasing from the seller the amount of such commodity which he actually requires for use in said business during the life of the contract.

In Miller v. Leo (N. Y.) supra, a contract to furnish such material as the contractor may require in constructing certain buildings was held to obligate the buyer to purchase his entire requirements of such material from the seller. The court said that the term "required" was not used in the sense of "ask for," and added: "In our judgment that is not a proper construction of the word as used in this contract. The plain meaning of it is, that the delivery was to be of all the material necessary to complete the buildings, and that was what Miller was bound to deliver, and it is equally clear, in our judgment, that that was what he was entitled to have demanded. It was either a contract which bound both parties in its entirety, or it was a mere proposal which bound neither. Either Miller was bound to deliver all the material of that nature necessary to be used upon those buildings, or he was bound to deliver none, and was at liberty to stop whenever he saw fit. If he was bound to deliver all the material, it is clear that there must have been a corresponding obligation on the part of Leo to order from Miller the material which Miller was bound to furnish. The word 'require' here must be construed in view of that reciprocal obligation, and, thus construed, it seems plain that the contract not only bound Miller to furnish whatever brick, lime, and cement were necessary to finish the buildings, but it bound Leo reciprocally to order all those things from him. Therefore, when Leo refused to order the lime from Miller, he had violated the contract, and, so far as Miller was concerned, he was not in fault for refusing to deliver any more brick."

In T. W. Jenkins & Co. v. Anaheim Sugar Co. (Fed.) supra, in sustaining the validity of a contract by a wholesale house to purchase its requirements of sugar for a certain period of time from the defendant, the court said the buyer agreed to confine its purchase to the sugar company and that its normal requirements were alone involved, this amount being known approximately by the seller.

In Los Angeles Gas & E. Corp. v. Amalgamated Oil Co. (Cal.) supra, a contract provided for the purchase by the defendant of sufficient oil to operate its plant for a given period of time, over and above the amount of oil which the buyer had contracted to purchase of another company. This latter contract provided for a maximum and minimum amount; it appeared, however, that sometimes the buyer purchased under this latter contract more than the maximum amount and sometimes more than the minimum amount. This was held to constitute a breach of the contract involved in the suit, even though the amount actually received by the buyer for the entire period of time did not exceed the maximum amount.

In Albany Power & Mfg. Co. v. Albany (Ga.) supra, a contract to furnish a stated quantity of electric current each twenty-four hours and so much more as the buyer might require for his own purposes is construed to require the seller to furnish such reasonable quantity of current as the exigencies of the buyer might call for over and above the amount stated, but not to require the buyer to take or pay for any additional quantity which he did not require in his business.

But see McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder (1902) 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664, holding that a contract for the purchase of all of the boxes of a certain kind which the buyer would require during a certain period of time referred merely to such boxes as the buyer might want during that period of time, the term "want" being used in the sense of desire, and hence not to impose any obligation upon the buyer to purchase of the seller his requirements in boxes.

Where the buyer exercises good faith and is free from fraud in disposing of, or making a change in, his business, such change will have the effect of releasing him from the obligation of the contract to purchase his requirements of a certain commodity used in his certain business, to the extent that the change in the business does away with the necessity for the use of the commodity.

Thus, in Drake v. Vorse (1879) 52 Iowa, 417, 3 N. W. 465, it is held that under a contract to furnish a manufacturer with all the castings of a certain kind which he may want during a designated period of time, where the buyer discontinues the manufacturing business individually and engages in it with another as a partnership, he is under no obligation to take any castings as an individual and the partnership is under no obligation under the contract.

In McKeever v. Canonsburg Iron Co. (1890) 133 Pa. 134, 20 Atl. 938, a contract to furnish all the coal of different kinds the purchaser requires to operate its mill for a given period of time is held to be breached by the buyer in purchasing and using coal of a different kind than that designated in the contract, but it did not breach the contract by installing gas and using gas in the place of coal. The court said: "It is obvious that no limit was, by the contract, put upon the discretion of the defendants as to the amount of coal they were to use in the mill. It might be much, little, or none at all. What coal was necessary for consumption in their works they must take from the plaintiffs. This was all they were bound to do, and all the plaintiffs were bound to furnish them; and it was of no consequence whether the falling off in that consumption was occasioned by the contraction of their business, or by the introduction of gas. In either case, less coal was necessary for the defendants' manufactory, and they were not obliged to pay for what they did not require."

On the other hand, where the buyer disposes of the business with reference to which he has purchased a commodity to the extent of his requirements, the seller is under no obligation to furnish such commodity to the purchaser of the business, nor is he under any obligation to furnish the same to the original buyer.

This is the holding of Laclede Constr. Co. v. T. J. Moss Tie Co. (1904) 135 Mo. 25, 84 S. W. 76. In this case a contract to furnish a railroad company the number of ties which it would need for a certain period of time, not exceeding a specified number, was held not to bind the seller to furnish such ties to another railroad company which acquired the railroad company with which the contract was made.

III. Effect of qualifying words.

As hereinafter more specifically pointed out, the agreement to furnish the requirements of the buyer for certain articles or material may be qualified by specific language indicating the intentions of the parties in making such qualification, as, for example, the inclusion after the agreement to furnish the buyer's requirements, of the statement of a maximum and minimum amount to be furnished, or a statement of the maximum amount, or the statement of the amount qualified by such terms as "about, approximately, more or less, not more than," etc.

It has been held that a contract for the sale of all the tire steel used in a buyer's factory up to a certain date, not less than a certain amount or more than a certain amount, entitled the buyer to the maximum amount if necessary to keep a requisite supply on hand for the buyer's future use, up to the date designated, although that amount was not actually used by the buyer up to that time. Staver Carriage Co. v. Park Steel Co. (1906) 220 Ill. 412, 77 N. E. 174.

In DIAMOND ALKALI Co. v. AETNA EXPLOSIVES Co. (reported herewith) ante, 495, it is held that where the contract calls for the buyer's requirements for a certain period of time, and contains a statement as to the minimum and maximum amount, the latter statement will control to the extent that the buyer is entitled to the maximum quantity of the commodity without reference to whether or not he actually needs that amount in his business. In this case, some point is made of the fact that the statement in the contract as to the buyer's requirements did not recite that it was for his requirements in the manufacturing business in which he was engaged.

In Staver Carriage Co. v. Park Steel Co. (1900) 43 C. C. A. 471, 104 Fed. 200, a contract to furnish the amount of certain material which the buyer would use in his works prior to a certain time, not to be less than a stated amount or to exceed a certain amount, to be ordered at least a certain period of time prior to the expiration of the contract, was held to bind the seller to furnish and the buyer to take, within the amounts specified, his entire supply of such material which he reasonably and necessarily required in his works within the time specified.

In Marx v. American Malting Co. (1909) 95 C. C. A. 80, 169 Fed. 582, a contract to furnish a malting company its requirements of malt, which contained a statement that the amount of malt used would be between 15,000 and 20,000 bushels, was construed to require the seller to furnish the entire requirements of the buyer, although greatly in excess of the maximum amount stated. The court said that, "coming to the construction of the contract, we are of opinion that, in respect to the quantity of the malt contracted for, the dominating specification is found in the words, 'all their requirements to December 31, 1907,' and that the words below, 'amount of malt to be used will be between 15,000 and 20,000 bushels,' are a mere estimate of the probable requirement intended by the seller as a memorandum to be considered as advisory in the conduct of its own business, or possibly an assurance that the purchaser would want at least that quantity. There are several reasons for this conclusion. In the first place, it seems improbable that the vendee, evidently contemplating the enlargement of his business and then making provision for it, would have limited himself while contracting for his requirements for the ensuing year to the requirements of his old business. Nor could the vendor have supposed that the old limits would be adequate to the new conditions. So far as appears there was no reason why the vendor should desire such a limitation. The words of the sentence are themselves indefinite, and seem to indicate that they were employed as rather a negligible expression than as a substantive term of the contract. Then, again, it is a fundamental rule in the interpretation of agreements that we should ascertain the prime object and purpose of the parties, and, in case of ambiguity produced by its minor provisions, the latter should, if possible, be so construed as not to conflict with the main purpose. It is clear enough that these parties had in mind, not the sale of a certain number of bushels of malt, but so much as the business of the vendee would require during the period mentioned. And the rule just stated would require that the particular language upon which the vendor relies should, if possible, be held to be the expression of an estimate merely of the probable requirements. And we think it is easily possible to give the language that construction. In many cases a more stringent rule has been laid down, which is that, if the minor provision of the contract is irreconcilable with the obvious general intent, it would for that reason be sacrificed altogether for the promotion of the general purpose of the agreement. Another reason for adopting a more harmless meaning to this language than one which should defeat the main purpose is that the instrument was prepared by the vendor and the rule is that in case of doubt or ambiguity arising from the use of words, they should be construed most favorably to the other party."

In Heisel v. Volkmann (1900) 55 App. Div. 607, 67 N. Y. Supp. 271, it is held that under a contract to furnish the requirements of the purchaser of gum for a designated period, stating a maximum and minimum number of pieces, the purchaser is bound to accept the minimum number of pieces.

In H. D. Taylor Co. v. Niagara Bedstead Co. (1907) 52 Misc. 356, 102 N. Y. Supp. 173, a contract to ship 100 to 125 tons of an article at a designated price, with a statement in the contract, "our requirements approximately," was construed to require the purchaser to take at least 100 tons of the article, although he did not use that quantity in his business.

c. Statement of quantity.

1. In general.

In Gulf Ref. Co. v. Brown-Lloyd Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 162, it is held that an agreement to furnish a designated number of gallons of gasoline, or such quantity of such product as the buyer may require for its own consumption during a certain period of time, does not entitle the buyer to the entire amount specified, unless such quantity is necessary for its use in its business. Hence, where, ten days before the expiration of the contract, the buyer ordered a large quantity of the material, being the balance of the quantity specified which had not been delivered, and being largely in excess of the amount it would or could use in its business during the short period of time remaining under the contract, the seller is under no obligation to furnish it. The court said that "in construing such contracts precisely, what the parties intended must be determined according to the plain import and the ordinary or popular significance of the language used therein. By the provisions of the contract under discussion, the appellant agreed to furnish appellee 5,000 gallons of gasoline, or as much as was required by appellee for its own consumption. The latter portion of the clause undeniably modifies what precedes it, and in our opinion it cannot intelligently be maintained that the purpose of the contract, as evidenced by its terms and the testimony of appellee's witnesses, was other than to furnish appellee whatever amount of gasoline it might require for its own consumption, whether the amount so required was more or less than 5,000 gallons. Such conclusion is sufficiently supported by the modifying portion of the contract, but is also sustained by appellee's witness, who concedes the consumption or use of gasoline by appellee was only for mixing paints, and that they contracted for no other purpose. The 5,000 gallons specified could not have been intended as an absolute sale at all events of that much gasoline, for, if it had been, both parties would have concluded the agreement with such clear, unequivocal specification. Counsel for appellee recognize the force of such conclusion, as we have said, and seek to avoid same by the claim that the parties intended to sell the 5,000 gallons outright, and in addition thereto as much more as appellee required for its own consumption, and argue that the word 'and' should be substituted for 'or,' which is a rule of law in some cases, and that the word 'require' should be given its literal meaning, rather than the meaning intended by the parties as gathered from the contract and the testimony. We think the contention unsound.

However, the meaning to be given the word 'require' is immaterial, since to construe it to mean all the gasoline 'called for,' as urged by appellee, would only mean all 'called for' 'for its own consumption,' and it is undisputed that such amount was furnished. To substitute 'and' for 'or' would make it necessary to destroy almost entirely the modifying clause placed in the contract by the parties, since, in order to make complete appellee's construction, it would also be necessary to strike out the word 'consumption' so as to make the concluding paragraph read as appellee argues the parties intended it should, i. e., 'and in addition such quantity of the above product as second party may call for during the period of the contract.' As we have said, the rule is that to words contained in a contract there shall be applied the ordinary and popular sense, unless there is something to show they were used in a different sense. Here the contract was to furnish 5,000 gallons of gasoline, modified by the parties as meaning more or less if appellee required it in its business, and, since such is the last word, the conclusion is inescapable that the specification of the number of gallons was but an estimate of the probable requirements of appellee, and, since it is conceded that appellee demanded more than was necessary for such purpose, and refused to accept an amount that would have met its actual needs, it was not entitled to recover any sum." To the same effect see Gulf Ref. Co. v. Pegues Mercantile Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 164 S. W. 1113.

2. Not to exceed a certain quantity.

In Fletcher v. Germain (1890) 82 Mich. 247, 46 N. W. 868, it is held that a contract to buy its coming season's wants, not to exceed a designated quantity, does not impose upon the buyer the duty of taking the maximum amount where the season's needs were less than that amount.

In Ready v. J. L. Fulton Co. (1904) 179 N. Y. 399, 72 N. E. 317, the contract was for the sale of not less than a certain number of cubic yards of material, and not more than a certain number of cubic yards, with the provision that if more than the named amount was required, a certain notice was to be given. The court said that the provision that if the additional amount was required, notice was to be given, indicated that this additional amount was regarded by the parties as an extra amount which the buyer might or might not require, and was to be received and furnished only in case it should be required by the buyer and the proper notice given; in other words, the requirement provided for by the contract was the requirement by the buyer, and could only be rendered effective by notice furnished, and was not a necessity which should exist by reason of some contract or business which formed no part of the agreement. In this regard, the court distinguished Miller v. Leo (1898) 35 App. Div. 589, 55 N. Y. Supp. 165, affirmed without opinion in (1900) 165 N. Y. 619, 59 N. E. 1126 and Brawley v. United States (1878) 96 U. S. 168, 24 L. ed. 622. As to these cases, the court said: "An examination of those cases at once discloses that they have no bearing upon the question involved in this case, as the facts and the principles which were there applied are wholly unlike those involved or applicable here. In the Miller Case the contract specifically related to material to be furnished for the erection of two houses, and the agreement between the parties was to sell and purchase all the materials of the class mentioned that were necessary or required for such building. There the amount and character of the materials were to be determined by the requirements of certain work; while in this case the agreement in no way related to any particular work or job to be performed by the defendant, but the character and amount of the material to be furnished were expressly provided for by the contract. As to 5,000 cubic yards, the agreement was absolute to purchase and sell. As to the 3,000 it depended upon the defendant's option and its giving notice requiring its delivery. In the Brawley Case, when examined, it will be found that there the question as to the amount of wood which was to be delivered was to be determined by the post commander. Although the amount mentioned in the contract was 880 cords, it was held that where the commander notified the contractor that he required but 40, his determination was final, and the government was not liable for any number of cords beyond the 40 delivered."

3. Approximately a designated quantity.

In Bloomington Canning Co. v. Union Can Co. (1901) 94 Ill. App. 62, it is held that a contract by a manufacturer of cans to furnish a canning company its requirements for a certain season, approximately a designated number of cans, requires the seller to furnish such number of cans as the buyer uses in its business during the life of the contract, not exceeding the number designated, since this designation limits the contract, and the buyer, although he uses a large number more than the number designated, cannot require the same to be furnished under the contract. The court said: "We think by the use of the words of the contract, 'your order for your season's requirements of cans, approximately as follows,' giving the number of each class of cans to be furnished, were intended to fix a limit beyond which appellee could not be forced to go. In other words, appellant, by the use of that language, in effect said that the number of cans required would approach the figures named, nearly,—it might not be quite so many,—but not beyond, or over. If demanded, appellee was bound to furnish the quantities named in the contract, but no more. In this sense the expression 'more or less' is far from being synonymous with 'approximately,' for the former words imply going beyond or over the quantity or amount named, while the latter does not; therefore the arguments and authorities in the briefs of counsel, based upon their assumed analogy, have no proper application to the contract in question."

4. Estimated quantity.

In Mills-Carleton Co. v. Huberty (1911) 84 Ohio St. 81, 95 N. E. 383, the facts were that the defendant agreed to pay for all the lumber furnished for the use of the contractor for the construction of a certain building, estimated at a designated quantity. It was held that this estimate was a mere approximate calculation of the lumber required, and might be altered during the construction.

5. Designated quantity, "more or less."

In Callmeyer v. New York (1880) 83 N. Y. 116, the contract was executed in accordance with bids given in answer to an application for bids, a provision of which was that the contract was for a certain period from the date thereof, and the material contracted for must be delivered as called for by the requisition of the treasurer. In referring to the quantity of material to be furnished, the words "more or less" following the statement of the quantity, it was held that this contract was not an agreement for the delivery of a definite and fixed quantity of material, but the quantity was flexible, and this construction was not changed by the fact that the specifications contained the statement of the proper amount needed, guarded by the qualification of "more or less."

In Merriam v. United States (1883) 107 U. S. 437, 27 L. ed. 531, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536, a contract to furnish the United States government a designated number of thousand pounds of grain or such other quantity, more or less, as might be required from time to time, for the wants of designated stations, was held not to give the seller the right to insist upon furnishing all of the grain used at these particular stations during the period covered by the contract, being an amount in excess of the quantity specifically designated, it appearing that a much larger quantity of grain was advertised for than that to which this particular contract related, and that other contracts were made with different parties for more grain of the same kind.

In F. B. Holmes & Co. v. Detroit (1909) 158 Mich. 137, 122 N. W. 506, a contract to furnish a city all its requirements of cement for a stated period of time, 5,000 barrels more or less, was held to bind the seller to furnish the entire amount of cement required by the city during the life of the contract, although greatly exceeding the estimate. The court said that "this contract covered all the cement required by defendant during the year ending January 31, 1907, for the use of the department of public works. It was a mutual agreement, binding upon both parties. We find no difficulty in ascertaining the prime object and purpose of these parties as expressed in the writings considered. They had in mind so many barrels of cement as the operations of this department would require during this period. The exact amount of cement which would be required could not be known at the time of entering into the contract, as the first meeting of the board of estimates does not occur until in March. The clause '5,000 barrels of Portland cement, more or less,' was the expression of an estimate, subject to the controlling object of the agreement expressed in the words of the contract, 'all the Portland cement that may be required by the city of Detroit and ordered by the department of public works,' the last clause expressing the method required to secure the delivery of the property to defendant."

It has been held that where a contract is to furnish the amount of certain material to be used in constructing a designated building, and there is a statement as to about the amount, this latter statement is a mere estimate of the parties, and is not controlling. In this regard it is the duty of the seller to furnish, and the buyer to receive the amount actually and necessarily required in the construction of the building. Wolff v. Wells, F. & Co. (1902) 52 C. C. A. 262, 115 Fed. 32.

In Brawley v. United States (1878) 96 U. S. 168, 24 L. ed. 622, a contract to furnish an army post with about a certain amount of wood, more or less, as should be determined to be necessary by the commander of the post, was construed to require the furnishing of wood only to the extent found to be necessary by the post commander, although a much less quantity than the estimate, since the statement of the amount under the circumstances was to be regarded merely as an estimate. The court said that if "the qualifying words are supplemented by other stipulations or conditions which give them a broader scope or a more extensive significance, then the contract is to be governed by such added stipulations or conditions. As, if it be agreed to furnish so many bushels of wheat, more or less, according to what the party receiving it shall require for the use of his mill, then the contract is not governed by the quantity named, nor by that quantity with slight and unimportant variations, but by what the receiving party shall require for the use of his mill; and the variation from the quantity named will depend upon his discretion and requirements, so long as he acts in good faith. So, where a manufacturer contracts to deliver at a certain price all the articles he shall make in his factory for the space of two years, 'say a thousand to twelve hundred gallons of naphtha per month,' the designation of quantity is qualified not only by the indeterminate word 'say,' but by the fair discretion or ability of the manufacturer, always provided he acts in good faith. This was the precise decision in Gwillim v. Daniell (1835) 2 Crompt. M. & R. 61, 150 Eng. Reprint, 26, where Lord Abinger says: 'The agreement is simply this, that the plaintiff undertakes to accept all the naphtha that the defendant may happen to manufacture within the period of two years. The words, "say from one thousand to twelve hundred gallons (per month)," are not shown to mean that the defendant undertook, at all events, that the quantity manufactured should amount to so much. If by fraud the defendant manufactured less than he ought to have done, the breach should have been shaped accordingly. Here it does not appear that, in the ordinary course of his manufacture, the defendant ought to have produced a larger quantity than he has done; and we cannot, therefore, say that he has broken his contract.'

"We think that there is manifest reason in this decision, and that the present case is within it. The contract was not for the delivery of any particular lot or any particular quantity, but to deliver at the Post of Fort Pembina 880 cords of wood, 'more or less, as shall be determined to be necessary by the post commander for the regular supply, in accordance with army regulations, of the troops and employees of the garrison of said post, for the fiscal year beginning July 1st, 1871.' These are the determinative words of the contract, and the quantity designated (880 cords) is to be regarded merely as an estimate of what the officer making the contract at the time supposed might be required. The substantial engagement was to furnish what should be determined to be necessary by the post commander for the regular supply for the year, in accordance with army regulations. The post commander, as soon as he learned of the contract, and within four days after it was signed, informed the claimant that but 40 cords of wood would be required thereon, and forbid his hauling any more to the government yard. About a fortnight later, on the 1st of July, 1871, written notice to the same effect was served on the claimant, signed by the post commander. And the court of claims finds as a fact, that the Post of Fort Pembina did not need for the fiscal year in question more than the 40 cords of wood which were accepted by the defendants, thus precluding any plea that in fixing and determining the amount required, the post commander was actuated by any want of good faith."

In Wolff v. Wells, F. & Co. (1902) 52 C. C. A. 626, 115 Fed. 32, a contract was construed as not requiring the delivery of any particular quantity of cement, but to require the delivery of such amount as might be required in constructing the building referred to, although in addition to the agreement to furnish the cement necessary for the construction of a certain building, it was designated as about 5,000 barrels, more or less. The court said that the quantity designated as about 5,000 barrels, more or less, should be construed as an estimate of what the parties supposed might be required, but if the amount actually required exceeds the estimate, it is the duty of the seller to furnish it.

In Budge v. United Smelting & Ref. Co. (1900) 43 C. C. A. 665, 104 Fed. 498, a contract to furnish all the mining timbers required and used by a mining company for a year, to be delivered at certain places in quantities designated by the buyer, and which specifies about the amount of timber which will be required, constitutes a distinct agreement upon the part of the buyer to receive and pay for about the amount of timber specified. The qualification imported by the word "about" is not such as to admit any material variation in the quantity named, even though a much less quantity is actually used by the buyer. The court said that the buyer is not to be released from his contract because the plaintiff, by the terms of the contract, upon his part, stipulated to furnish him such timbers as should be required and used by him during the year, on the ground that a small proportion of the whole amount was in fact used, and added: "We think he must be held by the terms of his own covenants to pay for 600 of the one and 15,000 of the other kind of timber, as specified in the contract. The determining words of the contract are the quantities of timber which are specified in the defendant's promise to pay, and not the words 'all mining timbers required and used,' contained in the plaintiff's covenants. The contract was not one in which the quantity of material to be delivered rested wholly in the will of him who was to receive it, nor was it one of those in which the contracting parties had in mind the construction of a particular work, and the supply of the necessary material therefor; the work itself furnishing to both parties the ultimate measure of the quantity which the contract contemplated. We may assume from the complaint that the defendant alone had knowledge of the number of pieces of timber he would require. He expressed that knowledge in definite figures in the agreement, and for the quantity thus expressed he promised to pay. The plaintiff, upon his part, has in good faith complied with his contract, and furnished the specified quantity. It would not only be unjust, but contrary, we think, to the fair intendment of the terms of the contract, to deny him his right to recover."

In Waddell v. Phillips (1919) 133 Md. 497, 105 Atl. 771, an agreement with a canning company to furnish their season's requirements of cans, about a designated number, was held not to require the seller to furnish cans in excess of the number stated, although this did not amount to the buyer's requirements during the life of the contract.

In Stuart v. Home Teleph. Co. (1910) 161 Mich. 123, 125 N. W. 720, a contract to furnish the buyer's requirements, about a designated number, is held to require the seller to furnish all the articles of the character referred to which the buyer requires in his works not exceeding the number designated.

In Rosenthal v. Empire Brick & Supply Co. (1908) 123 App. Div. 503, 108 N. Y. Supp. 347, a contract to furnish all the mason's material used in the construction of certain buildings, about a certain number of brick, the brick to be furnished before a stated time, requires the seller to furnish such brick if ordered before the date specified.

IV. Extrinsic evidence to aid construction.

Evidence is admissible to ascertain the subject-matter of a contract with reference to which the parties proceeded to negotiate, including their situation and the surrounding circumstances, so that the court may stand in substantially the same light in reading the words of the contract as did the parties when adopting those words. Excelsior Wrapper Co. v. Messinger (1903) 116 Wis. 549, 93 N. W. 459.

In construing contracts of this character, the court will look not only to the language employed, but also to the subject-matter of the contract and the surrounding circumstances, to the end that it may avail itself of the same light which the parties possessed when the contract was made. Merritt v. United States (1883) 107 U. S. 437, 27 L. ed. 531, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536.

In Wolff v. Wells, F. & Co. (1902) 52 C. C. A. 626, 115 Fed. 32, a contract to furnish the amount of cement which the builder would require in the construction of a certain building, about 5,000 barrels more or less, was held to be uncertain and ambiguous, and hence parol evidence was admissible to ascertain the sense in which the language was used, including evidence of the attending and surrounding circumstances, in order to place the court in the same situation and give it the same advantage for construing the instrument as was possessed by the parties thereto.

Where the communications between the parties at or prior to the execution of the contract serve merely to establish the situation or surroundings, they differ not at all from other evidence of the same facts and are equally admissible in evidence; so far, however, as such communications relate to the terms of the agreement between the parties they are not admissible, since the writing must be taken as their final expression. Excelsior Wrapper Co. v. Messinger (Wis.) supra.

In Waddell v. Phillips (1919) 133 Md. 497, 105 Atl. 771, it is held that evidence is inadmissible of conversations between the parties at the time of entering into a contract to furnish the season's requirements of a certain article "about" a given quantity, in order to explain the meaning of the parties in the use of the term "about."

In Marx v. American Malting Co. (1909) 95 C. C. A. 80, 169 Fed. 582, evidence was admitted, apparently without objection, that at the time the contract in question was entered into, the buyer had erected a nearly completed extensive addition to its plant, which would make it possible to use a much larger amount of malt than it had used in former seasons, and the amount it had used in former seasons had run between 15,000 and 20,000 bushels. In construing the contract as it did, the court was apparently largely influenced by this evidence. The court said: "Accordingly all evidence given or offered to show the conditions and circumstances in which the contract was made, and in reference to which the parties were dealing, was, either directly or by the effect of instructions, put aside. There could be no complaint of this if the view which the court took of the contract was correct. The evidence referred to, however, was for the information of the court, and to enable it to rightly construe the agreement; and the effect of the ruling was to say that the language was clear and no aid was needed to interpret it. As we have said, we reach a different conclusion. We think such evidence was competent for the purpose for which it was offered. It was not disputed, and it disclosed highly important facts in aid of the right construction of the agreement. We do not say that all of the evidence offered was admissible for this purpose. Mere words passing from one to another of the parties about matters which were subsequently reduced to writing were not admissible to alter, cut down, or enlarge the terms of the contract; but whatever had reference to the conditions and the probable requirements of the business which the vendee expected, and the knowledge of these conditions and expectations by the respective parties, was admissible. Within the rule, we think it was competent to prove by parol evidence that the vendor was informed of the conditions of the vendee's business and of the enlargement of the plant and of the probable increase of the requirements resulting therefrom."

In Home Gas Co. v. Mannington Co-op. Window Glass Co. (1907) 63 W. Va. 266, 61 S. E. 329, the seller contracted to supply the buyer with gas sufficient to operate his window-glass factory, having at least a certain number of pots. It was held that evidence was not admissible of prior or contemporaneous conversations or stipulations not carried into the contract, in order to fix a maximum amount of gas to be furnished under the contract.

It has been held that the common-law rule that all prior understandings are merged in the final contract cannot be so strictly applied to government contracts, since they are required to be made by advertisements, bids, and acceptances. Mueller v. United States (1884) 19 Ct. Cl. (Fed.) 581.

Ordinarily, the term "requirements" as used in the contract of sale to indicate the quantity of commodity which is the subject-matter of the contract is recognized to be ambiguous, and hence to authorize recourse to the surrounding facts and circumstances explaining the ambiguity and thereby determine the intention of the parties in employing the term to indicate the quantity. It has been held, however, that where a contract was for the buyer's entire requirements for a given period of time, "minimum quantity of 180 tons per month, maximum quantity 250 tons per month," the contract was not ambiguous, and oral evidence was not admissible to show that the contract was only intended to cover the quantity of commodity which the buyer would use in his manufacturing business during the period of the contract. In line with this holding, it is held that the buyer is entitled to the maximum amount of the commodity designated without reference to the requirements of his business. DIAMOND ALKALI CO. v. ÆTNA EXPLOSIVES CO. (reported herewith) ante, 495.

The holding of the court in that case may perhaps be subject to the criticism that in its effect it ignores and fails to give force or significance to the specific language of the contract that the Diamond Alkali Company agrees to manufacture and to sell to the Ætna Explosives Company, and
